Bishop Walter Lambuth, writing in the Dec. 28, 1917, issue of the Christian Advocate (Nashville), said of Mumpower, "The doctor is the same calm, sensible, earnest fellow. . . . Dr. Mumpower has just put through the press at Luebo a new edition for a school book in the Batetela language, and I find him at work translating the gospel of Matthew. . . . naturally, Dr. Mumpower's medical work has been limited because of great pressure of other duties and the absence of a trained nurse." With other pioneer missionaries, D. L. Mumpower left the mark of great accomplishment in the heart of the Congo.

MUNCIE, INDIANA, U.S.A. High Street Church heard its first Methodist sermon in 1829 delivered by Charles Downey, a circuit rider. In 1836 the first Methodist society was organized, becoming a part of the Muncietown Circuit with preaching in the homes. The members of the first class were: Eli C. Green, leader; Mary Green, Hannah Watton, John and Eleanor Smith, Samuel W. and Juliette Harlan, and Matilda, John, and Camelia Beeks.

On Aug. 18, 1838, Mr. and Mrs. Goldsmith C. Gilbert gave the Methodist church a building site. The first church building was erected in 1839, costing $450. In 1851 the membership had grown to more than 200. A new two-story brick church was built in 1856 and that fall the annual conference met there. The edifice cost $4,467 and Bishop AMES dedicated it on July 20, 1857.

The discovery of natural gas in Muncie in the fall of 1886 resulted in an industrial boom which brought many Methodists to the town. A revival in the winter of 1886-87 added about 300 new members. A new church site was purchased on High Street and Adams. The new church was named High Street. It was built under the pastoral leadership of C. U. Wade (father of Bishop R. J. WADE), 1886-91, made of red brick with sandstone trimming, and costing $40,000. C. H. Payne, former president of OHIO WESLEYAN, dedicated the church on June 2, 1889.

High Street Church promoted the spread of Methodism in Muncie. Wade organized Avondale Church in 1891, and it was dedicated Nov. 8, 1891, with High Street's assistant pastor, George A. Wilson, in charge.

During the pastorate of L. U. Nafziger, 1897-1900, FRED B. FISHER, then a high school student, later a distinguished Methodist bishop, was converted. In 1938 one-third of the ashes of Bishop Fisher were sealed in a niche prepared for them in the wall of the new sanctuary near the pulpit he had occupied on various occasions.

H. D. Ketcham, a brother-in-law of Bishop WILLIAM ANDERSON, was pastor of High Street from 1921 to 1924. High Street's growing congregation in time needed a new sanctuary. Claude H. King, pastor, 1925-34, served during the construction of the new church. At the request of the church and with his consent, King was sent to Europe to study church architecture. The new church was to be Gothic, made of Briar Hill sandstone, with imported glass windows. This sanctuary, a thing of beauty, was dedicated Oct. 5, 1930, and cost approximately $400,000. However, the coming of the depression delayed the payment of a $220,000 debt until March 1, 1948. This amount was paid during the pastorate of A. WESLEY PUGH, 1937-49. On Oct. 10, 1948, the church was rededicated by Bishop RICHARD RAINES and the mortgage was burned.

In 1970 the High Street Church was valued at almost $2,000,000, and had 2,158 members.

MUNHALL, LEANDER WHITCOMB (1843-1934), American soldier, evangelist, and conservative editor, was born June 7, 1843, at Zanesville, Ohio, the son of David and Abigail (Rice) Munhall. He was educated in the public schools and the University of Chattanooga, Tennessee, A.M. In August 1862, he enlisted in Company C, 79th Indiana Infantry. Promoted to major and adjutant of the regiment, he took part in over a score engagements of the Civil War, mustering out June 7, 1865.

While a local deacon in the Philadelphia Conference, he became an evangelist. Beginning in 1874, he preached for more than fifty years. Munhall carried on evangelistic campaigns in cities of the United States and Canada. He preached to Panama Canal workers for two months. He was elected to six General Conferences of his Church from 1904 to 1928. He wrote these books: Lord's Return and Kindred Truth; Higher Criticism vs. Higher Critics; Anti-Higher Criticism, or Testimony to the Infallibility of the Bible; Breakers, Methodism Adrift; A Convert and His Relations. Munhall also edited Word and Work for three years, besides pamphlets and tracts.

A Methodist bishop said of Munhall: "He was a very conservative Methodist editor who was anathema to the main leadership of the Church whom he did not hesitate to criticize for their liberal ideas, especially the theologians whom he thought were leading the Church astray."

Munhall married Mary E. Thomas, Sept. 21, 1871, and they were the parents of five children. For many years Munhall's home was in Germantown, Philadelphia. He died Jan. 7, 1934.

MUNICH, Germany, the historic capital of Bavaria and one of the famous and influential cities of Central Europe, had a 1968 population of 1,300,000. In 1873 the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY in LONDON appointed the first minister, P. Beutenmueller, to Munich. At that time the city was predominantly Roman Catholic. Thirty years later there were about 100 Methodists in Munich. In 1915 the present church in the Frauenlobstrasse was dedicated by Bishop J. L. NUELSEN. It had a membership of 500 in 1968. A second church, Enhuberstrasse (formerly independent), joined the Methodist Church in 1942. Its membership was reported at 800 in 1968. A third church, Paul-Heyse-Strasse (formerly E.U.B., founded in 1919) joined The United Methodist Church (Evangelisch-methodistische Kirche) in 1968, reporting 330 members.

Four ministers and two deaconesses are doing their work in the city at present. The first Methodist deaconess station (now a hospital) was opened in 1889 (organized by the NUREMBERG motherhouse "Martha-Maria"). The "Martha-Maria-Hospital" München-Solln until 1968 had some 100 beds and forty nurses, being enlarged to 150 beds in 1969. Church work is active, and church attendance is good, though it is difficult to gain new members, because practically everybody belongs to one church or the other; it is not easy to convince Roman Catholics, and the Protestant minority is active anyhow. The future depends on powerful preaching, a true family spirit in the churches, and intensive pastoral care.

HERMANN NEEF

MUÑOZ Y GALBAN, JUAN GUALBERTO (1882-1966), a Cuban pastor, was born in Fomento, Las Villas Province, July 12, 1882. Married in 1908 to Rosa Fernandez, their children were, Elisa, Alfredo, Virginia, Blanca and Evangelina.

He was converted in 1902 under the influence of W. E. Sewell at a service "where he went to scoff but remained to pray."

Entering the ministry in 1905, he served sixteen pastoral appointments and retired in 1954 after fifty years of service. Although retired he continued to work until a few days before his death.

For many years no Annual Conference was complete without the reading of the Resolutions Committee report by Juan Muñoz.

His life was characterized by his sense of humor, unselfish abnegation and humility. These were manifested in his home as well as in the church and among his friends.

MUNSEY, WILLIAM ELBERT (1833-1877), American minister of the M.E. Church, South, who while introspective and at times even morbid, was a brilliant and colorful preacher whose sermons made a deep impression on all who heard them. He was born in Giles (now Bland) County, Va., on July 13, 1833, the son of David Munsey and grandson of Zachariah Munsey, the latter being a local preacher of the M.E. Church in that part of VIRGINIA. He had an unusual mother, Mrs. Parmelia P. Munsey, who outlived him and who was called by Bishop JOHN C. KEENER, "wise, prudent and a good manager of home affairs." William Munsey was licensed to preach on Sept. 1, 1855, and received into the HOLSTON CONFERENCE (MES) in October 1856. Thereafter he was ordained DEACON in 1858 by Bishop ANDREW, an ELDER in 1860 by Bishop PAINE. He was married to Miss Virginia A. Blair at Jonesboro, Tenn., on May 17, 1860.

After serving a few years in minor charges of the Holston Conference, he was sent to CHATTANOOGA where he served, 1858-59; then to the well-known Church Street Church in KNOXVILLE, in 1860; to Abingdon, Va., in 1861; Chattanooga, 1862-63; back to Abingdon in 1864; then to Bristol (Tenn.-Va.) in 1865. He was then transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and stationed at Alexandria, Va., in 1866, and then at Central Church, BALTIMORE, in 1867-68.

Munsey was made secretary of Foreign Missions early in 1869, which post he held for a few months, but not liking executive work, he was located at his own request and removed to Jonesboro, Tenn.

By this time he had become well known as a lecturer and preacher and being admitted to the Holston Conference again in 1875, he was transferred at once to the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE and stationed at the St. Charles Avenue Church (now Rayne Memorial), in NEW ORLEANS. In this church he made a great name for himself as he did everywhere by the forceful, unusual and electrifying powers of his delivery. His sermons (as may be seen in their printed form today) were florid and effulgent in the extreme and can be viewed as an example of that type of oratory which was then much admired over the South and, indeed, the nation. Bishop Keener said after hearing him preach at ASHEVILLE, N. C., "The impression made upon our mind at the time was that of the constant surging of the billows of an ocean of light." It was probably after hearing him preach that Bishop Keener brought him to New Orleans where he instantly won appreciation from wide audiences.

Munsey's sermons on Eternal Death, on the Resurrection, on the Creation and such themes gave him an opportunity for expanding the scope of his particular talent in preaching. "His description of the lost soul was Miltonic," said Bishop Keener after hearing that sermon.

Munsey was transferred to the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE in 1876, but shortly after that, fell into ill health and died in Jonesboro on Oct. 23, 1877.

Describing him in the preface to the volume of his published sermons, Bishop Keener said, "As he plodded through his arguments, one could but admire the acuteness of his logic. . . . But when his conclusions had been reached, he would leave premises and conclusions behind, and upon the wings of imagination, would dart into illimitable fields of beauty and grandeur. He careered through the universe of fancy with a momentum that was positively wonderful, and sometimes even terrific. Whenever he soared and carried his audience with him, new worlds, new beauties, new sublimities, new horrors sprang into being on all sides. He could then easily descend from his flights, fold his wings, and then plod through his reasoning process as patiently as if he were totally destitute of imagination."

Following Munsey's death, his sermons were collected and published in a volume which old ministers of the Southern Methodist Church continue to treasure. From the preface and introductory articles in the front of this book, most of the information about Munsey can be obtained.

MUNZ, FRIEDRICH (1865-1916), German-American minister, professor and editor, was born in Heslach near Stuttgart, Germany, on March 24, 1865. Educated at Esslingen, he emigrated to Farmington, Iowa and attended the MOUNT PLEASANT GERMAN COLLEGE. He was admitted to the West German Annual Conference of the M.E. Church and served churches in NEBRASKA and Iowa City, Iowa. In 1891 he became pastor of the German Methodist Church in Mount Pleasant and president of the Mount Pleasant German College (1893-1897). In the latter year he became assistant editor and in 1900 editor of Haus und Herd, a popular monthly German Methodist family publication. To this he contributed many devotional and historical articles. He resigned in 1912 and in 1914 became professor of theology, CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Warrenton, Mo. He died suddenly on Sept. 14, 1916. He received an honorary M.A. from Central Wesleyan in 1892 and a D.D. from German Wallace College, Berea, Ohio in 1900. He edited two famous German Methodist hymnals, Lobe den Herrn! (1905) and Die Pilgerklänge (1907); wrote a well known treatise on preaching, Homeletik (1897), books on Biblical exegesis and translations of popular religious novels into German. He was a major intellectual force in German-American Methodism.

MURCHISON, ELISHA P. (1907-), twenty-ninth bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born at Fort Worth, Texas, on June 18, 1907. He received an A.B. degree from CLARK COLLEGE, a B.D. degree from GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, an M.A. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY, and an honorary D.D. degree from PAINE COLLEGE. He entered the ministry in 1920 and served churches in GEORGIA, TEXAS, MASSACHUSETTS, and ILLINOIS. From 1932 to 1935, he was a professor at Texas College in the department of religion, and from 1935 to 1938 was director of Leadership Education of the C.M.E. Church. He was editor of The Christian Index, the major publication of his denomination, from 1946 to 1954. He was elected to the office of bishop in 1958. At the first assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Amsterdam, he represented his Church, and he has also worked as a missionary in Africa. Presently, he is chairman of Public Resolutions of the C.M.E. Church in addition to serving his episcopal area. He presently resides in Birmingham, Ala.

MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE, U.S.A., First Church was organized in 1820 as a result of a CAMP MEETING held at Windrow's Camp Ground. Soon after its close those who lived in Murfreesboro organized a church with approximately forty members. Services were conducted in a residence on College Street until a house of worship could be erected. The Annual Conference was held in this city in 1828, in the upper room of the Rutherford County Court House. It was attended by a large group of Cherokee Indians and it was here that JOHN BERRY

McFERRIN delivered his first missionary address. This Conference was also attended by Bishop JOSHUA SOULE.

Around 1840, a building sixty feet long and thirty feet wide was erected on Maple Street—later the site of Soule Female College. To the south of this building was the Methodist graveyard. Negroes worshipped in the church each Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. When a new church was erected in 1843 just across the street from the present structure, a gallery in the southern end was given over to Negroes for preaching and Sunday school. They continued to worship there until 1862 when the Northern Methodists assisted the Negroes in building a church on East College, known as Key Memorial Chapel.

When the Union army came to Murfreesboro in 1863, they took over the church for a hospital until July 1865, when it was turned over to the church officials by order of President Andrew Johnson. The third church building was begun in 1886 and dedicated three years later. In 1910 the church school building and the parish house were built next to the church. The parish house was razed in 1954 in order that a new educational building could be constructed. It became apparent in 1960 that additional space for the church school was imperative. The original building, erected in 1910, was razed and a three-story structure containing class rooms, nursery, scout, choir and additional office rooms built for these needs.

The Christian influence of this great church has touched the lives of nine generations of Methodism in Murfreesboro. Through its pulpit have passed Bishop ROBERT PAINE, its first minister; John B. McFerrin, leader of the Southern Church during the post-Civil War years, and Bishop PAUL B. KERN. It stands as a memorial to those who, with dedication and foresight, devoted themselves to the great work of Methodism, and as an inspiration and challenge to those still to come.

MURLIN, JOHN (1722-1799), British itinerant, emotional preacher called "the weeping prophet," was born at St. Stephen Branwell, Cornwall, in August 1722. He prospered in business; and when converted in 1749, under JOHN DOWNES' ministry, he reluctantly began preaching. In 1754 WESLEY called him out, placing him frequently in BRISTOL and LONDON.

A man of fortune, apt to dictate his station, he was, Wesley acknowledged, gifted and successful. Murlin was involved in the sacramental controversy at Norwich and the pulpit-angel trouble at Halifax. He wrote Sacred Hymns (1781) and Elegy on Fletcher (1788). He died in retirement, at High Wycombe, on July 7, 1799, and shares Wesley's tomb.

G. LAWTON

MURLIN, LEMUEL HERBERT (1861-1935), American minister, educator, university president, was born in the village of Mendon, Ohio. His father was an itinerant Methodist minister. Being a supply pastor, the father's salary was so small that it became necessary for the son, even while in public school, to get part-time work to augment the family income. During vacation time, he "rode the circuit" with his father.

Lemuel entered DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, paying his way with money earned as a supply at nearby churches. He was graduated from DePauw in 1891, when he married Ermina Fallas. He served as a Methodist pastor for three years, and then was elected president of BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1894, which position he held until 1911, when he was elected president of BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He carried the burden of his office through the First World War.

Failing health and the advice of his doctor caused Murlin to tender his resignation to the Trustees of Boston University in 1925. On invitation from DePauw, he accepted its presidency, but retired at the end of three years. Then he and Mrs. Murlin traveled abroad until 1935, the year he died.

MURPHY, MRS. ANN (1731-1814), pioneer American church leader, moved from near Ellicott's Mill, Md., the probable place of her birth, and settled in 1780 near UNIONTOWN, Pa. She "was possessed of some means." Her home was the regular stopping place of the early Methodist itinerants. During eighteen of the twenty times Bishop ASBURY passed through the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE territory, he stopped at or preached at Uniontown. ROBERT AYRES on the REDSTONE CIRCUIT, 1786-87, stopped at Ann's home on each round of the circuit. The preachers at the Quarterly Conference held in Uniontown in 1787 were lodged at "Widow Murphy's," as also at the first group conference, 1788, and probably in 1790 and 1792.

Jacob Murphy, son of Ann, continued the devotion of his noble mother. He was a trustee of the first Uniontown church and served as a local preacher. Asbury preached in Murphy's barn and ordained William Page as elder and Andrew Hemphill as deacon in Murphy's home in 1804. Jacob married the daughter of Colonel Isaac Meason.

As a personality, Ann Murphy was the most influential among the founders of Methodism in Uniontown, a stronghold of pioneer and present-day Methodism.

MURPHY, JOHN (1740-1813), a Presbyterian layman in Salem County, N. J., who later became active in Methodist work in southern NEW JERSEY. Murphy, a resident of Friendship, Salem County, was an Elder of the Pittsgrove Presbyterian Church at Daretown in Salem County. Being attracted by the spirit of the Methodist pioneer preacher, ABRAHAM WHITWORTH, Murphy invited him to hold meetings at his house. It was here that Whitworth preached the Word which ultimately became the means of BENJAMIN ABBOTT'S conversion.

Murphy's interest in Methodism grew until at his house was formed possibly the first Methodist Society south of Burlington (Friendship, 1773). Later it was Murphy who gave generously to build the first place of worship at Friendship. This was known as the Murphy Meeting House. In it were conducted at least three far-reaching revivals of religion which did much to establish Methodism in southern New Jersey.

Both Methodist churches in Salem have their roots in the Murphy Meeting House. Murphy was also one of the founders of the M. E. Church in Salem in 1784, and is spoken of as a founder of Methodism in Fairton and Bridgeton, N. J. Affectionately known as "Father Murphy" and as "the venerable" John Murphy, his befriending of the Methodists aided their cause strategically in an hour when their enemies were numerous and determined.

He died in 1813 and was buried in the cemetery of First Methodist Church, Bridgeton, N. J.

MURRAH, WILLIAM BELTON (1851-1925), bishop, was born in Pickensville, Ala., in May 1851. He was educated at Southern University, CENTENARY COLLEGE and WOFFORD COLLEGE. He joined the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, in 1876, and served churches in Oxford, Winona and Aberdeen. He was vice president of Whitworth College, Brookhaven, Miss., for four years, and then became the first president of MILLSAPS COLLEGE at JACKSON, Miss., chartered in 1890, with the first session in 1892. Murrah, Bishop CHARLES B. GALLOWAY and Major REUBEN W. MILLSAPS are usually credited as the founders of this college.

Murrah was elected bishop of the M. E. Church, South, by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1910. His publications include addresses, lectures, sermons, and contributions to religious periodicals. A large, impressive-looking man, W. B. Murrah exerted quite an influence in church and educational circles. A large framed likeness of Bishop Murrah, with the other Alabamans who have been elected bishop, is kept in the episcopal office at Birmingham, Ala. Bishop Murrah died on March 5, 1925.

MURRAY, GRACE (1718-1803), who became a Methodist at the outset of the revival, served as a band leader at the Foundery, LONDON, and after the death of her husband, Alexander Murray, returned to her mother's home in Newcastle upon Tyne. Here she was appointed housekeeper of Wesley's Orphan House headquarters, and in that capacity nursed JOHN BENNET through a lengthy illness in 1746, after which they corresponded affectionately with each other. In August 1748, JOHN WESLEY also fell ill in Newcastle and was nursed by Grace Murray. He proposed marriage to her, took her south on a journey with him, and then left her at Chinley in the care of Bennet, who also wooed her, being assured that she had no commitment to Wesley. During the spring and early summer of 1749 she travelled with Wesley in IRELAND, and in DUBLIN they were betrothed by a contract de praesenti. After their return to England in July a jealous spasm propelled her once more to Bennet. Wesley decided to let John Bennet have her, though he had "a piercing conviction of his irreparable loss." Grace protested, however, that she loved Wesley "a thousand times better than [she] ever loved John Bennet." She pressed Wesley for a public ceremony, but after a renewal of the contract de praesenti, this time in the presence of a

Meantime Wesley wrote to his brother CHARLES about Grace. Charles, apparently not realizing the depth of John's commitment, persuaded Grace and John Bennet to marry, only too late to discover his misunderstanding of the situation. John Wesley forgave Bennet and Grace, but two years later Bennet left Methodism, and then became the pastor of a Calvinistic church at Warburton. Grace Bennet continued conducting weekly meetings for prayer and fellowship long after the death of her husband. Only once more, in their old age, did John Wesley and Grace Bennet meet. She died in her eighty-fifth year, and her biography was written by one of her five sons.

MURRAY, JOHN JACKSON (1824-1905), American minister and president of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. CHURCH in 1867, was born in Hagerstown, Md., on May 8, 1824. He was converted in 1839 and was licensed to preach on Dec. 25, 1841, and began itinerating on Queen Anne's Circuit in the MARYLAND CONFERENCE in April 1842. He filled all the prominent appointments in the Maryland Conference, including St. John's Church, BALTIMORE, and in 1873 was loaned to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE. He served on the committee chosen to compile the hymnbook of the M. P. Church published in 1859. He and his brother, J. T. Murray, conducted The Methodist Protestant editorially in 1870. While he was pastor of the M. P. Church in PHILADELPHIA, he organized a church in NEWARK, N. J., in 1859, with thirty-seven members. In 1860 he was appointed to serve as the first regular pastor of this church, a position he held for three years. He served as president of the General Conference of 1867 which met in Montgomery, Ala. In 1872 he was fraternal messenger to the General Conferences in 1858, 1862, 1866, 1870, 1874, and a delegate to the historic uniting convention of May 1877. At the 1866 General Conference, he offered a resolution which led to reunion with the northern branch of the church which had split over slavery in 1858. The resolution was passed by the conference.

Murray received the M.D. degree from Washington University in Baltimore in March 1850.

MURRAY, THOMAS HOLT (1845-1916), American lawyer, orator and distinguished Methodist layman, was born April 5, 1845 in Girard Township, Clearfield Co., Pa. He was educated at the common schools near his farm home and at Williamsport Dickinson Seminary, from which he graduated in 1867. As a law student at Dickinson Seminary, he continued his education for this profession in a local law office and was admitted to the bar of Clearfield County in 1869. He soon became not only "the unquestioned leader of this bar," but the most sought after trial lawyer of western PENNSYLVANIA.

His maternal great grandfather, Philip Antes, had given the land for the first Methodist church in Clearfield County, and Thomas H. Murray became the most distinguished layman of his day in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. He was elected to eight successive GENERAL CONFERENCES of that church (1888-1916), and to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE of 1901. One of the most eloquent and influential laymen on the floor of the General Conference, he was designated by that body to be its spokesman in replying to the welcome to Lincoln, Neb. in 1892, given by the governor of the state and the mayor of the city. From 1896 to 1906 he was a member of the Joint Commission on the Federation of Methodism. He also served as a member of the Committee on Judiciary of the General Conference and of the Book Committee for a time.

Three volumes of his most notable addresses on various occasions, both civic and ecclesiastical, have been published. He was a member of Trinity M. E. Church, Clearfield, Pa. He died Dec. 8, 1916 at Clearfield.

MURRELLS INLET, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., Belin Memorial Church, started in 1836 as Oatland Methodist Church, was built a few miles from its present site by JAMES LYNCH BELIN, who preached there about twenty-three years. He was at that time the "missionary" in charge of the Waccamaw Mission.

In 1925 the building at Oatland was torn down, taken to Murrells Inlet and rebuilt to the exact specifications with the same lumber, and given the name of Belin Memorial Methodist Church. It was rebuilt on the same property as the old "Cedar Hill" Mission House which was used as a home for James Belin for twenty-three years, and then by other ministers until 1960. At that time "Cedar Hill" was made into the educational building of the church and a new parsonage was built.

THOMAS KEMMERLIN

MUSGRAVE, WALTER EMMETT (1880-1950), American United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution) bishop, was born near Stockport, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1880. He had the advantage of a common school education, and received the equivalent of high school education by tutorial method. He made theology and church history his specialty. In 1928 he was awarded the D.D. from Huntington College.

He was married to Anna Yarnell and was the father of two sons and one daughter. One son died in infancy and the other, Wilford P. Musgrave, was dean of Huntington College for a number of years.

He was converted at the age of nineteen in a M.P. CHURCH, and soon received an exhorter's license. Since his early church experience had been United Brethren, he returned to that and joined the Scioto Conference. He served fourteen years as pastor and five years as presiding elder. During his ministry he was especially interested in young people, and organized CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR societies in his churches. He was a successful evangelist and conducted a number of campaigns in the United States east of the Mississippi as well as in Ontario, CANADA. He was also interested in the temperance cause and was associated with Daniel A. Poling in this work in Ohio.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1921 elected Musgrave as executive secretary of the Otterbein Forward Movement, and he moved to Huntington, Ind., where he resided the remainder of his life. He was elected bishop in 1925 and served that office for twenty-four years. While bishop he was president of many general church boards, but was especially interested in education and missions. He was an effective fund raiser and assisted the financial program of Huntington College many times. He was commissioned by the 1945 General Conference to write a history of the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST (OLD CONSTITUTION). A preliminary draft was mimeographed under the title, "The Church of the United Brethren in Christ: Its Teachings and Progress." He was devoting time to research for the amplification of the history at the time of his death, May 6, 1950, at Huntington, Ind. The memorial service was held at College Park Church and burial at Pilgrim's Rest Cemetery, Huntington.

MUSIC in American Methodism. The study of Methodist music before 1850 is primarily the study of hymns, particularly Wesleyan hymns. One writer stated in 1856 that even hymn singing among Methodists "... existed only in its rude and uncultivated state" (Willis, p. 41). Another commented in 1865 that Methodists have been attractive singers but poor musicians, fearful of "scientific music" and convinced that all instruments were a liability in the church.

Early Methodists frowned upon the use of anything other than the human voice. The playing of organs was a vanity, and the violin an incarnation of the devil. However, during the 1840's writers were advocating the use of the organ. By 1855 the organ was gaining considerable acceptance and in 1875 was in general use in larger churches. Smaller churches were content with small reed organs or melodeons. In a few instances other instruments, including the cornet, were used in special situations. The prominence of instruments is shown by the publication of numerous favorable and unfavorable comments about their use.

Methodist choirs came into existence when the better singers began sitting together, perhaps for their own enjoyment, and, incidentally, to lead the congregation. In 1850 a number of city churches in the east had regular choirs for which special seating was provided. An 1856 floor plan for a Methodist church in PITTSBURGH included a special area for choir members.

The quality of congregational music, according to writers of the time, was generally poor except in the occasional church that had competent leadership. The M. E. Church recognized the problem and appointed an editor to take charge of the music department of the Methodist BOOK CONCERN during the late 1860's. Hymnal introductions and numerous articles mentioned the need for increased emphasis upon the congregation and less upon the choir. SUNDAY SCHOOL singing during the last quarter of the century was said to be particularly poor and usually unrelated to the worship service.

Competition between choirs and congregations developed early. Complaints about professionalism in church music appeared in publications of the late fifties. There were those who believed that professional singers and organists belonged only on the stage and never in church. An organization called the Associated Choirs of New York prepared an excellent evaluation of the place of musicians and the use of music in worship. All phases of vocal and instrumental music in the church and Sunday school were included in the study. Activities of the Association were discussed by the 1864 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and a committee was appointed to work with the musicians.

By 1875 almost all Methodist churches of any size had choirs of sorts. The "quartette choir" had also made its appearance even in small churches and was attaining considerable prominence. The M. P. CHURCH gave attention to the use of choirs in its hymnal of 1892 (a republication with little change of a private collection first published in 1872). A large part of the long Introduction is entitled "Choir and Congregational Singing." Mention is made of methods, materials and procedures for organists and choirs, including children's choirs. The mechanics of worship are carefully described.

During the last half of the century organ builders concentrated upon producing an orchestral rather than a church instrument. Organists were accused of being concerned with developing concert virtuosity while neglecting the basic purpose of their playing—leading the congregation in worship. Considerable antagonism developed between organists and ministers as a result.

The American Guild of Organists was established in 1896, partially for the purpose of breaking down this antagonism. Occasional articles in Methodist and other church publications discussed the proper use of the organ in worship but the situation showed little change until well into the twentieth century.

Prior to 1850, the few choirs in existence had one responsibility—to lead the rest of the congregation in hymn singing. Choir "specials" were a gradual development, but by 1875 the original purpose of the choir seemed to have been lost since little attention was being given to the singing of hymns. Around 1900 certain congregations were asked to participate "silently" in the worship service in order that nothing should detract from the singing of the choirs.

Between 1875 and 1920 choirs changed very little. Many churches had only a mixed quartet, often well paid, while others had both quartet and choir. The "perfect" choral composition of the period included a solo for each member of the quartet and several "choruses" which could be sung by the quartet or by the supporting choir if one were maintained. (Only recently has the paid quartet within the choir ceased to exist to a significant degree.) No great concern was shown by churchmen for the development of effective music in the church and Sunday school. Some excitement was engendered by the publication of the new joint Methodist hymnal in 1905, but this interest was of brief duration. Writers occasionally discussed the place of the choir and often criticized the concertizing of organists, the operatic performances of soloists, and the annoying brilliance of choral groups in general.

The situation remained stagnant until several incidents of great importance occurred in the early 1920's: (1) series of three conferences on church music were held, beginning in 1921 at Rushville, Ind.; (2) the Methodist Book Concern published the lectures presented at these conferences (1923); (3) numerous thought-provoking articles on Methodist music appeared in church magazines; (4) consideration was given to the concept of a Ministry of music; (5) a Methodist Commission on Music was appointed (1924); (6) a highly significant book on Methodist music and worship was published (1924), expressing many concepts not generally accepted or applied for another thirty years.

By 1925 all but the very smallest Methodist churches had some sort of choir and an organ or piano. Some had Sunday school orchestras. The quality of music ranged from excellent to very poor. Congregational music was frequently neither good nor meaningful. Unfortunately, organ construction was entering a period when that majestic instrument became more suited for the funeral parlor than for the church. A few choirs wore robes, and some participated in services that were true worship experiences.

The twenties were a time of great activity. Ministers and musicians examined attitudes, procedures, methods and materials. The place of music in worship and education was debated, often with considerable heat. Attempts were made to develop an understanding of the responsibilities of all who were concerned with and affected by the music of the church. Conscientious church musicians showed concern for the poor state of congregational music and were eventually to provide much of the leadership that brought all church music into better balance. The organist/pianist was increasingly accepted as the person most able to improve hymn singing. The emergence of great college and university choral organizations inspired the church choir to seek its place as leader, teacher, and source of encouragement for better congregational singing.

The most significant result of this time of enthusiasm was The Methodist Hymnal of 1935, a cooperative venture of the three principal branches of Methodism. Church union which followed is believed by many to have been strongly affected by the joint publication of a successful hymnal.

Another important development was the growth of interest in children's and youth choirs and in the total program of music in Christian education. The Sunday school music of past generations was under careful scrutiny, but it was difficult to replace.

The movement for better church music was slowed by the depression and brought to a halt by World War II. One war-time development—the widespread use of the electronic organ—has had a strong and lasting effect. During the early fifties many varieties of electronic keyboard instruments appeared and some have made a significant place for themselves, especially in medium-sized and smaller churches.

Despite the thousands of electronic instruments sold during the last twenty years, pipe organ builders are unable today to keep up with the demand for their products. There has been a return to the construction of an organ that combines the best features of the preceding three hundred years of organ building. Organists, too, have a better understanding of their opportunities and responsibilities in the church and Sunday school.

Present trends in Methodist music are a direct outgrowth of action taken in 1952 by the General Conference at which the BOARD OF EDUCATION of The Methodist Church was instructed to examine the music of the church and to take any action needed to promote the better use of music in worship and Christian education. To implement these instructions a planning conference of church musicians, ministers and educators was held at Estes Park in 1955. The NATIONAL FELLOWSHIP OF METHODIST MUSICIANS (NaFOMM) grew out of the conference and was chartered the following year at Williams Bay, Wis.

NaFOMM had much to do with the progress made by Methodist music toward attaining its proper place in the church. (For an account of this organization see it under MUSICIANS, FELLOWSHIP OF UNITED METHODIST. The Discipline of 1968 directs that the Division of the Local Church under the Board of Education shall cooperate with this organization [Paragraph 1065.4].)

Music Ministry, a monthly magazine, was first published by the Editorial Division in 1960; the Publishing House was a full-time church music manager, and has published many books on music in worship and Christian education. Biennial convocations are held by NaFOMM and, in alternate years, by each jurisdiction; dozens of local, district and conference workshops on church music are held each year. A completely new approach is being made to music in the church school with emphasis upon excellent audio-visual materials. Theological seminaries are doing a more effective job of training ministers in the use of music. The revised Methodist Hymnal (1966) is adding its great influence.

MUSIC, British Methodist. The early Methodists in England inherited the tradition of metrical psalms which had dominated seventeenth century worship, but the varied meters adopted by CHARLES WESLEY demanded tunes outside the conventional long and common meters. JOHN WESLEY's first tune book, The Foundery Collection (1742), contained tunes of several types: Psalm tunes, German chorales (which he had learned from the Moravians), adaptations from popular melodies, and a few tunes specially written. Hymn singing became characteristic of Methodist worship, and was so effective as to arouse the envy of Anglicans.

At first the singing was unaccompanied, though occasionally the bass was reinforced by a bass viol. Later, orchestras became common, sometimes to the annoyance of the preachers. Anthems were popular, especially Edward Harwood's "Vital Spark," of which John Wesley spoke with admiration. Late in the century hymn singing became overornamented, with graces, trills, passing notes, repeats, and choruses. Against this practice John Wesley protested, but with little effect.

Organ music was introduced much later, new installations being forbidden by CONFERENCE until 1820. The split in English Methodism through the introduction of a large organ in Brunswick Chapel, LEEDS, was more a matter of disputed authority than of musical propriety. There was no organ in Wesley's chapel on City Road, LONDON, until the 1880's; for a long time there, as still in the Methodist Conference, the singing was led by a precentor.

The Anglican chant was never widely used in Methodism, except in the Canticles. There was, however, a revival in its use, and the influence of the Methodist Church Music Society encouraged the adoption of speech rhythm. Hymns, however, four or five in each service, have remained the staple diet of British Methodist worship; though anthems, and choral works at special seasons, are frequently given, sometimes by combined choirs (see HYMNODY).

MUSIC SOCIETY, METHODIST CHURCH (British), arose from a meeting of British Methodist musicians and ministers in January 1934, to explore the new Methodist Hymn Book of December, 1933. Since then the society, formed in 1935, has widened its purview "to foster and develop all the musical resources of Methodism for Public Worship and Evangelism." It reports to Conference, and holds an Annual Conference and local conferences and supports local Festivals of Praise.

MUSICIANS, FELLOWSHIP OF UNITED METHODIST (known until August, 1969 as the National Fellowship of Methodist Musicians—NaFOMM), is an organization sponsored by the Division of the Local Church, General Board of Education of The United Methodist Church. Its membership is open to all persons who are working through music in the church.

This organization began in 1955 with an invitation to Methodist musicians to come together to discuss how The Methodist Church could better communicate the role of music in Christian education. Walter Towner gave leadership here and the idea of a fellowship was born. There were two significant ideas: to have a national Methodist music publication; and to set up standards for proper certification. NaFOMM, as it was at first called, was organized on July 13, 1956 at Williams Bay, Wis., with 110 persons signing its constitution. Walter Towner served as interim executive secretary until Bliss Wiant was appointed on May 1, 1957. Four years later, Wiant retired and Cecil E. Lapo, who had been the first president of NaFOMM, became its executive secretary. The organization presently has over 3,000 members.

Its objectives and goals may be stated as follows:

To make more positive the role of music in Christian nurture, worship and witness; to create among church musicians a fellowship of service to the church; to stress the importance of each Christian musician being a "churchman"; to encourage the composition of new music; to encourage and counsel educational institutions, particularly the seminaries, to plan greater emphasis on the training in, and appreciation of, great church music; to assist students interested in the ministry of music to become educated for full time Christian service in this field; to cooperate with Annual Conference Boards of Education, Commissions on Worship and other similar groups in establishing workshops, institutes, conferences and study courses.

Publications: FOUMM News Notes is published bi-monthly and there is extensive cooperation with Music Ministry, the music magazine of the Editorial Division of the General Board of Education. Periodic pamphlets appear aimed at informative help for the local church in the field of vocational guidance and use of The Methodist Hymnal.

NaFOMM had a representative on the Methodist

Hymnal Commission during the 1960-64 quadrennium, and enjoyed reciprocal representation on the General Commission on Worship. All bishops of The United Methodist Church are members of the Fellowship. Particular guidance in the formative years was given by Bishop EARL LEDDEN. The Fellowship is governed by an Executive Council consisting of current officers, and there are representatives from each JURISDICTION of The United Methodist Church, as well as consultative members including the editor of Music Ministry. The organization meets biennially for educational exchange, fellowship and enrichment of ideas.

MUSKEGON, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., Central Church, is a strong church in the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. The first organized Protestant society in Muskegon became in time the present Central Church. In 1843, six years after the first sawmill was built on Muskegon Lake, a Protestant religious service was held in the Martin Ryerson boarding house with a "large" attendance and a collection of $7.50. A flourishing Methodist group at White Lake then began early to include Muskegon as a mission station. By 1855 regular services were being held in the public school house. The White River circuit was organized in September 1855, with L. M. Bennett in charge. Bennett came to preach in Muskegon every two or four weeks, walking along the shore of Lake Michigan from his White Lake home. Morning preaching at the school house was followed by afternoon services at the new lighthouse at the entrance to Muskegon Harbor.

In November 1856, the church was formally organized as a member of the Michigan Conference and John M. Pratt was named first resident minister. When the school house was no longer available for services a drive was initiated early in 1857 to raise funds for a church building. To this the community responded with gifts of money, labor and material. Dedication was held in June 1859.

The Civil War years were years of crisis for Muskegon's Methodists. The membership dropped to thirteen persons. For twenty-eight years the first structure served well the church and community. It was replaced in 1888. In December 1923, a move was designed to seek a location some distance from the center of the city, property was purchased, and a new building started under the leadership of Raymond Johns. On March 16, 1930 the new sanctuary was ready for use. The present edifice is of Gothic style and is built of Indiana limestone.

Central Methodist has sponsored the other Methodist churches in the community. One pastor, D. STANLEY COORS, was elevated to the episcopacy. At present Central has a membership of 1,700 and serves the community well from its mid-town location.

MUSKINGUM CONFERENCE. (See OHIO CONFERENCE (MP).)

MUSKOGEE, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. First Church had its beginning when Sam Checote, principal chief of the Creek Indian tribe and presiding elder of the Methodist INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, in 1877 secured land from his tribe to give to the conference on which to build a church in the village of Muskogee (population 400). The Mission Board at NASHVILLE (MES) and the people (partly in work) gave $500 each. Young Theodore F. Brewer, teaching in the Asbury Training School at Eu-aula, was appointed the first pastor in 1878 and remained until 1886. He came over to preach once a month until a parsonage was built in Muskogee, when he moved in.

Theodore F. Brewer organized the church in 1878 and built the original "Rock Church" the same year. Immediately after the church was organized, a Sunday school was started. (This school was destined to be served as Sunday school superintendent by A. E. Bonnell for thirty-five years.) Brewer also established a school, Harrell Institute, which met in the church until it grew so large that it had to build its own building.

In 1903 the church was destroyed by fire and the bishop ordered the church divided (money and property). Those living east of the "Katy" railroad were to form one congregation, and those living west of it another congregation. First Church acquired land six blocks east of the Rock Church, and this became the location of present First Church.

The second building was erected in 1904 under M. L. Butler, pastor, and was called First M.E. Church, South. In 1950 a new educational building was erected, Finis Crutchfield being pastor. Later, in 1958, D. Wesley Doak, pastor, led in the construction of the present sanctuary at a cost of about $300,000. Presently the church plans to build another educational unit, estimated to cost $200,000. Jack S. Wilkes, pastor, 1950-54, was elected president of OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, which he served from 1957-63.

First Church is the "Mother of Methodism in Muskogee." St. Paul Church with 2,473 members, grew out of First Church. The other four churches of the community were helped by First Church. Three laymen have served the general Church: H. E. Newton on the Board of Missions for some thirty years; Jim Egan, the Board of Education; and R. B. Lazenby, the Board of Evangelism.

During First Church's ninety years of history more than thirty young men and women have entered the ministry and gone to mission fields. In 1970 First Church had property valued at $872,150 and 2,348 members.

The story of First Church and its relation to the Indians, other city churches, and education, together with recruiting more than thirty persons for the ministry and mission field, and the services of many distinguished laymen, provides a remarkable and relevant account of Methodist advance.

St. Paul Church was organized in 1903. It moved into its first permanent home, a structure at Seventh and Boston, in 1906. The work prospered and St. Paul's became one of the leading churches in the Conference.

In 1929 fire destroyed the entire building. The congregation was undecided whether to rebuild on the same location or move farther west. When two lots at the corner of 23rd and Okmulgee were donated, the congregation agreed to build there. A beautiful and adequate building was erected in 1930. As the west side of Muskogee developed, St. Paul grew also.

In 1960 the Rowsey Memorial Chapel was built at the other end of the block. All the residential property on this large block was purchased. In 1962 an educational unit was built, uniting the original building and the chapel. The entire area was cleared to provide adequate parking. Today St. Paul's has one of the commanding church properties in OKLAHOMA. Membership presently (1970) stands at 2,473 and with property valued at $1,316,894, the church considers itself challenged to carry on a well-rounded program of activities.

MUTO, TAKESHI (1893-), Japanese educator, pastor, and church leader, received his early education in Aomori Prefecture in northern JAPAN, where he was baptized at the age of ten in a Methodist church. After graduation from the Theological Department of AOYAMA GAKUIN in TOKYO, he did three years of study in the Tokyo Imperial University, specializing in ethics. This was followed by a year at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in the United States, where he majored in philosophy and received an M.A. degree in 1923. From 1924 to 1936 he was teaching at his alma mater, Aoyama Gakuin. He began preaching in 1934, and in 1936 became pastor of Chuo Kaido (Central Methodist Church) in Tokyo. He has held this pastorate ever since except for a period of about four years (1942-1946) when he was president of Kwassui Girls College, a Methodist school in Nagasaki. In 1954 he was elected Moderator of the United Church of Christ in Japan (the church into which the Japan Methodist Church had merged in 1941). After his first two-year term, he was reelected for a second term. While Moderator he represented the Japanese Church at the Methodist GENERAL CONFERENCE in MINNEAPOLIS in 1956. In 1959 he was elected Chairman of the National Christian Council of Japan.

MUTUAL RIGHTS was a publication (1824-1834) with the Methodist Protestant Reformers. (See METHODIST PROTESTANT RECORDER.)

MUTTAYYA and MUNAYYA (dates uncertain), were pioneer converts in the Bidar District of the SOUTH INDIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. They were baptized by Joseph Henry Garden on January 1, 1892. Muttayya was a retired soldier and pensioner. He had worked under William Marrett, an engineer and a local preacher of the English church in HYDERABAD. By caste Muttayya was a Madiga. He and his entire family developed Christian faith and earnestly desired to be recognized as Christians and admitted to fellowship. Consultations between British and American Methodist missionaries led to an agreement that the Americans would work in Bidar and the adjoining territory in which this family lived. Munayya was a grandson of Muttayya and fully shared the old man's eagerness for Christian fellowship.

These men guided Garden and others to groups of their relatives, and many of them were converted. This launched a revival that has occasionally slowed but has never stopped. These two were no less responsible than the ordained ministers for the beginning of the strong church in Bidar District.

MUZOREWA, ABEL TENDEKAYI (1925-), bishop of The United Methodist Church in the RHODESIA Area, was born on April 14, 1925, at Old Umtali Methodist Centre in Rhodesia, the son of Philemon Hadi and Hilda (Munangatire) Muzorewa. He studied at the Old Umtali Methodist Centre, 1950-52, and then came to America where he received an A.B. degree from CENTRAL COLLEGE in Fayette, Mo., in 1962. He was given the M.A. by SCARRITT COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn., in 1963. On Aug. 11, 1951, he married Maggie Chigodora, and their children are Blessing Tendekayi, Philemon Dairayi, Wesley Tanyaradzwa, Scarriter Charles Chido. He taught in primary schools, 1944-47, and was a lay preacher, 1948-59. He was received on trial in the Rhodesia Conference in 1953, and into full connection with his elder's ordination in 1955. He was associate conference evangelist, 1952-55, and then became the pastor of the Chiduku North Circuit in Rhodesia, 1955-58. He was pastor of the Old Umtali Methodist Centre, Umtali, 1963-64, and then became the conference director of youth work at Umtali, 1965. He was in 1966 the youth secretary of the Student Movement and the traveling secretary of the Christian Council of Rhodesia.

At the African Central Conference of The United Methodist Church held Aug. 24-31, 1968, at Gaberones, Botswana, Abel Muzorewa was elected a bishop to succeed

Bishop RALPH DODGE, who at that Conference announced his retirement. Bishop Muzorewa at forty-three years of age became one of the youngest Methodist bishops ever to be elected. His election came on the sixth ballot and he was assigned to the Rhodesia Area (presently comprising 28,661 members and 181 churches).

MYLES, WILLIAM (1756-1828), was an Irish Methodist, born in Limerick, on July 9, 1756. He heard WESLEY preach there in 1773. He itinerated in IRELAND, 1777-82, at his own expense, and became the first Irishman to be received into full connexion (1782). Thereafter his circuits were almost entirely English until 1823-24, when he became a supernumerary.

Myles was a self-taught linguist. As a student of theological controversy, he was the first historian proper of Methodism, his Chronological History appearing in 1798 (enlarged in 1803 and 1812). He published sermons, tracts, and an account of WILLIAM GRIMSHAW. He was named in Wesley's Deed of Declaration and in the deed for Bath. William Myles died at Liverpool on April 17, 1828.

NAGBE, STEPHEN TROWEN, SR. (1933-1973), resident bishop of the Monrovia Area of The United Methodist Church, was born on Oct. 23, 1933, in Betu, Sinoe County, LIBERIA.

He received his early schooling in GHANA, returning to Liberia to complete elementary school in Barclayville. He attended the COLLEGE OF WEST AFRICA where he graduated in 1951. His undergraduate work was done at Cuttington College and Divinity School. In 1958 he was ordained elder by Bishop PRINCE A. TAYLOR, JR. That same year he married Melvena Morris and the Nagbes proceeded to the United States for further theological study.

He received the B.D. degree from GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL in ATLANTA in 1961 and returned to Liberia where he served in the pastorate until the summer of 1964. At that time he returned to the United States where he studied and received the S.T.M. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1965.

On Dec. 10, 1965, he was elected by the first session of the Liberia Central Conference as the Methodist bishop to be elected and consecrated in Liberia on December 12, Harper, Cape Palmas. He was the first native Liberian ever elected as bishop of The Methodist Church.

He died Feb. 2, 1973, in Liberia, after a six-month illness.

NAGORI, "TUAN" (Musa Manurung) (?-1927), Malaysian Christian leader, was born near the close of the nineteenth century. As a village chief, one of seven rajas, he lived in the heart of the jungles of Asahan, Sumatra, INDONESIA. The beginning and the establishment of the Christian faith here centered definitely around him. He it was who issued the "Macedonian Call" for Christian missionaries to enter this Perdembanan jungle area where no one could even read or write. His first encounter with Batak Christian evangelists in 1907 was characterized by disdain. He was haughty and conceited, being the son of the Raja of all that region. He turned away from animism and took up with a hybrid religion called "Permalim." He even added the use of opium to his other vices. He later on embraced Islam. However, in spite of himself, he had been impressed by the humility and patience of the Batak evangelists who had visited him.

Later on he made the long journey on foot to the shores of Lake Toba to visit the old "Grandfather" Lutheran missionary, Nommenson. He tried to persuade him to send a teacher to his people, but there was none to spare. In 1912 he learned about the American Methodist Mission in MALAYSIA through a relative of Lamsana L. Tobing, an ordained Methodist minister from the West Coast of Sumatra then serving on the island of Java. Lamsana on furlough visited the village. Eight years later, under the superintendency of Leonard Oechsli, Tobing was appointed in 1921 to Asahan. It was not until July 17, 1921, that the baptismal service of Tuan Nagori and family was arranged, even though Tuan Nagori had himself baptized his own mother before she died, there being no other professing Christian there to do so.

During the years that followed, even to the time of his death on Dec. 13, 1927, Tuan Nagori continued his personal witnessing. As the first resident Methodist missionary in Asahan from America, this writer walked hundreds of miles with Tuan Nagori visiting people and villages in the Asahan jungles. Always he was found to be like the Apostle Paul, speaking a word for his Lord wherever opportunity afforded. A son, Djaleb; a daughter, Soulima; and a nephew, Philemon Sirait, are missionaries in Sarawak; and a grandson, Hasaoetan, is preaching in Sumatra.

NALL, TORNEY OTTO, JR. (1900-), American editor and bishop, was born in Terre Haute, Ind., on May 23, 1900, the son of Torney Otto and Alta Mae (Stokes) Nall. While still a boy he moved with his family to St. Paul, Minn. He attended HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, receiving the A.B. degree in 1921, did graduate work at the University of Minnesota in 1921-22, and studied journalism at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, 1923-24. From GARRETT, he received the B.D. in 1925, and received the D.D. degree from Garrett and Hamline in 1936 and 1939 respectively. ADRIAN COLLEGE awarded him the Litt.D. in 1943, as did Union College, 1949, and AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, 1950, and ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY honored him with the LL.D. in 1951.

He was united in marriage to Frances Marie Mahaffie on Feb. 2, 1929, who has worked closely and efficiently with him in both his editorial and episcopal assignments.

During the first World War, Otto Nall served with the United States Army. His editorial career began with The Epworth Herald in 1922, and he wrote also for The Classmate and youth publications of several denominations. He became managing editor of The Christian Advocate in 1940. Methodist unification had then brought about the merger of seven regional Advocates into one official weekly, with Roy L. SMITH elected editor. Otto Nall, on the retirement of Roy Smith, became acting editor. He was elected by the Board of Publication to the editorship of The New Christian Advocate in 1946 when this publication became specifically a "trade paper" for ministers. He has continued as one of the columnists for Together, writing answers on "Your Faith and Your Church." He served as president of the Methodist Press Association from 1944-48, and as president of the Inter-denominational Associated Church Press from 1945 to 1947.

T. O. Nall was ordained in the ministry of the M. E. Church in the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE, 1924. He was elected a bishop at the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, Grand Rapids, Mich., in July 1960, and was assigned to the Minnesota Area where he served until 1968, when he was continued as an active bishop and assigned to the HONG KONG-TAIWAN Area.

Bishop Nall was chairman of the ASSOCIATION OF METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETIES (1964-68), which sponsored the Encyclopedia of World Methodism. In 1958 he made a trip into RUSSIA, studying the status of religion there. In 1962-63, he made a three-month study trip to INDIA, NEPAL, and PAKISTAN for the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS. He had a civilian assignment in Africa in 1966. He was a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, Oxford, England, 1951; that at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., in 1956; and in OSLO, Norway, 1961. He is a trustee of Hamline University and of Evanston Institute Ecumenical Studies.

Bishop Nall is the author of several books, including Youth's Work in the New World, 1936; New Occupation for Youth, 1938; Move On, Youth, 1940; Jobs for Today's Youth, 1941; Young Christians at Work, 1949; Making Good As Young Couples, 1953; The Bible When You Need It Most, 1957—a paperback in the popular Reflection Series. He was editor of Vital Religion, 1938; and of These Prophetic Voices, 1941. His present residence is in Clearwater, Fla.

NANCE, WALTER B. (1868-1964), American missionary to CHINA, was born at Cornersville, Marshall Co., Tenn., April 16, 1868, the son of James Washington and Mary Frances Amis Nance. He received his secondary education at Webb School, Bell Buckle, Tenn. He graduated with honors in arts and theology at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and later took graduate work at the University of Chicago. He was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1895 and was sent as a missionary to China in 1896. In 1898 he was joined by Florence Rush Heiser, a Vanderbilt graduate whom he married in Kobe, JAPAN.

He soon became involved in the organization of Soochow University, which was started in 1901. His early years in China were spent in the mastery of the Chinese language and classics, which led to his being recognized as pre-eminent among American students of the Chinese language. He was professor of ethics and philosophy in the University which he helped to found and was its president, 1922-27, when he resigned in favor of a Chinese president.

He was interned by the Japanese during World War II, repatriated in 1943 and later retired by the Board of Missions.

At the insistent demand of the university alumni, he was sent back to China in 1946 to rehabilitate the university devastated in the war, a task which was interrupted by the Communists who took over in 1949. From 1949 until his death at the age of ninety-six, he lived with his son in Oak Ridge, Tenn.

He was the author of Soochow University, published by United Board for Christian Colleges in China, 1956. In the 1920's he established a language school where newly arrived missionaries of all denominations were taught the dialect of East China. Hundreds learned the language through the phonetic system he pioneered.

His greatest contribution to the missionary enterprise was his conviction that if China was to be won for Christ, it would have to be through higher education with the melding of the best of classical oriental thought into modern Christian theology.

NANEZ, ALFREDO (1902-), American clergyman and educator, was born Feb. 28, 1902 in Monclova, Coahuila, MEXICO. He received the A.B. degree from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas (1930); B.D. degree from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY (1932); and was given a D.D. by Southwestern University (1950). He served as pastor, district superintendent (eleven years), and executive secretary of the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE Board of Education (twenty years) before assuming his present position as president of LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE, EL PASO, Texas, in 1966. He has edited a Spanish edition of The Methodist Hymnal and of the Methodist Ritual. He has served as a member of churchwide boards, including BOARD OF MISSIONS, 1934-38, and METHODIST COMMITTEE ON OVERSEAS RELIEF, 1956-68. He has been a delegate to general and jurisdictional conferences, a member of the Texas Methodist Foundation since 1960, and of the Board of Trustees of Southern Methodist University, 1960-68. He is married to the former Clotilde Falcon, and they have three children.

NANTUCKET ISLAND, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., has its antecedents in an eighteen-day preaching mission of JESSE LEE in April 1797. The following year Joseph Snelling, stationed in MARTHA'S VINEYARD, visited Nantucket and conducted open-air meetings on Mill Hill. On July 25, 1799, the first Methodist Society was organized by WILLIAM BEAUCHAMP. When the congregation's original building, completed on Fair Street in 1800, became inadequate, the present structure, with a seating capacity of 1,000, was erected in 1823.

With gable roof and six Ionic pillars under the portico added in 1840, the imposing edifice suggests the sturdy character of the nineteenth-century seafaring people who built it. The ceiling, supported by 12 x 12 timbers sixty feet long, the paneled balconies, and the historic Appelon pipe organ create within the structure a distinctive, early American atmosphere.

Two pastors of the Nantucket congregation, JOSHUA SOULE (1803) and ELIJAH HEDDING (1812), later became bishops. Two sessions (1820 and 1837) of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, and one session (1842) of the Providence Conference (later called the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE) were held here. An ordination service was held in this church on Sept. 18, 1966, by Bishop JAMES K. MATHEWS—the first such service on Nantucket Island for more than a hundred years.

NAPERVILLE, ILLINOIS, U.S.A., Community Church (First EUB Church) in 1962 celebrated 125 years of continuous existence. This began in 1837 but not until 1841 were the sturdy German pioneers at Naperville able to build a small church home for themselves. In 1858-59 they erected a substantial building on the corner of Franklin and Center Streets where the present church now stands.

There has always been a warm relationship between this church and NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE even before the union in 1910 of the College Chapel Church with this "Zion Church," as it was called for many years. The quality of the church's music became greatly enriched when a gifted music professor took over the direction of the church choir, composed almost entirely of college students. He also played the new pipe organ, the organ being an innovation in the church in 1912. The sanctuary soon began to be used as a concert hall by the college.

To this day the same collaboration continues and marks Community Church as outstanding in the field of music.

The personnel of the membership was also affected by the close association of these two organizations and that of the EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. There have always been many more students, professors, college and seminary presidents—and even more bishops—than are to be found in the usual congregation. Naturally the church has been a leader in the cultural life of the community.

Through the years of the depression and the second World War, and subsequent years, this church participated in countless projects of mercy. Carloads of food and clothing were packed and shipped under the personal supervision of the pastor and church leaders. From 1943-1948 the church raised a total of $11,628 for relief work overseas. PAUL WASHBURN, elected a bishop of The United Methodist Church at the Uniting Conference in 1968, was pastor of Naperville 1952-1964. The church's emphasis upon social concern and action has been increasingly sustained through the years.

Four sessions of the GENERAL CONFERENCE have been held in Naperville: 1859, 1871, 1927 and 1942. At each time some very important church policy was uppermost on the agenda. In 1942 it was the proposal for the union of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH. The church today manifests a consciousness of good heritage and hard labor, has a continually increasing enrollment of over 1,100, and expresses a dynamic dedication to social action and to faith and beauty in its worship services.

ELIZABETH WILEY

NASCIMENTO, NATANAEL INOCENCIO DO (1910-), a bishop of the Methodist Church in BRAZIL, was born on July 12, 1910, in Cordeiro, Minas Gerais, Brazil. He received his secondary education at the INSTITUTO GRANBERY (Juiz de Fora, Minas Gerais), the University of São Paulo, and the theological seminary then at Granbery.

He was ordained DEACON in 1938 and ELDER in 1940. He has served as pastor; as district superintendent for thirteen years; as professor for twelve years at the theological seminary in Rudge Ramos, SÃO PAULO, and as its Reitor (principal) for seven years. From 1950 to 1960, he was president of the General Board of Missions of the Methodist Church of Brazil. He was among the first to draw up a plan for ministers' pensions.

He married Eunice Patricio, and they had four daughters. He was elected bishop in July 1965, and his region comprised the states of Rio de Janeiro and Guanabara (the former Federal District). He retired at the General Conference in July 1970.

EULA K. LONG

NASH, GEORGE (1905-), Australian minister, and president of QUEENSLAND CONFERENCE, 1964. He has been superintendent of the Central Missions, BRISBANE, since 1952, during which time its activities have been considerably developed. He established a hospital for the chronic ill and inaugurated Methodism's only mission to urban-dwelling Aborigines. He was chairman of the Queensland Council of Churches, chairman of the Presbyterian and Methodist Schools Association, Chairman of the Billy Graham Crusade, and has been active in the leadership of many conference committees. He is widely known for his work in both church and community life. He served for five years as chaplain in the Royal Australian Air Force in the second World War in New Guinea, Britain, and the United States.

NASH, RICHARD "BEAU" (1674-?), was born at Carmarthen on Oct. 18, 1674, the son of a glass manufacturer. Having been sent down from Jesus College, OXFORD, for riotous behavior, he became a professional gambler and Master of Ceremonies at the fashionable health resort of Bath during the first half of the eighteenth century. He dressed splendidly, and drove around Bath in semi-royal state in a post-chaise drawn by six grey horses, honored with outriders, footmen, and French horns.

There was a celebrated confrontation between Nash and JOHN WESLEY when the latter preached at Bath on June 5, 1739. Wesley's Journal notes: "There was great expectation at Bath of what a noted man was to do to me there; and I was much entreated not to preach, because no one knew what might happen. By this I report I also gained a much larger audience, among whom were many of the rich and the great. I told them plainly the Scripture had concluded them all under sin—high and low, rich and poor, one with another. Many of them seemed to be a little surprised, and were sinking apace into seriousness, when their champion appeared, and, coming close to me, asked by what authority I did these things, I replied, 'By the authority of Jesus Christ, conveyed to me by the (now) Archbishop of Canterbury, when he laid hands upon me, and said, "Take thou authority to preach the gospel."' He said, 'This is contrary to Act of Parliament: this is a conventicle.' I answered, 'Sir, the conventicles mentioned in that Act (as the preamble shows) are seditious meetings; but this is not such; here is no shadow of sedition; therefore it is not contrary to that Act.' He replied, 'I say it is; and, beside, your preaching frightens people out of their wits.' 'Sir, did you ever hear me preach?' 'No.' 'How, then, can you judge of what you never heard?' 'Sir, by common report.' 'Common report is not enough. Give me leave, sir, to ask, Is not your name Nash?' 'My name is Nash.' 'Sir, I dare not judge of you by common report: I think it not enough to judge by.' Here he paused a while, and, having recovered himself, said, 'I desire to know what this people comes here for: on which one replied, 'Sir, leave him to me; let an old woman answer him. You, Mr. Nash, take care of your body; we take care of our souls: and for the food of our souls we come here.' He replied not a word, but walked away." (Journal, Vol. 2, pp. 211-213).

Though worsted in this verbal duel, Nash retained his dignity, and there is little doubt that his concern for law and order was genuine, for his code of Rules—applied as impartially as Wesley's—had long served to curb the boisterous society of Bath. "He enforced his rules with equal impartiality on the duchess or the farmer's wife and he made Bath an agreeable city to live in. He introduced music, turned dances into balls, abolished swords, riding boots and aprons, cleaned up the pump room, made special privileges for invalids, secured decency and good order, yet . . . preserved considerable freedom. Gambling and intrigue still flourished but discreetly and subject to convention." (J. H. Plumb, Men and Places, p. 120). G. M. Trevelyan's encomium might seem to place Nash in the same bracket as Wesley—"Nash did perhaps as much as any other person even in the Eighteenth Century to civilize the neglected manners of mankind" (English Social History, p. 316)—and no doubt rebellious bucks trembled at Nash's appearing as much as recalcitrant society stewards did at Wesley's.

JOHN NEWTON

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, U.S.A., sometimes called "The Capital of Southern Methodism," had several significant names. From an unrecorded date, it was known as "Salt Lick," near present-day Sulphur Dell ball park. Monsieur Charleville, a French trader and explorer from NEW ORLEANS in 1714, seems to have been the first white man to settle at Salt Lick. Therefore, Salt Lick was changed to "French Lick" in honor of the explorer. In 1769, Uriah Stone, Gasper Mansker, and Isaac Bledsoe, who were explorers and hunters from VIRGINIA, made French Lick their base of operation in Middle TENNESSEE. Jan. 1, 1780, James Robertson, seven whites and one Negro from Watauga settlement, arrived at French Lick. The other part of the settlers came by boats down the Tennessee, up the Ohio and up the Cumberland Rivers, arriving at French Lick, April 24, 1780. After the arrival of the Robertson and Donelson settlers, the name French Lick was changed to the "Bluffs." With the increase of population, the name Bluffs was changed to the "Cumberland Settlement," which name was kept until the Revolutionary War.

General Nash was killed in the Revolutionary War. Soon after the close of the war, the Cumberland Settlement was changed to Nashborough, in honor of General Nash. "Borough" being an English word and the Revolutionary War making British nomenclature unpopular, the Legislature of NORTH CAROLINA in 1784 changed the name Nashborough to Nashville. It is a city of many universities, colleges, private and professional schools, and is affectionately called the "Athens of the South."

The KENTUCKY Circuit (in the newly organized M.E. Church) was organized in 1786. After one year, 1787, the circuit was divided into the Kentucky and Cumberland Circuits. BENJAMIN OGDEN was appointed by Bishop ASBURY to the newly organized circuit. It included Middle and West Tennessee, Logan, Warren and Simpson Counties in southern Kentucky. The new pastor made Nashville his headquarters.

It is not known how many Methodist churches Benjamin Ogdén organized in his new circuit in 1787. Two churches are in operation today that are known to have been organized by him that year—McKendree on Church Street in Nashville, and Walkers Chapel on Walkers Creek four miles northwest of present day Goodlettsville, Tenn. The building that finally became McKendree in 1839, was erected on the public square in Nashville in 1790 or 1791. Bishop Asbury described this building upon his first visit to Nashville, Oct. 20, 1800, in company with Bishop WHATCOAT and the presiding elder, WILLIAM MCKENDREE, as follows: "Not less than a thousand people were in and out of the stone church, which if floored, ceiled and glazed, would be a grand house."

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, in 1854, recognized the strategic location of Nashville and located the first METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE of that Church in this rapidly growing city. The original location was on the northeast corner of the public square where it remained until 1906. The second Publishing House was erected at 810 Broadway in 1906. The third and present Publishing House was erected at 201 Eighth Avenue, South. First an enlarged printing plant had been placed there in 1924; a present office building was erected in 1957; and the present printing plant building greatly enlarged to its present size in 1961.

With the coming of unification in 1939, the BOARD OF EDUCATION, the Commission (now BOARD) OF EVANGELISM of The Methodist Church (and of course the Publishing House) were placed in or remained in Nashville. Subsequently, enlarged headquarters buildings were erected by the Board of Education and the Board of Evangelism. The TELEVISION, RADIO and FILM COMMISSION has also been established there. The chapel of The Upper Room, housed in the Board of Evangelism's building, is a show-place of the city. VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, SCARRITT COLLEGE, and MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE are among the educational institutions located in Nashville. The city has been the seat of an episcopal area and officially designated as such from 1940 to the present.

Nashville is not only a Methodist headquarters but the Southern Baptist Convention has its printing plant and publishing house there and many interests of other denominations are centered there.

The two Nashville districts (UMC) in 1970 reported 52,080 members and list 104 churches—all of which are in the city or very close by. The largest of these is Belmont, 2,621; West End, 2,512; McKendree, 2,201; with Calvary reporting 1,835, Belle Meade, 1,904; and Andrew Price Memorial, 1,991.

BELMONT CHURCH, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

Belmont Church, on Twenty-first Avenue, South, at Acklen Avenue, is on the southern edge of the University Center area involving George Peabody College, Scarritt College for Christian Workers, and Vanderbilt University and draws on the faculty and students of these schools for some of its leadership. Founded July 10, 1910, with thirty-four members, the church now has 2,621; and its facilities have expanded from a small frame structure to four commodious units extending a full block on Acklen Avenue. The sanctuary, completed in 1929 and seating approximately 1,200, is one of the largest and most impressive in the city. The other units, added 1951-55, contain a chapel seating 175, with reception facilities, offices, a library, classrooms, and a youth center which includes a gymnasium.

With the growth of Nashville many Belmont members now live in suburban areas around the southern rim of the city and drive many miles to participate in the full and varied program of a larger church. Special emphasis is given to missions, Christian education, and music. Belmont partially supports two missionary couples who went from its own membership into overseas service, and also the pastor of a mission church in the city; and individuals and groups give time as well as money to other local mission causes. Leadership from the faculties of the nearby colleges and from the general agencies of the church has made possible training for almost all of the teachers of children and youth in the church school, and for the director and teachers of the weekday kindergarten. The adult classes also enjoy professional participation. Regular programs for retired adults and for handicapped persons are among the weekday activities.

Youth and adult choirs provide music in the two regular Sunday morning worship services. Graded choirs for younger ages, beginning with the kindergarten, meet weekly and present several programs each year. Youth and adult handbell ringers play with the choirs on festival occasions, as do guest instrumental soloists. The forty-six-rank organ, installed in 1961, is one of the largest in the city and makes possible bringing guest organists of national reputation for concerts two or more times a year.

Pastors of Belmont have included BACHMAN G. HODGE (1935-39), later a bishop, John L. Ferguson (1939-50), John W. Rustin (1950-59), Faris F. Moore (1959-69), and C. Glenn Mingledorff (1969-).

McKendree Church, the historic downtown church and long-time citadel of Nashville Methodism, is a civic landmark of Nashville. It was begun as early as 1787 when a group of Nashville's pioneers banded together in the first Methodist society in the then new settlement. They erected a small church on what is now known as "the Public Square."

In 1812 the society moved to the site now occupied by the Hume Fogg High School, and erected a building which for some time served as a meeting place of the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE and also of the Tennessee Legislature.

The congregation in time decided that this church building was too far from the center of town, so in 1818 a new structure was erected on Spring Street where the Noel Hotel Garage now stands. Nashville's first church-related Sunday school was started at the Spring Street Church.

Later there came a need for more space and this necessitated the purchase of the present location, on Church Street, Nashville. A stately sanctuary was raised there in 1833 and was dedicated by—and named for—Bishop William McKendree in 1834. New buildings were erected on this property in 1879 and 1882, but both were destroyed by fire. The present McKendree Church was completed in 1910, and to it has been added through the years an educational plant. The church has recently constructed new educational facilities and a sub-building under its own famous lawn in the heart of downtown Nashville in order to get more space for its present day requirements.

Among the vicissitudes of life in McKendree have been the two fires and the seizure of the McKendree edifice by federal troops during the Civil War. As to the fires, of course the complete destruction of the buildings constituted crises in the lives of the congregations. The turmoil incident to the Civil War was a challenge to faith.

A list of pastors who have served this church reads like a Who's Who of Southern Methodism in the United States. Among them have been JACOB YOUNG, 1806-07;

ROBERT PAINE, 1824-25; A. L. P. GREEN, 1832-33; FOUNTAIN E. PITTS, 1833-34; J. B. McFERRIN, 1835-36; J. W. Hanner, 1839-40; D. C. KELLEY, 1869-72; R. K. HARGROVE, 1872-74; WALTER R. LAMBUTH (assistant pastor), 1876; J. D. BARBEE, 1882-86; WARREN A. CANDLER, 1886-87; S. A. STEEL, 1889-92; JOHN MATHEWS, 1897-1901; E. B. CHAPPELL, 1901-06; COLLINS DENNY (acting pastor), 1906; J. S. FRENCH, 1910-14; O. E. GODDARD (associate pastor), 1919-22; H. B. Trimble, 1922-28.

Five of the above were elected bishops of the M.E. Church, South, namely, Robert Paine, R. K. Hargrove, Warren A. Candler, Collins Denny and Walter Lambuth.

McKendree is as much a part of Nashville as the famous Capitol, or the Cumberland River itself, and is so recognized by the people of Tennessee. The church presently (1970) numbers 2,201 members and employs three pastors.

West End Church is on West End Avenue facing the campus of Vanderbilt University, beyond which are Scarritt College for Christian Workers and George Peabody College for Teachers. The church fellowship is enriched by the participation of faculty members and students from all three schools in its life and worship. For a time before completion of the present sanctuary—a time which because of the depression stretched to over ten years (1929-40)—the congregation worshipped in Neely Auditorium on the Vanderbilt campus. The church has 2,512 members, with property occupying a city block and valued at well over $2,000,000.

In 1868 members of McKendree Church, "the mother church of Nashville Methodism," began a mission Sunday school on Church Street at Fifteenth Avenue, in a building so dilapidated that the coming of cold weather brought the project to a stop. The next year it was reactivated and organized as a mission church, called the West Nashville Mission and later West End Mission. The church became self-supporting in 1873 and worked toward a building, which was erected on Broadway at Sixteenth Avenue and opened for worship Feb. 9, 1875. Fifteen years later the congregation occupied a large new brick building on the same site, which was used until the move into the first section of the present educational building on Oct. 27, 1929. The present sanctuary was opened for worship March 10, 1940. On Sept. 15, 1968, occurred the formal opening of a five-story addition containing educational, social, and recreational facilities, including a gymnasium, which make possible for the church a full program of worship, education, fellowship, and service.

West End has many historic associations. Tablets and stained-glass windows reveal its close relation with the leaders of Methodism stationed in Nashville for a century. The church has yielded two successive pastors to the episcopacy: COSTEN J. HARRELL (1944) and JAMES W. HENLEY (1960).

NAST, WILHELM (1807-1889), founder of German Methodism, was born in STUTTGART, GERMANY on June 15, 1807. His father and mother died in his early youth but he was reared in a good family atmosphere by an older sister. In his later youth he enrolled in Blauberger Seminary to prepare for the Lutheran ministry. His roommate chanced to be the well known radical materialist, David Frederick Straus, whose effect upon him was to produce mental doubts and weakened convictions. However William Nast's serious nature and scholarly disposition served to hold him steady as he matured.

In 1828, at the age of twenty-one, while in this restless state of mind, he came to America, and there continued to seek a well founded faith. He found for a time employment as private instructor in an English family near Harrisburg, Pa. Next he served as librarian and professor of German at West Point, the United States Military Academy. He then went to the Lutheran College at Gettysburg, Pa. Here Bishop McIlvaine proved a friend to him by securing for him a professorship of Greek and Hebrew in Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio.

Nast formed a friendship with a shoemaker named John Smith whose faith impressed him, and on the occasion of the coming of the Methodist presiding elder, ADAM POE—afterward Book Agent at CINCINNATI—Nast went at Smith's invitation to meet the visitor. Poe was favorably impressed with young Nast and encouraged him in his pursuit for spiritual certainty. It is thereafter recorded that on Jan. 11, 1835, at Danville, Ohio, he came into a satisfying experience, one characteristic of the evangelistic and missionary happenings then in German Methodism.

On Aug. 18, 1835, at Springfield, Poe proposed to the OHIO CONFERENCE that William Nast be received on trial. His appointment was then announced, "Missionary among the German immigrants in and near Cincinnati." Nast at once began his work, preaching his first sermon in Wesley Chapel to a congregation of twenty-four Germans and twelve English hearers. He made extensive contacts with German-speaking groups, but at the next session of the Conference results seemed meager since only three persons had been converted. However one of these was John Zwahlen, later to be founder of Central (German) congregation in Wheeling, W. Va. The one and only German church in the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE has been in the PITTSBURGH, OHIO, and West Virginia Conferences.

On Aug. 1, 1836, he married Margaret McDowell and they had five children. One daughter, Fanny Nast Gamble, established a "Nast Theological Professorship" (1899), which expanded, in 1902, into Nast Theological Seminary.

In 1836-1837 Nast served on the Columbus District, consisting of twenty-two appointments. In every direction the German Mission established contacts with German-speaking groups throughout much of the nation. Nast sent John Zwahlen to Wheeling to take subscriptions for the German publication "Christliche Apologete," and to investigate the possibility of organizing a class there. Cincinnati deserves the high honor of having the "Mother Church of German Methodism," but the congregation of the Central Church in Wheeling erected and dedicated there the first German Methodist church building in the world. Nast dedicated it March 22, 1840, the climax of John Zwahlen's leadership over the Christmas season of 1838, Zwahlen then serving as the first of a series of forty-two German pastors. Almost a hundred years later, in 1934, Central Church transferred to the West Virginia Conference.

Nast traveled widely in his evangelistic efforts among immigrant Germans. He spread the work of German Methodism to MISSOURI, KENTUCKY, ILLINOIS, WISCONSIN, and IOWA. He won thousands of converts and organized them into churches.

In 1839 he became editor of Der Christliche Apologete, a position he held for fifty-three years. The GENERAL CONFERENCE, after adopting this as an official organ of the church, elected Nast again and again. In addition to editorial duties, he engaged in translating, writing, distributing tracts, and preaching. He helped establish German Wallace College, Berea, Ohio (see BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE), and became its first president. He made several European journeys and founded a successful Methodist mission in Germany. Wilhelm Nast's important publications include Das Leben und Wirken des Johannes Wesley und seiner Haupt-mitarbeiter (1852) and Die Aufgabe der Christlichen Kirche im neunzehnten Jahrhundert (1857). He died May 6, 1889, at Cincinnati, Ohio.

NATCHEZ, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A. The word "Natchez" in early records meant not a city but an area, sometimes called the "Natchez country." Methodism had been in the area a good number of years before any definite Methodist activity had taken place in the city itself. It is assumed that TOBIAS GIBSON, who came from SOUTH CAROLINA in 1799 and landed at Natchez, must have preached in the city, but there is no record of it. LORENZO DOW mentions preaching there a few years later, but reports little interest and spiritual concern.

The first churches in the Natchez area were organized in small towns and rural communities. The earliest and oldest is the church at Washington, organized in 1799 with eight members: William and Mary Foster, Randal and Harriett Gibson, Edna Bullen, Caleb Worley, and a colored man and his wife. The second congregation was organized at Kingston, sixteen miles southeast, in 1800; it was here that Lorenzo Dow sold his watch and bought a lot on which to build a Methodist church, the first Methodist property in the MISSISSIPPI Territory. The Methodists at Kingston have had three church buildings—a small building on the Dow lot, a brick building erected some years later, and the present building constructed in 1855-56 and dedicated on the first Sunday in May 1856. The church at Washington worshipped first in a schoolhouse, then in a union building on College Street, then in the building inside the Jefferson College campus in which the Constitutional Convention of 1817 was held, and since 1828 in the present building, which is the second oldest building in Mississippi and houses the oldest congregation. The oldest building is at Woodville, built in 1824.

No one knows when the first Methodist congregation was organized in the city of Natchez itself. The first church property in Natchez was acquired on March 25, 1807, a lot on Union Street north of Main, for the sum of $150. Since the Board of Trustees named in the deed were mainly nonresidents of Natchez, it seems probable that no organization had as yet taken place. Nor is it known just when a church was erected on this lot. It lasted a dozen years or more, when it was replaced by a new church on a different location and soon after the Civil War by the present Jefferson Street Church, which is at the present time the oldest building in use by Methodists in the major cities of the state.

Methodism in the Natchez area has had a long and honorable history. The first Sunday school in the southwest was established in Natchez by Richard Abbey and Miss Eliza Lowe, and the first organization of women in Mississippi took place in the Washington Methodist Church on July 23, 1823, with Mrs. John C. Burruss as president and Mrs. Caroline Matilda Thayer as corresponding secretary.

ELIZABETH ACADEMY at Washington opened in 1818 and was chartered by the legislature in 1819 to give degrees to women, and is said by many to have been the first chartered institution in the world to give degrees to women.

Other Methodist congregations in the immediate vicinity of Natchez, in addition to Washington and Kingston, have been Pine Ridge, Bethel, Sandy Creek, Selsertown, Locust Grove, and Pine Grove; while in Natchez Wesley Chapel, Pearl Street, Maple Street, Wesley, Grace, and Lovely Lane Churches have served the Methodist people.

Jefferson Street Church. Tobias Gibson came to Natchez as a missionary from South Carolina around 1800 and organized churches in the Natchez area. It is not known when the Methodist congregation in Natchez was formally organized. On March 25, 1807, under the leadership of LEARNER BLACKMAN, the first lot was obtained for the building of a church. It was called Cokesbury Chapel and was in use until 1823, when a new church was built on Union Street. This was sold in 1866 and the present church lot, bought in 1857, was not in use until 1872, when the first service was held in the present building on August 30. A parsonage was secured in 1850 and the church has had a parsonage since that time.

The first Sunday school southwest of PHILADELPHIA was organized in Natchez before 1829, and a missionary organization of the women of the Natchez and Washington churches was in existence before that time. Fourteen sessions of the annual conference have been held in the Natchez church.

Grace Church and Lovely Lane Church share with the original Jefferson Street congregation the responsibility of Methodism in Natchez.

NATIONAL CHILDREN'S HOME AND ORPHANAGE, Great Britain, was founded by THOMAS BOWMAN STEPHENSON, a Wesleyan Methodist minister, in 1869. Stephenson received two boys in a house he had rented in Church Street, Lambeth, London, and these were forerunners of some 43,000 children who have subsequently come under the care of the home. The home's purpose has from the earliest days been to minister to all categories of children in need; and the home's policy was, and is, to create substitute homes which approximate as nearly as possible a child's own home.

The home, which has some forty branches in England, Wales, Scotland, and the Isle of Man, also has a program of foster care, adoption, and family aid. Its child-care staff includes an Order of Deaconesses, or sisters, who are trained and ordained for their special tasks.

Though the home is a Methodist foundation, it receives children from all Protestant denominations, and many from none. The home furthermore is supported by the general public, to which it makes national appeals of various kinds.

The scope of the service rendered by the home to its three thousand children in care is very wide, including schools for backward, physically handicapped, and delinquent youngsters. For senior boys there is a very well equipped Printing Technical School. The Staff Training College, Stephenson Hall, is in London.

The National Children's Home is one of the most significant and widespread undertakings of the Methodist Church in Great Britain. Its headquarters are at Highbury Park, London, N. 5, and the present principal is the Rev. John Waterhouse, O.B.E.

NATIONAL COLLEGE, Kansas City, Missouri, began as a deaconess training school in 1899 with special emphasis on biblical studies and social work. In 1946 the liberal arts program leading to a B.A. degree was adopted, and in 1954 it became a coeducational college. Plans were completed in 1964 for it to discontinue its work as a liberal arts college and merge with the SAINT PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. This merger made possible a larger emphasis upon graduate work in religious education.

From 1899 until 1939 National was under the control of the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church, and after Unification, of the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions. Its last year of academic work was 1963-64. In 1965 Saint Paul School of Theology moved to the campus.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., with headquarters at 475 Riverside Drive, New York City, is a cooperative agency of thirty Protestant and Orthodox churches who propose "to show forth their unity and mission in specific ways and to bring them into living contact with one another for fellowship, study, and cooperative action." Four American Methodist church bodies are among the thirty "constituents" (or denominations) that comprise the Council: The UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, and the CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The cooperative work of the churches through councils in states, cities, and counties (in which Methodism generally has an important share) is represented on the Council's divisions, departments, and committees.

The National Council of Churches grew out of and continues the mission, witness, and service of twelve historical interdenominational bodies which began their united service and study early in the century. The "core" of this united ministry was the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in the early organization and maintenance of which Methodism was a major factor. Among the Methodists who were presidents of the Federal Council before its merger into the National Council were: Bishop E. R. HENDRIX, FRANK MASON NORTH, S. PARKES CADMAN (a local preacher of British Methodism), Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT, Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM. Two Methodists who have served as presidents of the National Council are Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN and ARTHUR S. FLEMING.

The thirty denominations in the National Council have a total membership of 42,000,000 persons. But, says the Council, "whereas the Council does not speak for its member churches, the churches through the Council do speak to one another and to the general public. What is said through the Council is determined altogether by the elected representatives of the churches."

The Council is governed by a General Assembly of 875 people, meeting once in three years, chosen by member communions. The General Assembly elects a General Board of 275 of its members; and this Board, meeting three times a year, is charged with the program and administration of the Council. On behalf of the churches and participating organizations, the Council currently carries on some seventy-five cooperative projects in the United States and overseas. These are the concerns of four divisions. In the Division of Christian Life and Work are departments promoting parish and community life, evangelism, stewardship, concern for race relations, religious liberty, economics, international affairs, and ministries to areas of special need—American Indians, migrant farm workers, etc. The Division of Christian Education is concerned with educational institutions and ministries, the pastoral ministry, vocation, and the development of the lay ministry. The Division of Overseas Ministries helps in the cooperation of all mission agencies of the churches in lands outside the United States—continuing the earlier services of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America—and has as its special charge the work of Church World Service in concern for relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction in war-torn and disaster areas, and in social and economic development. It also has a number of specialized ministries—literacy, literature, radio, medical, union churches, rural missions, military service personnel, etc.—in some forty countries. The Division of Christian Unity works for "ecumenical response" in the U.S.A. by study, organization of local councils of churches, promotion of dialogue, and the services of United Church Men, United Church Women, and Youth Ministry.

The United Methodist Church contributes to the support of the National Council and to the activities of its divisions and agencies largely through an appropriation made by the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

NAUVOO, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. Methodism was established in Nauvoo shortly after the departure of the Mormons, following the assassination of their leader, Joseph Smith, and his brother Hyrum in the jail at Carthage on June 27, 1844. In October 1846, G. G. Worthington was transferred from the Knoxville circuit in ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE to begin work in Nauvoo. A few days after his arrival on October 20 he preached the first Methodist sermon in Nauvoo in the recently abandoned Mormon Temple.

"The desolate appearance of the 'City of the Saints,'" he wrote in his report to the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church, 1847, "and the country around for five miles, at least, beggars all description, and can never be erased from my mind. The 'troubles' war, and strife, were just over, and a remnant of the 'regulators' left by the Anti-Mormon party still lingered in the great Mormon Temple, with the mouths of three great guns in the portico of the Temple, looking down upon those remaining in the deserted city."

With the arrival of troops under Governor Ford order was restored in the city, and Worthington began rounding up a few Methodist families. After the first Sunday services were held in the Music Hall nearby the Temple. This hall was purchased from the Mormons at a great loss to the latter. A church building was erected in 1853, which served until merger with the German Methodist congregation in 1904.

German Methodist work dates also from 1846, when Jacob Haas was appointed minister. A building was provided in 1855, and the charge was related later to the ST. LOUIS GERMAN CONFERENCE.

When the two Methodist congregations merged in 1904, the "English" building was sold and the German building was transferred to the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. In 1913 this building was razed, and the present frame structure was erected. A membership of 148 was reported in 1970.

NAVAJO METHODIST MISSION, Farmington, New Mexico, was founded in 1891 by two missionaries—Mrs. Eldridge and Miss Raymond—who gave up positions in Government Schools in Lawrence, Kansas, to teach the gospel to the Indians.

The first mission was built at Jewett, about twenty miles west of Farmington, but in 1911 this mission was completely destroyed by flood.

In 1912 the present mission was established on thirty acres of land two miles from Farmington. More buildings have been added through the years, and the present value is estimated at $1,000,000 with an enrollment of thirty day students and 205 boarding students. This mission has classes from the first through the twelfth grades. There are church services, a Sunday school, a Methodist Youth Fellowship, and regular medical care for the Indians.

NAWAB, PHILIP ANDREW, was an early convert from Islam in LUCKNOW. He was descended from the royal family of Oudh. The aura of royalty never forsook him. He was soundly converted, and spoke with an eloquence and winsomeness that commanded attention whether in church worship services, the drawing room of the elite, or the crowded bazaars. He began his ministry in the 1880's and continued it into the early years of the twentieth century.

NAYLOR, GEORGE DENT (1880-1959), American missionary to CUBA, was born Nov. 15, 1880 in MARYLAND, where he joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. Graduating from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, where he belonged to a group of STUDENT VOLUNTEERS, he was accepted as a missionary to Cuba in 1915. His first appointment was to the Isle of Pines, Havana Province. On occasional visits to HAVANA he met and married the talented Effie Wright Chastain, who had been born in MEXICO, the daughter of a Baptist missionary.

Their children were George Dent, Jr., Mary Jean, Kathleen Wright, William Chastain, Marguerite, and Annie Lee. Knowing Spanish from childhood, Mrs. Naylor became a prodigious writer and translator in Spanish. Her pen produced many translations, original plays, and for many years the children's page in church publications.

At every pastoral charge they were particularly loved, and their home and congregations knew no boundary of color. Also several homeless young people found a haven in their home.

After leaving the field in 1932, George Naylor served various appointments in the Baltimore Conference until his retirement in 1953. But after retirement, and with his wife in poor health, they returned to Cuba serving as substitute pastor in Guantanamo and Holguin until the political situation made it impractical to remain. They both died within a few weeks of each other in 1959.

NAZREY, WILLIS (1808-1875), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in the Isle of Wight, VIRGINIA, on March 5, 1808. His education was self-acquired. He was converted and licensed in 1837 and admitted into the New York Annual Conference in 1840. He was ordained DEACON in 1841 and ELDER in 1843. He held pastorates in Lewiston County, Pa.; PHILADELPHIA, Pa.; and NEW JERSEY. He was elected bishop in 1852. He withdrew from the A.M.E. Church to become first bishop of the British Methodist Episcopal Church (the A.M.E. churches in Canada and the B.W.I., etc.), which formed a separate denomination until a reunion in 1884. Nazrey died in 1875.

NEBLETT, STERLING AUGUSTUS (1873-1969), American missionary to CUBA, was born in Union City, Tenn., on Sept. 11, 1873. In 1894 he became the first graduate of the American Temperance University, Harriman, Tenn. While working as an accountant for the Southern Express Company he had an experience of conversion and one year later (1900), he felt called for foreign missionary service. He arrived in Cuba in 1902 and became princial of a Methodist school in Cienfuegos, working with two teachers and fifty students.

In 1903 he was appointed by Bishop W. A. CANDLER to Matanzas, the first of an impressive list of pastoral charges which he filled. In 1905 he helped organize and became chairman of "The Protestant Conference," the first interdenominational body in Cuba. He was also one of the main inspiring forces behind the founding of the periodical El Evangelista Cubano and of the Union Theological Seminary in Cuba.

He was married to Lillian Richards, June 22, 1898, and their children were William, John and Lucy. After the death of his wife he married Myrtle Hargon, who was teaching in Cuba, and their children were Robert, Mary Frances and Samuel.

In the late 1920's his health began to fail and after doctors advised a change of climate, the BOARD OF MISSIONS sent him to conduct training schools for leaders in Europe. Later, his health having improved, he returned to Cuba.

For a period of fifty years he was a part of almost every forward movement of the church, both in his own denomination and in interdenominational activities. In the Council of Evangelical Churches he was one of the first vice-presidents. Every Methodist book of Discipline for many years was Neblett's translation into Spanish. He also translated into Spanish hymn books and other related material for the church schools. Over a long period he directed an evangelical book depository in Havana. As the organizer of the Conference Board of Christian Education he was called on to visit other countries and to consult with the parent boards in the States. As a result of his leadership Cuba led all the Latin American countries in Christian education.

After retiring he remained in Cuba for several years continuing to teach in leadership schools. When he finally left Cuba he continued to translate Christian literature into Spanish while living in Nashville, Tenn. He then moved to Southport, Fla., where he died Nov. 9, 1969.

NEBRASKA is located in the north central part of the United States. Its name comes from the Indian words "Ni," meaning water, and "Bthaska," meaning flat. It is bounded on the east by the Missouri River, on the west by the states of WYOMING and COLORADO, on the north by SOUTH DAKOTA and on the south by KANSAS. With 76,522 square miles, Nebraska had a population of 1,468,101 in 1970. It was admitted to the Union, March 1, 1867. The Platte River crosses the state from west to east. A part of the Louisiana Purchase, Nebraska was also a part of the Kansas-Nebraska Territory until 1861 when Kansas entered the Union. Following the Civil War, immigrants pushed into Nebraska seeking land in accordance with the Homestead Act of 1862. The population of the state grew rapidly after the coming of the Union Pacific Railway in 1869. Cattle, hogs, and grain are among chief products of the state. Industries include the manufacture of farm implements, parts for motors, airplanes, and telephone and electronic equipment. Also, Nebraska has a large cement industry made possible by large limestone deposits. The Strategic Air Command Base south of OMAHA controls American military defense operations all over the world.

The first Methodist sermon in Nebraska was preached by Harrison Presson in what is now Omaha on April 12, 1850 to members of his wagon train and some local Indians. In 1854 a Kansas and Nebraska Mission District was organized and attached to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE; WILLIAM H. GOODE who came from Richmond, Ind., served as presiding elder. Goode appointed William D. Gage to Nebraska City where he organized the first Methodist congregation and built the first Methodist church in Nebraska. Gage later became the first chaplain of the Nebraska Territorial Legislature.

The Kansas and Nebraska Conference was organized in 1856 at Lawrence, Kan., and in 1861 Nebraska became a separate conference. In 1880 the West Nebraska Mission was formed, comprising the territory west of Grand Island. In 1881 the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE was divided to form the NORTH NEBRASKA CONFERENCE which was comprised of the territory north of the Platte River and east of the West Nebraska Mission. In 1885 the WEST NEBRASKA CONFERENCE superseded the West Nebraska Mission, and in 1893 this conference was divided to create the NORTHWEST NEBRASKA CONFERENCE.

With the passage of time and the development of swifter means of communication and travel, there were no impelling reasons for four Methodist conferences in Nebraska, and they began to merge. In 1913 the North and West Nebraska Conferences were absorbed by the Nebraska Conference, and in 1924 the Northwest Nebraska Conference was included. Thereafter there was one conference covering the whole state.

The German Methodists, the Swedish Methodists, and the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH operated in Nebraska. In 1864 the GENERAL CONFERENCE established a system of German Conferences, and in 1879 the West German Conference was organized at St. Joseph, Mo., to include churches in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado. This conference continued until 1922 when the German churches in Nebraska were absorbed by the appropriate English-speaking conferences.

The Swedish Methodist churches in Nebraska were part of the Western Swedish Conference which was organized in Omaha in 1894 to include the Swedish work in Nebraska and several surrounding states. In 1928 this conference merged with two other Swedish conferences to form the CENTRAL NORTHWEST CONFERENCE (Swedish) which continued until 1942 when the Swedish churches and ministers were absorbed in the appropriate English-speaking conferences. There were ten Swedish pastoral appointments in Nebraska in 1927 and five in 1941.

The Methodist Protestants organized a small Nebraska Conference in 1860. For some years the conference received aid from the denominational board of missions. In 1866 the group felt strong enough to establish Lancaster Seminary at what is now LINCOLN, but after a few years the institution was sold to Lincoln for its first public school. The conference was strong enough to send delegates to the General Conferences during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, but the Methodist Protestant work in the state was dissolved in 1908.

As time passed, Nebraska Methodism came to support one college, NEBRASKA WESLEYAN at Lincoln; three hospitals; three retirement homes; and four youth camps.

In 1970 the Nebraska Conference had 480 ministers, 290 pastoral charges, and property valued at $53,797,267.

NEBRASKA CONFERENCE was organized in Nebraska City, April 4, 1861 with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. (See NEBRASKA for beginnings of Methodism in Nebraska.) At the time it had twenty-one preachers including seven on trial, twenty pastoral appointments, four churches, and 948 members. There were two districts, Omaha and Nebraska City. During its history the Nebraska Conference divided several times to form other conferences in the state but by 1927 all of Nebraska Methodism had been incorporated again in the Nebraska Conference. At that time it had 464 charges and 101,593 members.

Nebraska Methodism has always been interested in schools and colleges. The first attempt to found an educational institution preceded the formation of the conference. In 1853 Cass County University was organized at Orepolis, but it survived only three years. In 1879 J. H. Fleharty founded NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Osceola, and Edward Thompson started York Seminary at York. In 1884 North Central Methodist College was opened in Central City. In 1886 Mallalieu University was launched in the town of Bartley, and Orleans College opened in Orleans. The two latter institutions survived about three years, but the others continued longer.

After five years in Osceola, Nebraska Wesleyan was moved to Fullerton, and three years later to York. In 1887 York Seminary and North Central College were absorbed by Nebraska Wesleyan, and the next year the institution moved to University Place, a suburb of LINCOLN, where a forty-acre campus was available and where the school is still located.

The conference supports three large hospitals—Nebraska Methodist, Omaha, which opened in 1891; Bryan Memorial, Lincoln, which was established in 1924 and named in honor of its chief contributor, William Jennings Bryan; and West Nebraska General, Scottsbluff, founded in 1924.

Epworth Village, a children's home at York, was founded in 1896. Retirement homes include Crowell Memorial at Blair (1906) named in honor of the C. C. Crowell's who gave the land; the Sarah Anne Hester Home, Benkelman (1944), named in honor of the mother of the chief contributor, E. E. Hester; and Memorial Homes, Incorporated, Holdrege, a former community project which was purchased by the Methodists in 1956. The WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY organized the Omaha City Mission in 1876, and it continues to serve as the Wesley Community Home. The conference supports four youth camps—Fontanelle near Fremont; Comeca near Cozad; Norwesca near Chadron; and Riverside near Milford.

In the groupings of conferences and states required by unification in 1939, the Nebraska Conference though "northern," became a part of the eight-state South Central Jurisdiction which was overwhelmingly "southern." At first Nebraska with Kansas formed an episcopal area, but in 1952 Nebraska alone became an area with the episcopal residence in Lincoln.

In 1970 the Nebraska Conference reported 480 ministers, 147,900 members, 290 charges, and property valued at $53,797,267.

NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Lincoln, Nebraska, was established in 1886 when a commission appointed by the several Nebraska annual conferences merged three small colleges then in existence within the state. Since it was chartered on January 20, 1887, this date has been fixed in the college's calendar as Founders' Day. The college opened in September, 1888.

The schools that were merged into Nebraska Wesleyan were York College, York, Nebraska; Nebraska Central College, Central City; and Mallalieu University, Bartley. York was founded in 1879 by the Nebraska Conference. Nebraska Central College was the product in 1884 of the North Nebraska Conference. Mallalieu's founding date is unknown. It was considered a product of the West Nebraska Conference, though never officially adopted by that conference. Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., B.S. in Education, B.M. (Music), B.M.E. (Music Education).

The governing board has sixteen persons elected to the Board of Governors by the Board of Trustees: three Methodist ministers, a representative of the alumni association, eleven other persons, and the resident bishop of the Nebraska Area as an ex officio member with vote. All must be members of the board of trustees. The board of trustees has fifty-six persons including the resident bishop of the Nebraska Area, twenty persons elected by the NEBRASKA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, fifteen persons elected by the alumni association, twenty elected by the Board of Trustees of Nebraska Wesleyan University.

JOHN O. GROSS

NEELY, THOMAS BENJAMIN (1841-1925). American bishop, was born at PHILADELPHIA, Pa., on June 12, 1841.

T. B. NEELY

A fifth-generation Methodist, he was the son of Thomas and Frances (Armstrong) Neely. He was educated at Dickinson Seminary and DICKINSON COLLEGE, receiving the honorary A.M. in 1875 and also the D.D. and LL.D.

Joining the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1865, Neely rose rapidly in the Conference. He held thirteen pastorates chiefly in Philadelphia and vicinity and was presiding elder, 1889-94. In March 1882, he married Elizabeth Cheney Hickman.

Elected to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1884, his deliberative talents were conspicuous. He was subsequently re-elected to five other General Conferences. His years of hard study of the history, law, constitution, and underlying principles of the Methodist Church, made Thomas Neely admittedly the greatest parliamentarian and expositor of church law in the M.E. Church.

He was a conservative and his caution increased with the years. In 1900 he was made Secretary of the Sunday School Union and Tract Society which included editorship. His travels and writings showed that he was an intelligent and robust executive. In 1904 Neely was elected bishop and assigned to BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA. He also opened a new mission in PANAMA and BOLIVIA. He held that the episcopacy was an office and not an order. His bishopric was a troubled one, partly due to altitude, climate, travels, age, and his unequivocal assertion of authority. His transfer to NEW ORLEANS, La., in 1908, did not help much, for the climate there probably hastened the death of his wife in 1912.

While Neely was a powerful champion of the idea that episcopacy is an office not an order, his uncompromising assertion of episcopal authority in its appointing power in certain northern conferences added to dissatisfaction with him as bishop. Against his bitter protest but according to his own interpretation of the law in maintaining the supremacy of the General Conference over the episcopacy, Bishop Neely was retired by the 1912 General Conference. One of the historic and most dramatic and touching scenes of any General Conference took place when Bishop Neely rose from his sick bed and made his protest and last address to an unsympathetic Conference which nevertheless gave him a lordly welcome. His voice almost utterly failed but silently for an hour the overcrowded auditorium listened while only about one-fifth of those present could understand a word. It was a perfect tribute to a good man and great leader who did not know his own episcopal weaknesses. However, the vote was 496 to 297 to retire him, "no reason being formally stated." Ironically, it was noted that he had published in 1892, The Governing Conference in Methodism, . . . Especially the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

During retirement he studied and wrote. He opposed the League of Nations, the Centenary Missionary Program, and Unification. He was an acute parliamentarian and learned historian and wrote twenty-one books dealing largely with Methodist history, doctrine, law, episcopacy, and the itinerancy. Among these were: The Evolution of Episcopacy and Organic Methodism; Parliamentary Practice; Young Workers in the Church. In 1911 he was a member of the Fourth ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE. He died in Philadelphia, on Sept. 4, 1925, and was buried in West Laurel Hill, Philadelphia.

NEGRO METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES. (With special reference to The Methodist Church and its former Central Jurisdiction.)

Previous to 1939. To properly appraise the Central Jurisdiction in The Methodist Church, the structural arrangement set up in 1939 to accommodate the 300,000 Negro Methodists of The Methodist Church, it must be seen as a symbol of the past and present history of the Negro in the Methodist Church during the nearly two centuries of its existence in America; but more important still, as a practical demonstration of the efforts of a close-knit ecclesiastical organization, under most difficult social and political conditions, to include in its membership the most diverse racial groups.

The Methodist movement, from its beginning, made a special appeal to people in the lowest brackets of society. When its leaders, JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, and their associates were excluded from the pulpits in LONDON and other cities in England, they took to the open fields and preached to the colliers and peasants in Kingswood and New Castle, and other mining communities in England. Their message was to the lowly and neglected classes. It was this same type in America to whom they made their greatest appeal.

To no group could their message have evoked a more enthusiastic response than among the African slaves. These people joined the movement in large numbers and were cordially welcomed, at least at first, by the leaders of the movement.

The missionaries sent by Wesley to America spoke appreciatively of the presence of the slaves in their meetings. In a letter to Wesley dated Nov. 4, 1769, Richard Boardman writes: "The number of the blacks that attend the preaching affects me much."

In his Journal of Nov. 17, 1771, Francis Asbury wrote:

"To see the poor Negroes so affected is pleasing, to see their sable countenances in our assemblies and to hear them sing with cheerful melody their dear Redeemer's praise, affected me much, and made me ready to say, 'of a truth I perceive God is no respecter of persons.'"

At the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in Baltimore in 1784, of the fifty-one churches which gave reports of their membership, all but fifteen reported Negro members. From the beginning of its history, therefore, Negroes were a part of the Methodist movement. According to Wade Crawford Barclay, the historian of Methodist Missions, the Negro membership in the church in 1786 numbered 11,280; in 1810-11, 34,724; in 1825-26, 47,433; and in 1844-45, 150,120.

Interracial Relations in Early Methodism. Despite the fact that Negroes were given what amounted to a "token" welcome into the movement, it soon became evident that they would be subject to caste distinctions and indignities. This was, doubtless, inevitable due to their status as slaves, but was also due to the social attitudes which prevailed in all the Colonies relative to class and social status. Seating in the churches, in some of the Colonies, was based on wealth and social prestige. The fact that Negroes, whether slaves or "free," were in the lowest bracket, meant that even when, and if, they were permitted to come into the churches for worship, they were given scant consideration as to seating. "They either sat on benches in the rear, or in an 'African corner.'"

The Methodists, because of their own relatively low social status at that time, could not hold the same degree of caste distinction as did the older and more exclusive churches of New England and the Atlantic Seaboard. Nevertheless, they too, soon began to make distinctions where Negroes were concerned. Barclay quotes from letters found in the Journal of one of Wesley's missionaries, JOSEPH PILMORE, in which he spoke of forming "a separate class for Negroes," and "after preaching, meeting with the Negroes apart." This trend was also evident early in Asbury's experience in America. In his Journal of Dec. 8, 1772, Asbury writes: "In the evening the Negroes were collected and I spoke to them in exhortation."

While the membership of the JOHN STREET CHURCH was interracial from the first, in the lists of membership published in 1787 whites and Negroes were listed separately. The ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH in Philadelphia also had separate listing. In addition to the separate seating arrangements, discrimination was shown in other ways. Barclay quotes from a letter by Pilmore dated Aug. 9, 1772, relative to a service where the church was not large enough to accommodate all who desired to attend.

"As the ground was wet they persuaded me to try to preach within, and appointed men to stand at the doors to keep all the Negroes out until the white persons were got in, but the house would not hold them." (Barclay, Vol. II, p. 55.)

In the southern section of the church, the problem was accentuated by fear of revolt on the part of the slaves. It was therefore deemed advisable, in some areas, to disallow religious services to the slaves; or where it was permitted, to provide a separate section for the Negro worshippers. There still exist, in many of the older churches of the South, balconies, where the slaves were seated during religious services.

In the light of these conditions, it is not surprising that there should have developed a feeling of unrest, especially among free Negroes in the northern section of the church, and a desire to have more freedom of expression. This was primarily responsible for the rise of the independent Negro Methodist denominations, and a great deal of credit deservedly belongs to men like RICHARD ALLEN who led their people in setting up first, independent local congregations, and finally, independent Churches. (See AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH listings.)

In our appreciation of these men, however, we should not forget the leaders of the lowly Negro group who remained with the "Mother Church," and rendered yeoman service. One thinks especially of two such men: HARRY HOSIER, better known as "Black Harry," and JOHN STEWART. "Black Harry" accompanied both Asbury and Thomas Coke on a number of their preaching tours, and preached acceptably to both white and Negro audiences.

Stewart was converted at a camp meeting on the Marietta Circuit near Marietta, Ohio, sometime between 1814 and 1816, and became a missionary to the Indians.

There were other Negro leaders in every section of the church who were helping to carry the Word of God to their benighted fellowmen whose names never reached the public print, but nevertheless, are written in the "Book of Life."

In Episcopal Methodism (North and South) from the Division (1844) to Unification (1939). One of the very strange and interesting developments which followed the division of 1844 was the passionate interest shown by the Southern Church in the evangelization of the slaves. This is especially true when it is remembered that the immediate occasion for the Division of the Church in 1844 was the question of the ownership of slaves by one of the bishops from the southern section of the church. However, it was the Southern Church which showed the greatest zeal for the evangelization of the slaves, from 1844 to the beginning of the Civil War in 1861. This movement was led by WILLIAM CAPERS (later a bishop in the Church) from South Carolina. "He developed a type of organization," writes Willis J. Weatherford, "for serving the slaves, which swept over the entire South." (Weatherford, p. 91.)

In 1847, the church in the South reported 124,961 Negro members; in 1848, 127,241; in 1853, 146,949; in 1860, 171,857. The figures on this score are impressive and prove that the leaders of the church, South, showed a real evangelistic interest in the slaves.

The situation, however, changed with the Civil War. The change in the status of the Negro, following the Civil War, and the inability of the former masters to accept the new status of their former slaves, plus the activity of the independent Negro denominations in recruiting them into their churches, resulted in a rapid decline in the membership of the M.E. Church, South, during the war years. By 1866 the Negro membership had shrunk to 78,742.

At the General Conference of that church in 1866, a resolution was adopted which made possible the setting up of its Negro ministry and membership as an independent church. In 1870, this action, which had also the sanction of the Negro membership of that church, was taken. From that time until 1939, the two groups maintained close fraternal relations, but as distinctively separate denominations. During this period, the Southern Church made annual contributions to the new church

(first named the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church—later changed to the CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH)—from its benevolence budget; and took major responsibility for the support of PAINE COLLEGE, in Augusta, Ga., maintained for the training of Negro students. This was the situation in 1939 when the unification of the three Methodist denominations was effected.

In the Methodist Episcopal Church. We now turn to the situation in the M.E. Church—the northern branch of the Methodist Church—which, of course, is our major interest since the ministers and members of what became the Central Jurisdiction are now, and always have been, members of that branch of the church.

The division of the Church after 1844 did not have the same challenging effect in the north as in the South, at least not immediately. Despite their espousal of the freedom of the slaves, local attitudes against the admission of the Negroes into the churches changed slowly; and in a number of cases Negroes were encouraged to set up their own local congregations, even to join the independent Negro denominations. There was the added fact that the Negro population in most Northern cities was, in the early days, both small and economically insecure; and many joined the independent denominations on the basis of the racial appeal.

By 1850 (the last year of keeping separate lists of white and Negro members in the Annual Conferences of the Church) the total enrollment of Negroes in the M.E. Church was 26,309 which, as we have noted, was in great contrast to the Negro membership of the Southern Church in the same period. The Civil War, however, brought a greatly increased interest in the development of work among Negroes by the Northern Church. The passionate loyalty with which the Methodists of that Church had supported the Federal Government in the prosecution of the War, and their basic evangelistic and educational interest in the uplift of the underprivileged, made them the logical leaders, following the War, in "the fight to really make these people free." Thus the General Conference of 1864 authorized the organization of one or more Negro Mission Conferences. Under this provision, two Negro Mission Conferences were organized immediately following that General Conference: The DELAWARE, July 38, 1864; the WASHINGTON, Oct. 27, 1864. Also the Mississippi Mission Conference, composed of both white and Negro ministers, was organized in New Orleans, La., Dec. 25, 1865, with four districts: One for Mississippi, two in Louisiana, and one in Texas.

In the Episcopal Address at the General Conference of 1868, the bishops reported that nine Conferences had been organized in territory not previously included in Annual Conferences. These had a membership in 1871, as follows: Travelling Preachers, 630 (260 whites, 370 Negroes); Lay members, 135,000 (47,000 whites; 88,000 Negroes).

In 1868 the General Conference changed the status of the Conferences. Previously authorized as "Mission Conferences," they were then made full-fledged Annual Conferences with all the rights and privileges usual to Annual Conferences. Negroes elected by two of these "Mission Conferences" sat for the first time as delegates in the 1868 General Conference. The 1868 General Conference also authorized the bishops to organize new Annual Conferences in the South. By the close of the 1872-76 quadrennium, twenty Conferences—white, Negro, or mixed—had been organized on the border and in the South. Three—Delaware, Washington, and Lexington—were all Negro; one, Kentucky, white; six—Holston, St. Louis, Arkansas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Missouri—predominantly white; six—South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas and North Carolina—predominantly Negro; three—Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee—about equally divided between white and Negro members; and one, West Texas, bi-racial.

Racial Composition of Annual Conferences and Episcopal Leadership of the Negro Membership. As early as 1869, the division of Annual Conferences on racial lines was advocated. This agitation was begun in Georgia when a resolution was introduced by nine Negro preachers asking that the Negro Churches be formed into separate Negro districts under Negro presiding elders. A step in that direction was made by the setting up of one exclusively Negro district. A memorial to the General Conference of 1872 requested the formation of a separate Annual Conference for the Negro membership. No action was taken on this proposal at the General Conference of 1872, due to the fact that the Negro delegates were not unanimously in favor of setting up Annual Conferences on a racial basis. But the agitation for such action continued, led in some Conferences by whites; in others by Negroes. Thus it came about that at the General Conference of 1876, it was voted that where a majority of both whites and Negroes requested division, the presiding bishop was authorized to organize the new Conference, or Conferences.

By 1895, mixed Annual Conferences, composed of both white and Negro ministers, no longer existed in the Methodist Church. As Barclay observes, "By 1895 the developing process of segregation, first given official sanction by the General Conference of 1864, was complete." (Barclay, Vol. III, p. 321.)

Another issue which emerged rather early in the administration of work among Negroes was that of episcopal leadership for this particular group. Some critics (mainly outside the Church) asserted that the Church would never elect a Negro to the bishopric. A partial answer to this was given when the General Conference of 1856 made provision for the election of a Liberian as Missionary bishop (a distinct status) of that country. This provision was put into effect with the election of FRANCIS BURNS of Liberia (in 1858); this policy was continued in the selection of his successor, J. W. ROBERTS in 1866. But since both of these men were citizens of Liberia, and their service was limited to that particular field, this action did not and could not satisfy the demands in the home field.

In 1904, an American Negro, ISALAH B. SCOTT, was elected a missionary bishop for service in Liberia. He had the same limitations as to the scope of this area of service, as did his predecessors in the office of "Missionary bishop."

It was not until 1920, that two full-fledged General Superintendents, equal in rank, official responsibility, and salary (including other financial perquisites) were elected in the M. E. General Conference. The fact that it was necessary at that late date to elect them on a separate ballot, is evidence that the Church had not completely overcome the barrier of color.

The Freedmen's Aid Society and Its Successors. One of the most constructive steps taken by the M. E. Church, following the Civil War, was the setting up of schools for the training of leaders among the Freedmen, both for special leadership in the work of the Church and nation, and for the responsibilities involved in the newly-attained citizenship in a democratic nation.

The program for this type of work was first begun as a cooperative venture among several of the major denominational groups, but there soon developed a tendency on the part of the several church bodies to set up their own denominational Boards. In line with this trend, a group of Methodist leaders, ministers and laymen, met in Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 7-8, 1866, to determine a program for the Methodist Church. The meeting resulted in the organization of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY with the objective "to labor for the relief and education of the freedmen, especially in cooperation with the missionary and Church Extension Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church." (Barclay, Vol. III, p. 322.)

The Freedmen's Aid Society began its operations in the South in the Fall of 1866. In the very first year schools were set up in Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Louisiana, West Virginia, Virginia, and Florida. Three thousand pupils were enrolled the first year, under the tutelage of forty teachers. The Society, while authorized by the General Conference of 1868, was not given the status of a General Conference organization. By 1872 the Society was given full official approval and annual conference apportionments were sent down to the local churches for the support of the Society. In 1880 the General Conference directed the Society to aid the schools for whites in the South, and in 1888 the name of the Society was changed to the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society, to more fully express the work of the Church among both races in the South.

By 1895 educational institutions under the patronage of the Society numbered forty-four, including, for Negroes a theological school, ten colleges and universities, and eleven academies, and for whites, three collegiate institutions and nineteen academies.

Early in its history the Freedmen's Aid Society had set a policy of inclusiveness of all its schools, regardless of color, but the steady pressure for segregation in both the Churches and schools in the South resulted finally in a complete separation of the two racial groups in the schools operated by the Society.

In 1924, the name of the Society was changed to the Board of Education for Negroes. Still later it was set up as one of the divisions of the general Board of Education, with the name, the Division of Negro Institutions. In The Methodist Church after 1939 it continued its work under the title, "Negro Higher Education in the Division of Educational Institutions." But by whatever name it has been called, this Society has, for more than a century, rendered great service to the cause of Negro education in the Church and nation.

Negro Membership an Issue in Methodist Unification.

The vigorous educational and evangelistic program carried forward by the Methodist Church, among the Negroes, especially in the South, from the close of the Civil War, until 1939, when the Plan of Union was adopted, had both its advantages and disadvantages to those interested in Methodist Unification. To those who had believed in the possibility of the evangelization of people of all racial and national origins, and their inclusion in one Church of Jesus Christ, the plan of the Northern Church, while not ideal, had proven that the idea could be made to work. For those with the other point of view, namely that the two racial groups should remain in separate denominations, on the basis of race, the Negro membership in the M. E. Church was a definite obstacle to Methodist Unification. The fact that the Negro membership in the Church numbered more than 300,000 did not make the problem any easier. It became evident that one of the major issues in the negotiations on Methodist Unification from 1916, when the active discussions on the subject began, until 1939, when the Plan of Union was adopted, was the status of the Negro membership in the re-organized Church.

To appreciate the total problem, we must see the issue from the standpoint of all the groups concerned: the M. E. Church, South, the white membership of the M. E. Church (Northern Branch), and the Negro membership of the M. E. Church.

From the standpoint of the Southern Church, with its history and social background since the Division in 1844, and its definitive action of 1870, in which it set up its Negro membership into an independent denomination, the logical status of the Negro in any plan for the re-organized Church, seemed to be the establishment of the Negro group into a separate denomination, either alone, or with other Negro church groups, with no organic relation to the white membership of the Church. Leaders of the Southern Church argued for that position for many years during the period of negotiations.

In the case of the M. E. Church, whatever might have been the individual preferences and even the practices of many of its members and local congregations, the Church officially had a long tradition in welcoming, theoretically at least, all groups into its fellowship. Further, there were still fresh memories among the older members of the Church of the vigorous educational and evangelistic programs which had been carried forward among the freedmen since the Civil War. Thousands of Methodists were committed to that program. Also there was the legal fact that the Negro membership was as definitely a part of the Church as was any other group, and could not be eliminated from its membership except by their own choice. And finally, the Negro membership, although a minority group both numerically and in standing in the Church, was nevertheless conscious of its rights and prerogatives in the Church, and was not disposed to relinquish those prerogatives.

More important to them, however, than rights and prerogatives was the instinctive conviction, evident from their earliest connection with the people called "Methodists," that this Fellowship represented a communion that was seriously seeking to build a brotherhood among all men. They believed that their membership in such a Fellowship would help in the achievement of world brotherhood.

It was these varying views which over the period of nearly a quarter of a century of negotiations, had to be resolved before a Plan of Union satisfactory to a majority of Methodists could be agreed upon.

This meant compromises on all sides. For the Southern section of the new church, it meant giving up the insistence on a separate and independent church for the Negro membership, and accepting an arrangement which would leave them full-fledged members, albeit in a separate racial jurisdiction.

For the M. E. Church, it meant giving up the concept of a strongly centralized General Conference and accepting a regionally structured church.

For the Negro membership it meant accepting an arrangement by which the Annual Conferences of the Negro group would be set up as a regional group, or JURISDICTION, known as the "Central Jurisdiction," and based on a racial basis rather than geographical, as was true of the Jurisdictions for the white membership.

The Central Jurisdiction was by definition composed of the "Negro Annual Conferences, the Negro Mission Conferences and Missions in the United States of America." (Constitution of The Methodist Church, Section VIII, Article I.) This obvious racial distinction was never popular among the vast majority of Negroes in the church and ultimately had to end. However, the Central Jurisdiction did function as a coordinate Jurisdiction of the Church from 1939 until 1968 when it was dissolved into the five geographic jurisdictions under the United Methodist Church Constitution.

The Central Jurisdiction held sessions quadrennially (see record of these under JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES), elected bishops and Board members, and functioned exactly as other Jurisdictions. It was, however, a separate racial structure and wrote into the Constitution of a Christian denomination a definite segregated arrangement. Its existence proved to be an embarrassment to the whole Church, and feelings ran high over the very existence of this Jurisdiction at successive General Conferences. Amendment IX of the Constitution of The Methodist Church was passed by the General Conference and adopted by the Church as a whole during the 1956-60 quadrennium, in the effort to make easier the transition by local churches and annual conferences across and into the geographic jurisdictions. Such transfers proved desultory and hard to arrange, and posed great difficulties upon all Conferences involved. The General Conference of 1964 in passing the Plan of Union with the E.U.B. Church requested that the Central Jurisdiction be not mentioned, or allowed for, in the then pending plan of union. Pursuant to this, the Plan of Union set before the Church and adopted by the called General Conference of 1966, made no mention of the Central Jurisdiction, and it was understood on all sides that when this Constitution should be put into effect in 1968, the separate Negro Annual Conferences would go into their respective geographic jurisdictions. Some Conferences had already made this type of transfer (under Amendment IX), some conferences had completely merged, but the Constitution of The United Methodist Church effectually did away with the Central Jurisdiction as such. Its last session was held in Nashville, Tenn., Aug. 18-19, 1967.

There were bitter debates in the Negro Conferences and among Negro church leaders prior to the adoption of the Plan of Union in 1939, and, indeed, that Plan failed to carry in the majority of Negro Annual Conferences. It was, however, adopted by a majority of those present and voting in the white Conferences, both in the North and South, and as is stated above, became part of the constitutional structure of the Church.

Admittedly, the plan did have certain advantages, such as proportionate representation on all of the Boards of the Church; membership in its highest Councils, with members of its group being eligible to hold the highest posts in the Church, without discrimination as to salaries and other perquisites.

More important than these material benefits was the fact that the Central Jurisdiction made possible the beginning of the full-fledged brotherhood which has since been evolving, not only in The Methodist Church, but among Christians of every denominational persuasion, both Protestants and Catholics. Dr. M. S. DAVAGE representing the Negro Conferences at the Uniting Conference in 1939, made a declaration which The Methodist Church has not forgotten. "We want to be in a Church which embraces all mankind, and is big enough for God."

NEGRO METHODIST UNION NEGOTIATIONS (U.S.A.). During the past 150-year history of the three major Negro Methodist denominations in America—AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION and CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (formerly Colored Methodist Episcopal)—there have been many attempts at union or merger.

In 1864 the A.M.E. General Conference sent a delegation to the A.M.E. Zion General Conference suggesting that a commission on union be formed and empowered to call a convention and draw up articles of consolidation. The Zion connection favored this proposal and a convention was held in PHILADELPHIA on June 14-16, 1864. A platform and articles of agreement were formed which were then to be sent to the annual conferences of each denomination for vote. If a favorable vote was received, the union would then be the order of business for the 1868 General Conferences. However, confusion arose as to whether or not the A.M.E. church had indeed sent the proposal to all local churches and annual conferences for a vote, and as a result, the Zion connection refused to consider this or any other proposal at their General Conference in 1868.

In 1885 union negotiations were revived. A joint commission of the A.M.E. and A.M.E. Zion Churches met in Washington, D.C., on July 15-17. A new name was proposed, First United Methodist Episcopal Church, and fourteen other articles of agreement. Disagreements arose over the proposed new name and the article concerning the episcopacy, however, and when only one bishop from the Zion connection was present at a scheduled meeting at Atlantic City, N.J., in August 1887, negotiations were postponed indefinitely. The next serious attempt at union occurred in 1892, but again a joint commission became deadlocked over the name to be given the new church.

On Feb. 16-17, 1918, a Tri-Council of bishops met at LOUISVILLE, Ky., and appointed a committee to draw up a plan of union. The committee met in BIRMINGHAM, Ala., on April 3, 1918, and in one day drew up a plan to be presented to the General Conferences of the three denominations. The so-called "Birmingham Plan" became a bone of contention, especially within the C.M.E. church. Though the plan was adopted at their General Conference in 1918, it was overwhelmingly defeated by the local congregations and annual conferences of that church, so that the A.M.E. and A.M.E. Zion General Conferences meeting in 1920 had nothing to consider.

A General Commission on Union was organized again in 1965. This Commission is committed to meeting at least twice a year and has set 1972 as a target date for merger among themselves, and 1980 as a target date for merger with The United Methodist Church. At this time, the Negro Methodist denominations are also involved in union talks with the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION, an ecumenical body.

ROY W. TRUEBLOOD

NEIDIG, JOHN, SR. (1765-1844), one of the founders of the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH at Oberlin, Pa., was an associate of OTTERBEIN and BOEHM beginning about 1791.

The son of Abraham and Elizabeth Neidig, immigrants from Switzerland, John Neidig was born in Berks County, Pa., April 10, 1765. When he was about five years old, his family moved to Dauphin County, where they had close fellowship with the Mennonites. Despite the fact that his family had originally been German Reformed, John was chosen to be a preacher among the Mennonites when he was about twenty-five; but about a year later, he began his fellowship with the group of preachers who were to form the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

Those neighbors and friends who became associated with John Neidig in the Highspire—Oberlin (then called Churchville) area became known as Neidig's Leute (Neidig's People); and in 1793 they erected their first church building on the spot where the present Neidig Memorial Church stands.

The home of John Neidig had a reputation for its deep spirituality and was a frequent stopping place for CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER, who records twenty-four visits there in his Journal. The six sons and two daughters of John and Mary (Bear) Neidig grew up to give notable leadership to the church of their youth in Cumberland and Dauphin Counties of PENNSYLVANIA, Frederick County, Md., and the area around Muscatine, Iowa.

John Neidig himself was faithful to the doctrine and practices of Otterbein and his followers and was a regular attendee at the sessions of his conference. In 1812, 1820, and 1826, he was assigned an "overseer" of the work east of the Susquehanna River; and at CAMP MEETINGS and worship services, he was in demand as a powerful preacher. He was named to the pastorate of OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH, BALTIMORE, Md., in 1828 and remained there until 1831.

John Neidig, Sr., died at his home near Highspire, Jan. 11, 1844, and is buried in the Highspire General Cemetery, located near the Harrisburg East Exit of the Pennsylvania Turnpike.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

NEIGHBORS, WILLIAM SAMUEL (1860-1957), American minister, was born in Clay County, Ala., March 5, 1860. One of twelve children, his boyhood was a time of hardship, but his family worked together to see that he went to college. When he got off the train at Sweetwater, Tenn., he walked the nine miles to HIWASSEE COLLEGE with his trunk on his shoulder. From the moment he set foot on the campus of Hiwassee, he knew he was to be a Methodist preacher. He joined the church at Hillobee Campground in September 1875. Four years later he was licensed to preach at Notasulga, Ala. He was admitted on trial to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE Oct. 17, 1887, ordained a DEACON in 1889, and ELDER in 1891. He graduated from EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in 1887.

He served as pastor of nearly every important church in the Holston Conference. He also was pastor of Greene Memorial Church, ROANOKE, Va., and First Church, BALTIMORE, Md.

He was presiding elder three times of Holston Conference districts, and was for some time president of Sullins College, Bristol, Va. He led in the CENTENARY FUND promotion and contributed much to the success of the 1899 financial campaign for Emory and Henry College, which college awarded him an honorary D.D. degree in 1898. He was a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES).

Neighbors was an able preacher and wise counselor. Reporting to the Holston Conference at a session in the early 1950's, a young minister said, "I've got Dr. Neighbors to preach for me next Sunday." "Well," replied Bishop PAUL B. KERN, who was presiding at that session, "They'll get one good sermon."

It had been generally agreed that in the annals of Holston Conference no name ever stood higher as a preacher and man of God than that of William Samuel Neighbors. He died May 23, 1957, and was buried in Forest Hills Cemetery, CHATTANOOGA, Tenn.

NEILL, JOHN LAMBERT (1882-1972), American preacher, missionary to Central Europe, and conference leader, was born at Montrose, Miss., on Jan. 17, 1882. He was educated at MILLSAPS COLLEGE, receiving the B.S. in 1906. In 1908 he married Edith Reed (deceased April 1953). To them was born a daughter, Nellie (Mrs. Frank McKenzie Cross). J. L. Neill became first secretary of the Y.M.C.A. which was established at the Georgia Institute of Technology in 1906. The following year he joined the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, and thereafter served as pastor in Pass Christian, 1907-08; Magee, 1909; Lorman, 1910; Hattiesburg, 1911-13; and Laurel, 1913-15. Upon the call of the M.E. Church, South, then beginning its work in middle Europe, he became superintendent of the Methodist work in Prague, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, shortly after the first World War. He served in that capacity from 1922-25, and acted also as president of the Biblical Seminary in Prague during the same time. Upon his return to America, he became pastor of Yazoo City, 1926-27; Vicksburg, Crawford Street, 1928-31; Gulfport, 1932-33; Meridian, 1933-34; Brookhaven, 1936-39, NATCHEZ, 1940-41; superintendent of the Meridian district, 1942-43; of the Seashore District, 1944-47; pastor of First Church, Philadelphia, Miss., 1948-54; retiring in that year. He also served as president of the Mississippi Anti-Saloon League from 1937 to 1950. After retirement, he lived in Decatur, Miss., where he died in 1972.

NEITZ, SOLOMON (1821-1885), American Evangelical minister and renowned pulpit orator, was born April 2, 1821, in South Whitehall Township, Lehigh Co., Pa. He became a member of the East Pennsylvania Conference, EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in 1840 and held many official positions in annual and general conferences. He wrote the Life and Labors of John Seybert, the first bishop of the Evangelical Association. Solomon Neitz' visit to the mission field in GERMANY (1863), added much to the status of the work, since large state churches were opened to him and overflowing audiences gave him rapt attention. Philip Schaff declared "There are only two such German orators in the world, Krumacher in Germany, and Neitz in America."

With no training beyond three months in a common country school, his preparation had to be through personal application. This was possible, for he was richly endowed with unusual native talents, a craving for knowledge, and a will to use every spare moment for self-improvement. Furthermore, studying the Bible and catechism, with regular attendance at prayer-meeting, and worship services (at his father's insistence) laid a firm foundation of religious faith, resulting in an epochal conversion at age fourteen.

Contemporaries wrote of his magnetic personality, pronounced convictions, and ability to inspire vast audiences, not only with his skill in drawing word pictures, but by the unctuous power that characterized them. He died of apoplexy, May 11, 1885, in Reading, Pa.

NELLES, SAMUEL SOBIESKI (1823-1887), Canadian minister and educator, was born at Mount Pleasant, Upper Canada, Oct. 17, 1823. He was educated at Lewiston Academy and the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in New York, VICTORIA COLLEGE, and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (Connecticut), from which latter institution he graduated with the B.A. in 1846.

Samuel Nelles was taken on trial in 1847, but in 1850 he was appointed principal and professor of classics at Victoria College. Four years later he became president and held this office until his death in 1887.

The years during which Nelles presided over Victoria's destinies were crucial ones. When he took office, the college was seemingly on its last legs, having few students, no staff, and no money. Under his skillful and tenacious leadership, the college gradually increased its enrollment; new faculties were added; the debts were paid; and a modest endowment was accumulated. All this was accomplished in the face of great uncertainty about the college's future, generated by the intermittent efforts to establish a satisfactory working relationship between the University of Toronto and the various church colleges.

Throughout his career, President Nelles had two great aspirations—to make Victoria a great Christian university, and to assist in building a great provincial university in which each college would preserve its distinctive traditions. It may be said that he accomplished the first to such a degree that the second became possible under his successor, NATHANEAL BURWASH.

Although he was devoted to his duties as Victoria's president, Nelles was equally concerned for the welfare of his church. As was customary, he preached regularly in college and elsewhere. He was not a great orator, but his sermons were characteristically thoughtful, philosophical, and well-illustrated from literature and science. On occasion, "in a certain giant majesty of movement, he reached an altitude and amplitude of power that placed him side by side with the noblest of his time."

Nelles was keenly interested in missions and in church union, to both of which he contributed his breadth of judgment, his insight, and his zeal. For these and other services he was given a D.D. by Queen's University, and an LL.D. by Victoria.

At his death, Oct. 17, 1887, he was described as one whose broad and generous sympathies gave him a loving nearness to everybody. He saw good in everything. Inspiration flowed with his kindness, which lifted the troubled into peace. Indeed, the keen insight which he had of truth, and that hush of spirit, as if the unseen was upon him, is the best evidence that his mind was habitually fixed upon high and sacred things.

He requested that his tombstone should bear these words: "Now we see through a glass darkly."

JOHN NELSON

NELSON, JOHN (1707-1774), British preacher, was born in BIRSTALL, Yorkshire, in October 1707, and brought up to be a stone mason like his father. From the age of ten he was hypersensitive about his sins, and he regarded the fatal illness of his father when he was sixteen as God's punishment upon himself. At nineteen he sought marriage largely as an antidote to sexual temptation, but continued to be fitfully unhappy because he "loved pleasure more than God." He was especially addicted to hunting, but rather than destroy his gun he left home to follow his trade in different parts of the country. LONDON proved a constant magnet to him. A few years' residence there, however, proved detrimental to the health of his wife and children, so that they returned to Birstall. Nelson himself, however, stayed on, being convinced—as he told those who reproved him for not returning home—"I have something to learn that I have not yet learned." In London

he went from church to church, denomination to denomination, seeking spiritual peace. He was greatly impressed by WHITEFIELD's open air preaching in May 1739, but even more so with Wesley's first sermon in Moorfields on June 17, 1739. He became a constant hearer of the Wesleys, and in October experienced conversion, mainly through the influence of JOHN WESLEY and one of his soldier converts. He immersed himself in devotional reading, fasted every week-end, and urged others to be religious, even paying one of his fellow-workers to go and hear Wesley.

Meanwhile Nelson was happy to hear that some of his relations in Birstall were attending the preaching of BENJAMIN INGHAM, the Wesleys' colleague in OXFORD and GEORGIA. In the winter of 1740 he returned home expecting to find them also sharing his own radiant joy in a personal religious experience, but found them spiritually lifeless. He began to speak of his own far different experience, of knowing that his sins were forgiven. Increasingly large groups gathered in his home, some to listen sympathetically, some to dispute. Within a few days his brother was converted, then six of his neighbors, and eventually his wife Martha. Within three weeks the number of converts had increased to seventeen. It became clear that a rival fellowship was being created, owing allegiance to Nelson and through him to the Wesleys. Ingham sought unavailingly to restrain his enthusiastic preaching, although for some time they worked together in a group of societies many of which became Moravian.

In May 1742, John and CHARLES WESLEY stayed with Nelson in Birstall for a week, and from that time he unhesitatingly gave his full allegiance to them. He introduced Methodism into many towns and villages in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, continuing to support himself and his family by intermittent labors as a stone mason, often hewing stone during the day and preaching in the evening. On May 4, 1744, a long-hatched plot to press him for a soldier succeeded, and he was sent north for military training, though he continued to preach to his captors and the jeering populace, often with remarkable success. After nearly three months he was set free, largely through the intervention of the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON, urged on by the Wesleys. Shortly afterwards John Wesley employed Nelson fully as a regular itinerant preacher, and in that capacity he travelled for almost thirty years in many parts of the country, often as Assistant in charge of a Circuit. He spent much time in the circuits of BRISTOL, MANCHESTER, and LEEDS, in addition to his native town of Birstall. Indeed he seems to have been especially successful in the areas most affected by the Industrial Revolution, where his direct homely preaching continued to make a great impression upon working people. His last circuit was Leeds, where he had introduced Methodism a generation earlier. Here he died of apoplexy on July 18, 1774. Thousands of admirers accompanied his coffin through the streets of Leeds, singing or weeping, as he was taken for burial in his native Birstall.

Nelson's homespun narrative of his arrest by the press-gang, and of his brief sojourn in the army, proved to be rousing material for Methodist gatherings. Charles Wesley read a manuscript copy of this aloud to the Bristol society in September 1744, and John Wesley prepared it for publication the following month. It was entitled The Case of John Nelson, sold for threepence, and was snapped up so rapidly that a second edition was called for during that same month of October, and two more before the end of the year. In 1767 Nelson himself published a much larger work, in effect an expansion of this earlier one, for it took his story no further than April 1745. This was entitled An Extract from John Nelson's Journal, and became a best-seller, especially as edited and slightly abridged by John Wesley. Indeed this is probably the best known of the many autobiographies of Wesley's preachers, and has largely served to make Nelson Wesley's best known lay preacher.

NELSON, JUSTUS H. (1851-1937), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in 1851, probably in WISCONSIN. He studied at LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY at Appleton, Wis., and at the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, from which he graduated in 1879. In 1880, he was admitted on trial in the Providence, later New England Southern Conference.

By this time, WILLIAM TAYLOR had made his last voyage to South America (1877-78), and had returned to the United States to recruit missionaries who were to serve on a self-supporting basis. Nelson was one of his recruits.

While awaiting his appointment, Nelson studied a year at Boston University, taking an "eclectic Course in Medicine." This, plus a course in practical nursing taken after going to Brazil (in Belém, province of Paraná), enabled him to be of great usefulness in administering simple treatments to the poor.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson with William Taylor arrived in Belém on June 19, 1880, Taylor remaining only long enough to get a school successfully started. This school prospered and new recruits were sent out, including Justus' brother. But when yellow fever took the lives of two recruits and fire destroyed the school building, Nelson was forced to close it. He remained on the field, however, supporting himself and family by teaching English, German, and Portuguese.

When on his first furlough, leaving GEORGE NIND in charge of his work, Nelson asked that Brazil be organized into a district of the Providence Annual Conference, which was so done, with Nelson named presiding elder. He continued in this capacity until the Brazil Mission was organized into the South American Annual Conference (ME), to which he was then transferred.

Nelson organized the first Methodist church in Belém on July 1, 1883. In addition to pastoral work, he edited a religious publication which he called O Apologista Cristão Brasileiro (The Brazilian Christian Apologist). For this, he translated many hymns by Wesley and others. In one issue, he referred to the "idolatry prevalent in Brazil," and for this was sentenced to jail for "4 months, two days and 12 hours, being released April 8, 1893."

Nelson had hoped to stay in Brazil fifty years, working mainly in the Amazon region. But a depression forced his retirement in 1926, after forty-six years. He returned to the United States that year and died in 1937. He was survived by one son, Luther T. Nelson.

NELSON, REUBEN (1818-1879), American minister, educator and publisher, was born in Andes, N. Y., Dec. 16, 1818. One of twelve children of Abraham and Huldah Nelson, he became a Christian at fifteen, a local preacher at eighteen and joined the ONEIDA CONFERENCE at twenty-one, becoming a fully ordained member in due course. Meantime he served as third preacher on the Otsego and Westford circuits. He also was principal of Otsego Academy, Cooperstown, N. Y. In his youth he lost his lower right arm in a woolen mill. Because of a throat affection he stepped aside temporarily in 1843. He married Jane Scott Eddy, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Asa Eddy of Milford, N. Y., in 1842.

In 1844 the Oneida Conference established Wyoming Seminary, in Kingston, Pa., naming Reuben Nelson its first president, a position he held twenty-eight years, excepting two years (1862-63 and 1863-64), when he was presiding elder of Wyoming district. In 1868-69 he filled both responsibilities. Becoming a member of the WYOMING CONFERENCE in 1852, Nelson was elected to the quadrennial GENERAL CONFERENCE five times, beginning with 1860. In 1876 he was chairman of the Committee on Episcopacy. In 1872 and 1876 the General Conference elected him senior Agent of the Methodist BOOK CONCERN, with offices in NEW YORK. His second election was by acclamation in recognition of his successful administration at a time when many business enterprises were being ruined. He also was made treasurer of the church's Missionary Society. He held honorary degrees from Union College and DICKINSON COLLEGE.

Nelson was an able preacher, educator and business man. He died in New York City, Feb. 20, 1879, and was buried at Forty Fort, Pa.

NELSON, WILLIAM HAMILTON (1878-1956); American minister, author, and editor, was born at NEW ORLEANS, La., on April 6, 1878. He was educated at CENTENARY COLLEGE, now at Shreveport, La., SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and the University of Chicago. He joined the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, in 1902. He served churches in SAN ANTONIO, 1902; Palacios, 1903; Port Lavaca, 1907. In the TEXAS CONFERENCE he was appointed to Angleton, 1908; HOUSTON, 1909; President, Chapel Hill Female College, 1910. He transferred to the PACIFIC CONFERENCE (MES) in 1911 and was appointed to Santa Rosa. In 1913 he became superintendent of the Children's Home of CALIFORNIA. In 1915 he went to the Cartwright Church in PHOENIX, ARIZ., in the Los Angeles Conference. As a member of the Pacific Conference in 1916, he served Chico and Yuba City. From 1918 to 1934, he edited the Pacific Methodist Advocate in SAN FRANCISCO, traveling extensively over the Western States until publication ceased. He served Woodland, Calif., from 1935 until 1939 when he retired in the newly formed CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE. He was Western agent, correspondent and general representative of the Christian Advocate of NASHVILLE from 1934 to 1939, and was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his church in 1922.

In 1931, Nelson wrote a history of Centenary College, entitled Burning Torch and Flaming Fire. His Alluring Arizona appeared in 1927. Seven other volumes were published over a period of sixteen years: Tinker and Thinker—John Bunyan and Blood and Fire, William Booth were biographies. Nelson was a master of picturesque and pungent phrase.

After retirement he supplied several churches including Knight's Landing and Boulder Creek. He resided mostly at San Francisco, San Diego, and Santa Barbara, where he died Nov. 1, 1956, and was buried there.

MAURICE B. CREEK

NELSON, New Zealand, St. John's Church, the central Methodist Church, began its history when SAMUEL IRONSIDE conducted the first Methodist services in the open air before a congregation of newly arrived settlers. The first services organized by the settlers themselves were held in 1842 in a house built after the Maori manner, a local preacher conducting worship.

In 1843, JOHN ALDRED found the Wesleyans meeting in a place of worship built by public subscription for use by all denominations. It was called Ebenezer.

Later, a large brick schoolroom was built, and the Wesleyans moved there for their services and meetings.

In 1845, a brick church, forty-seven feet, costing £260 was opened. It seated two hundred persons, and was opened free of debt.

During the eloquent ministry of JOHN WARREN (1855-59), the church became too small. An acre of land was bought in Hardy Street, and the old church, with the land on which it was built, was sold. A new church was built on the new site and was opened in June, 1858, with a debt of only £145. A new parsonage was added later, then a gallery across the end of the church. By this time WILLIAM KIRK was the minister, and there was perpetual revival.

About thirty years later it was found that there were signs of decay in the church building. A new church to seat 550 people was opened in 1890. The cost of this building was £2,250, the minister at the time being William C. Oliver.

In 1899, during the ministry of J. S. Smalley, the parsonage, which had served for forty years, was replaced with a new one, toward the cost of which the congregation raised £1,144 in 1900.

Further buildings, a Sunday school hall and an infant school, were opened in 1912, J. J. Lewis being the minister. Bible class rooms followed in 1924, these being added to the old church building which had been shifted to the rear of the church site and was doing excellent service as a gymnasium. Youth work was flourishing at this time.

The membership of the circuit of which St. John's is the "mother church" was 482 in 1966.

Spring Grove Church was originally in the Nelson Circuit. It was built on a site of three acres, and was opened on April 18, 1858, P. Calder, D. Dolamore, and John Warren conducting the services. The building had cob walls consisting of an earthen formation. For many years there was a flourishing rural work, but with the changing character of the community, the work gradually declined, and for a number of years the building was not used. Shortly after centennial celebrations in 1958, the building was demolished.

The following entry in its baptismal register is of interest: "Ernest Rutherford, born 30th August, 1871, baptized 5th August, 1873. Son of James and Martha Rutherford, Wheelwright. Minister, Rev. W. Cannell."

Ernest Rutherford later became the first Baron Rutherford, eminent British chemist and physicist. Lord Rutherford won the Nobel Prize in chemistry in 1908. Later he effected the splitting and transmutation of the atom. He was made a peer in 1931 and died in 1937.

TAMATI WAKA NENE (1780-1871), FAMOUS MAORI CHIEFTAIN, AND FRIEND AND PROTECTOR OF EARLY MISSIONARIES TO NEW ZEALAND.

NENE, TAMATI WAKA (1780-1871), NEW ZEALAND Methodist layman and Maori chieftain and warrior, with his brother Patuone protected early Wesleyan missionaries from hostile attacks. When the brothers became Christians, Nene was baptized by a Wesleyan missionary and took the name of Tamati Waka (Thomas Walker). Patuone was baptized by an Anglican missionary and took the name of Eruera Maihi (Edward Marsh).

Nene was a good friend to the government as well as to the missionaries, and was one of the most convincing supporters of the Treaty of Waitangi, signed in 1840, by which sovereignty over New Zealand was ceded to the British Crown.

His services were recognized by the government, and he was granted a pension of £100 per year. In his later years he was greatly respected both by Maoris and Europeans. A government memorial erected in the Russell Anglican churchyard in his honor describes Nene as "the first to welcome the Queen's sovereignty to New Zealand: a consistent supporter of the Pakeha (white man)."

NEPAL is an independent constitutional monarchy in south central Asia, the world's only Hindu kingdom. It became a member of the United Nations in 1955. Nepal stands as a geographical and political buffer between the Republic of India and Tibet, which is controlled by Communist China. The area is over 54,000 square miles, the contour being a rectangle 525 miles long, averaging 120 miles wide, oriented northwest-southeast. The population is 10,294,000. The capital is Katmandu, population, 195,260.

Until 1960, the Himalayas, constituting Nepal's northern border, were considered impassable. However, the Communist Chinese, conquerors of Tibet, have thrust two effective roads across the vast massif to Nepal's border.

In the mid 1700's the land was conquered by hardy Hindu Gurkhas forced northwards from India by overpowering Moslems. Treaties were undertaken with Great Britain, commercial in 1791, political in 1801. A British Resident was admitted, to advise government. Britain also secured the privilege of recruiting a certain number of Gurkhas for the British Army in India. The Gurkha units remained loyal to Britain in the Sepoy Mutiny, 1857, and were the focal forces in overcoming that uprising. The valor of the Gurkha regiments in both World Wars was notable. The Republic of India inherited these units and the right of recruiting. The Gurkha battalion in the United Nations Force in the Congo, 1962-63, proved very effective.

King Mahendra ascended the throne of Nepal in 1956, being markedly liberal in attitude. The country is governed under a democratic constitution promulgated in 1959, adapting to Nepal the Panchayat form of village government in Hindu India. Britain has provided specialists for advice in forestry and agriculture. United States governmental aid has been directed to roads and communications, irrigation, and simple industries.

A ROYAL PALACE WAS PROVIDED BY THE KING OF NEPAL TO HOUSE THE FIRST HOSPITAL, CALLED SHANTA BHAWAN, AT KATMANDU.

United Mission to Nepal. With thirty denominational groups now affiliated, The United Mission to Nepal was actually organized as a Methodist project under the leadership of Bishop J. WASKOM PICKETT in 1953. The following year medical services were begun under the direction of Dr. BETHELE FLEMING. In 1955 two additional doctors, Edgar and Elizabeth Miller, were sent out by the Methodist Board of Missions. A palace belonging to the royal family was given to the mission for its hospital and has been in use since 1954 operating as Shanta Bhawan Hospital.

The United Mission operates four basic services: an educational program involving some 2,000 people; a technical institute for training skilled workmen; field hospitals; and dispensaries.

Nepal is dominated religiously by the Buddhists and Hindus, but there are increasing numbers of Christians throughout the country and they organize themselves ecumenically for work and worship. They may not legally seek converts to their Christian fellowships.

An indication of the growth and importance of this program is the appreciative recognition given by the King of Nepal to both the Flemings and the Millers. Their work began with eight staff members, ten hospital beds, and no nurses; the United Mission now has nearly 200 workers in the various aspects of the program. Nepal, until a change of regime in 1951, had been closed to all mission efforts. Some Roman Catholic mission work was begun in 1662, but this was expelled 100 years later. The remarkable and rapid development since 1953 by the United Mission has been the result of a progressive attitude on the part of the government and the willingness of Christian workers from thirty denominations to work together without denominational labels. The very difficult travel problems in Nepal have made it necessary to establish field service both for teaching public health and for actual medical treatment. A twenty-bed hospital has been built in Bhatgaon, east of Katmandu, where tuberculosis is their chief concern, but general medical care is also provided. A fifty-five-bed hospital has been built in Tansen.

There are now nine mission-managed schools, plus the technical and agricultural training centers. Increasingly the Nepalese are being trained to become leaders of these various programs. Natives are eventually to be in full charge. Nurses and doctors are being trained and extensive plans are under way for a very much enlarged central hospital and United Mission headquarters to be built in Katmandu.

NESBITT, SAMUEL H. (1821-1891), was an important American leader of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church during the last half of the nineteenth century. Born in Butler County, Pa., of Seceder parentage, Sept. 30, 1821, he died at the Methodist Parsonage at New Brighton, Pa., April 5, 1891. His early life was passed in PITTSBURGH where he learned and followed the trade of a nailer. Converted in 1842, he entered ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. Graduating with honors in three years, in 1847 he was admitted on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference. He was principal of the Wellsburg Female Seminary 1853-1856, and President of Richmond College 1857-1859. From 1859 until 1872 he was the editor of The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. He served as presiding elder on two districts for six years. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876, leading the Pittsburgh Conference delegation each time. A book from his pen, The Sabbath of the Bible, was published in 1890.

NESS, JOHN HARRISON (1891-), American E.U.B. pastor, conference superintendent, and denominational executive, was born Oct. 23, 1891 in Yoe, York County, Pa., to John Jefferson and Elizabeth Snyder Ness. He prepared for the ministry in LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (A.B. 1915) and continued his schooling in Princeton Theological Seminary, completing his work in 1919. Graduate studies in history and philosophy were taken in Johns Hopkins University. In 1925 Lebanon Valley College honored him with the D.D. degree.

In 1918 Dr. Ness was married to Miss Myra Grace Kiracofe, a college class-mate. To their union two sons were born: JOHN HERBERT and Robert Kiracofe Ness.

John Harrison Ness entered the Pennsylvania Annual Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1911, and was ordained in 1919. Following several student pastorates, he was appointed to First Church, York, Pa., in 1919, serving there until elected to the superintendency of the conference in 1931. Many times a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his church, Dr. Ness served on numerous important boards and commissions. He was elected publisher by the 1945 General Conference, which position he declined in order to remain in the superintendency. Later he did accept an election to serve his Church as Associate Secretary of the Board of Pensions (1948-1957), and Executive Secretary of the Board of Pensions (1957-1963).

Following retirement in 1963, Dr. Ness rendered special ministries to the United Church, PONCE, PUERTO RICO; the Ybor City Mission, TAMPA, Florida; the RED BIRD MISSION in KENTUCKY; and the Otterbein Home near Lebanon, Ohio.

Dr. Ness served on the central committee that prepared the details for the union of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ to form the E.U.B. Church in 1946.

In The United Methodist Church he holds his membership with the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. He makes his home in Dayton, Ohio.

NESS, JOHN H., JR. (1919-), American E.U.B. minister, was born in Hagerstown, Md., Sept. 29, 1919, to Myra Kiracofe Ness and JOHN HARRISON NESS. John, Jr. received his quarterly conference license from First United Brethren Church, York, Pa., in 1936; annual conference license from Pennsylvania Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, Oct. 8, 1940; and was ordained by the same conference, Oct. 3, 1944. Appointments were filled in MARYLAND and PENNSYLVANIA for fourteen years until he was elected the administrative leader of The HISTORICAL SOCIETY of The E.U.B. Church, DAYTON, Ohio, in September 1958. He held this position at the time of the formation of The United Methodist Church (1968). He married Lucille Hull, Feb. 26, 1944, and they had three children.

The following institutions conferred degrees upon him:

LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE, Annville, Pa., A.B. (1940), and L.H.D. (1964); University of Pennsylvania, M.A. (1942); and Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, B.D. (1945). He also received certificates from the 18th Institute of Modern Archival Administration, AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, 1964, and the Institute of Archival Administration, UNIVERSITY OF DENVER, 1967. His book, One Hundred Fifty Years, a history of publishing in The E.U.B. Church, was issued in 1966. Since 1963 Ness has served on the Church Records Committee, Society of American Archivists.

With the union of The Historical Society and the Association of Methodist Historical Societies in 1968, Dr. Ness became the executive secretary of the Commission on Archives and History of The United Methodist Church. He retains his membership in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE.

NEVADA, called both the "Silver State" and the "Sagebrush State," is in the western part of the United States. Its Spanish name means "snow-clad." It is bounded by OREGON and IDAHO on the north, UTAH and ARIZONA on the east, and by CALIFORNIA on the south and west. With an area of 110,540 square miles, it is seventh in size among the states. Its population in 1970 was 481,893.

A large part of Nevada is called the Great Basin, a tableland 4,000 to 5,000 feet above sea level. Much of the state is arid, its rivers ending in "sinks" where the water is absorbed by the dry air or seeps into the ground.

Among the early pioneers who explored parts of Nevada was the young Methodist trader JEDEDIAH S. SMITH who in 1827 crossed the state from west to east. In 1848, at the end of the war with MEXICO, Nevada, then known as the Washoe Territory of California, became a United States possession. In 1850 it became part of Utah Territory. In 1861 Utah was divided and the western part was called Nevada. In 1863 Nevada was admitted into the Union.

Permanent settlement in Nevada began in 1859 with the discovery of the Comstock Lode. Thousands of people then flocked to what proved to be one of the richest deposits of precious metals ever found. By 1881 the original mines were exhausted, and while other deposits were discovered they too were soon depleted. By 1920 the mining industry had lost its original importance. As time passed, some agriculture and cattle ranching developed; irrigation made the valleys very productive. Tourism is a large source of income for the state.

Gambling was legalized in Nevada in 1931, and the residence requirement for divorce was reduced to six weeks. Nevada has since become a resort center for gambling, and for marriage and divorce. Under the circumstances, church life has not flourished, and church membership among the population is about one-half what it is in the rest of the country.

The first Methodist preacher to come to Nevada was Jesse L. Bennett. Ordained in 1829 in ILLINOIS, he went to California with the gold rush. By 1858 he was preaching in Virginia City, Nev., and the communities in Carson Valley. Among others who came to Nevada was Warren Nims; he built four churches and six parsonages. The first deed for a religious meetinghouse was recorded by the Methodists, Aug. 13, 1860, for a church building in Virginia City. One of the men involved in the transaction was a Methodist layman, HENRY C. BLASDEL, who became the first governor of the state.

The churches in Nevada were organized into a conference at Virginia City, Sept. 7, 1865 with Bishop CALVIN KINGSLEY presiding. The conference had two districts—Washoe and Humboldt, eleven preachers, seventeen pastoral appointments, four church buildings, and 267 members. In 1884 the Nevada Mission superseded the Nevada Conference. In 1917 the mission was abolished, and the Nevada work was divided between the two California Conferences (MEC).

Today White Pine County, Nev., is a part of the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE. The part of the state below the thirty-seventh parallel (chiefly Clark County and Las Vegas) is in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE. The remaining and larger portion of Nevada is in the CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE.

Since 1920 Nevada's population has grown, and Methodism's increase in the state has been proportionate. In 1968 about 2.5 per cent of Nevadans were members of The Methodist Church. Methodism has built new churches in the RENO-LAKE Tahoe area, and in Las Vegas the denomination has been especially vigorous in expansion and building programs.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had twenty-one pastoral appointments, 6,622 church members, and property valued at $4,906,795 in Nevada. The distribution of appointments, members, and property among the three conferences serving the state was as follows:

| | | | |
|-------------------|----|-------|-------------|
| California-Nevada | 13 | 2,842 | $2,150,769 |
| Rocky Mountain | 1 | 254 | 95,576 |
| Sou. Calif.-Ariz. | 7 | 3,526 | 2,660,450 |

NEW BEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., located fifty miles south of BOSTON on the west side of Buzzards Bay with a population (1970) of 101,262 has, since its founding in 1652, been known as one of the foremost Atlantic seaports. Its federal period whaling, well known through Herman Melville's Moby Dick, has given way to twentieth century diversified industries.

JESSE LEE preached there on Jan. 30, 1795, but a number of years elapsed before a strong Methodist society was formed. Originally attached to the Warren circuit in the state of RHODE ISLAND, a Methodist congregation with thirty members and Epaphras Kibby as pastor was founded in New Bedford in 1807. Fifty years later there were five congregations with 715 members and 509 Sunday school students. Today there are three churches in New Bedford; in order of present size they are: St. Paul's, Trinity, and Wesley. These churches have an aggregate of 1,214 members and 461 church school students (1970).

NEW BERN, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. The city of New Bern has long been a center of Methodist activity in the state of NORTH CAROLINA and its "Mother Church," CENTENARY, was cited in 1966 as the oldest Methodist Church in continuous service in the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. The earliest mention of Methodism in New Bern is found in a 1760 letter from James Reed, Anglican missionary for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, who noted the great number of dissenters in his parish, among whom were some Methodists whom he described as "ignorant, censorious and uncharitable." Later, Reed recorded a visit by GEORGE WHITEFIELD to New Bern and quoted him as saying that the Methodists previously referred to were not "regular Methodists," as none were Methodists who did not follow either JOHN WESLEY or himself.

In the closing days of 1772, JOSEPH PILMORE, who was sent by John Wesley to the American colonies, preached in New Bern and observed: "In all my travels through the world I have met with none like the people of New Bern." Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY visited New Bern on several occasions, as recorded in his Journal: On earlier visits he was obliged to preach in the local Episcopal Church, but he noted in an entry on Feb. 20, 1804: "We moved a subscription to raise one thousand dollars to enlarge and finish the chapel; we have obtained six hundred dollars. Brother McCaine preached, and there was something of a shout." LORENZO DOW visited New Bern in 1804.

The Methodist Society at New Bern was originally a part of the Carolina and Tar River Circuits of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. In 1786 the appointment was called "New Bern, New River and Wilmington." In 1796 the New Bern Society, including both whites and Negroes, consisted of some 100 members. The New Bern Methodists were organized into a congregation in 1802 and soon thereafter purchased a lot on the corner of what is now Hancock Street and Church Alley. The plain wooden structure was called "Andrew's Chapel." M. S. Bulchard was assigned to serve the charge prior to 1800, but there is no record of the New Bern station until the visit of Bishop Asbury in 1803 when he made plans for the establishment of a permanent church.

Following a twenty-day revival conducted by John Edwards, the membership of Andrew's Chapel grew so rapidly that a larger church building became necessary. In 1843-1844 a new church was constructed on the south side of New Street between Hancock and Metcalf Streets, and the name was changed to "Centenary." The third and present building, located on the corner of New and Middle Streets, was completed in 1904. Though an extensive fire on Sept. 15, 1935, destroyed much of the structure, it was soon rebuilt. The eight German stained glass windows in the sanctuary are valued at $30,000 each. The Centenary Church Sunday school became, in 1920, the first one in the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church, South, to be organized into departments so as to more adequately meet the needs of all ages. The John A. Russell Christian Education Building, named in honor of the minister who guided the building program and supervised its construction, is valued at nearly $200,000. It was completed in 1936; and ten years later a major renovation project for the church was undertaken.

When, in 1802, the M. E. Church was further divided into conferences, New Bern became the center of the New Bern District of the Virginia Conference; it is today the headquarters of the New Bern District of the North Carolina Conference of The United Methodist Church. The North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church, organized in 1838, held its third session in New Bern in January 1840. Following the establishment of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church, South, its annual sessions were held in New Bern in 1846, 1858, 1888, 1900, 1907, 1921, 1936. The North Carolina Conference of The Methodist Church met in New Bern in 1957.

There are four Methodist churches in New Bern today: Centenary, Garber, Riverside and Trinity Churches. Trinity Church developed as a result of the establishment of the U.S. Marine Corps Air Station at Cherry Point near New Bern, and by the expansion of the city limits. It was chartered with forty-one members on Sept. 13, 1953. A cornerstone-laying service was held in September 1964, and the new sanctuary was first used on Feb. 14, 1965. Trinity Church has 512 members and a plant valued at $189,500. Garber Church was organized in November 1959. Its first unit was constructed in January 1961, and in 1970 it had a membership of 199. It was named in honor of Bishop PAUL N. GARBER. The Riverside Church has a membership of 441. The Centenary Church has a membership of 1,376.

NEW CASTLE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., located forty-three miles southwest of PITTSBURGH at the point where the Shenango and Mohoning Rivers meet to form the Beaver, has a population (1970) of 38,457. The community, settled in 1798, is situated in an area of abundant natural resources—coal and limestone.

Although the first Methodist meetings were held four miles north of the city by exhorter William Richard in 1804, services during the same year were also held in the city itself. James Watts in 1810 brought together a class of ten persons. Five years later the first structure, a log building, to house a Methodist congregation in New Castle was erected; the following year, 1821, New Castle appears in the Minutes of the Church as a distinct appointment with S. R. Brockunier as pastor. In 1836 a frame building replaced the log structure; later a brick building was constructed.

Another Methodist society was organized in 1847 with a building erected in 1850. Thereafter, Methodism continued to grow. According to the General Minutes of 1970 there are eight Methodist churches in New Castle with a total membership of 3,223 persons, and a total church school enrollment of 1,637 students.

NEW CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH was formed in 1881 by members of the Waresboro Mission and others involved in a rural church consolidation enforced by the Board of Domestic Missions of the GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. In protest of the consolidation, the group withdrew and formed the new body at Waycross, Ga., using the Constitution of the CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH as their model. They adopted a loosely connectional system, rejecting particularly the system of annual conference assessments.

They also baptized by immersion and allowed foot washing at communion.

An early growth was stopped by the death of several leaders and the withdrawal of a number of congregations who joined the Congregational Methodist Church. At the present time, they have thirteen congregations, seven in GEORGIA and six in FLORIDA. They have no connections with any ecumenical bodies.

NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE originally included all of the New England states and a portion of CANADA. It was one of the six original conferences with definite boundaries created by the 1796 GENERAL CONFERENCE. The first session of the New England Conference was held at WILBRAHAM, Mass., Sept. 19, 1797.

As time passed other conferences were carved out of New England Conference territory as follows: the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1800, the MAINE CONFERENCE in 1825, the NEW HAMPSHIRE and VERMONT Conference in 1830, and the PROVIDENCE CONFERENCE in 1840. The setting off of these conferences finally reduced the New England Conference to those sections of MASSACHUSETTS surrounding the district centers of Springfield, Worcester, Lynn, and BOSTON. In 1962, however, the churches in extreme western Massachusetts which had been linked with the TROY CONFERENCE and the New York Conference were returned to the New England Conference.

Though reduced in size geographically as time passed, the influence and service of the New England Conference increased. Between 1830 and 1840 some 150 men were received on trial in the conference. WILBRAHAM ACADEMY, WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and the Methodist Biblical Institute (forerunner of BOSTON UNIVERSITY) came into being before 1840. At Tremont Street Church, Boston, the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized in 1869. In 1913 there were thirty-eight deaconesses working in Boston. These women organized associations that brought into being the New England Deaconess Hospital and the retirement homes at Concord and Magnolia. Within the New England Conference the GOODWILL INDUSTRIES which now encircle the globe were organized in 1912.

Urbanization and changes in population and transportation have altered the structure and strategy of the twentieth century New England Conference. Between 1900 and 1960 only three new Methodist churches were organized within the conference, while in the same period forty-three churches were closed, sixteen of them in Boston. However, fourteen federated parishes came into being and twenty-four merged congregations formed "new" churches. Corporate ministries, inner city work in Springfield and Boston, as well as an ad hoc Boston Metropolitan Methodist Planning Commission, are seeking to grapple with contemporary problems.

The New England Conference Commission on Archives and History is one of the strongest in the denomination. In cooperation with the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY Library, it maintains a good collection on Methodist history.

In 1970 the New England Conference had 201 charges, 289 ministers, 31,247 Church school pupils, 71,643 church members, and property valued at $60,093,539.

In 1970 the New England Conference and the New ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE merged to form the Southern New England Conference.

NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE was organized at Fall River, Mass., April 13, 1881 with Bishop JESSE T. PECK presiding. It superseded the PROVIDENCE CONFERENCE in accordance with an enabling act adopted by the 1880 GENERAL CONFERENCE permitting that conference to change its name. The territory of the New England Southern Conference was the part of CONNECTICUT lying east of the Connecticut River, RHODE ISLAND, and southeastern MASSACHUSETTS. In 1881 the conference reported three districts, Providence, Providence North, and New Bedford. There were 186 charges and 22,564 members. The conference came to unification in 1939 with three districts, 172 charges and 34,374 members.

Among the earliest churches organized within the bounds of what came to be the New England Southern Conference were: Tolland, Thompson, Manchester, and New London in Connecticut; Acushnet, Scituate, Somerset, and Truro in Massachusetts; and East Greenwich and Portsmouth in Rhode Island. The first Methodist society in Rhode Island was organized at Warren in 1791. The first session of an annual conference in the region, and indeed in all New England, was held at Tolland, Conn. in 1793. The first Methodist parsonage in Connecticut, and possibly the first in New England, was built at Square Pond (now Crystal Lake) in 1795. During the celebration of the BICENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM in 1966, plans were projected for restoring the old parsonage. One of the first CAMP MEETINGS in New England was conducted at Square Pond in 1806. Other camp meetings were held at different times in Willimantic, Yarmouth, and Oak Bluffs on MARTHA'S VINEYARD.

During its history the New England Southern Conference developed service institutions. Deaconesses began work among needy children in Fall River, Mass., in 1893, and about the same time a home for working girls was established in Providence. Fleidner Hall, a boarding home for young women, was built in Pawtucket in 1911. A home for the aged was projected in East Providence in 1966. East Greenwich Academy (see RHODE ISLAND) was maintained by the conference. In 1945 Camp Aldersgate was established on a one hundred-acre tract at Glocester, Rhode Island. An administrative office for the conference was set up in Providence in 1956.

In 1970 the New England Southern Conference reported three districts, Connecticut, New Bedford, and Providence. There were 114 charges, 159 ministers, 147 congregations, 35,097 church members, 17,035 Church school pupils, and property valued at $29,734,075.

In 1970 the New England Southern Conference and the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE merged to form the Southern New England Conference.

Camp Aldersgate, Scituate, Mass., is a camp originally owned by the New England Southern Conference of The Methodist Church. Purchased from Grace Protestant Episcopal Church of Providence, R. I., in 1944 for $13,000, it consisted of 100 acres of land, containing houses and an artificial, spring-fed lake covering seventeen acres of the land. In addition to its use as a children's camp, youth institutes and assemblies were held during the early years.

Sponsored by both the New England Southern and the New England Conferences and directed by the executive secretary of the Boards of Education of both Conferences, the program moved from an emphasis upon institute and assembly programs, to a stress on the significance of outdoor camping and small-group living as a means for Christian nurture. Camp Aldersgate is presently used for a twelve-week summer camping program designed for whole families, children, junior high and high school youth. By purchase or legacy, the camp now owns more than 250 acres of woodland. It is now under the reorganized New England Conference of The United Methodist church.

NEW GUINEA is, next to AUSTRALIA itself, the largest island in the Southern Hemisphere. The western half, West Irian, now controlled by INDONESIA, is not the responsibility of Australian Methodism. The eastern half is divided into two sections although these are controlled jointly by Australia.

In this eastern half the northern section was German territory from 1884 to 1914 and is now an Australian Trust Territory. The southern section has been a direct Australian Government responsibility since 1884; it is this section which is called Papua.

The islands of New Britain, NEW ZEALAND, and smaller islands to the east of the mainland of New Guinea are part of the Trust Territory of New Guinea.

These regions comprise people of many types, mainly Melanesian, with about 500 different languages. For the organization of the work in these islands into one administrative body see UNITED CHURCH OF PAPUA, NEW GUINEA AND THE SOLOMON ISLANDS.

Highlands Challenge: Nov. 28, 1950 was the official opening of the first mission station in the New Guinea Highlands. In a completely new, unevangelized area, the Methodist Church of Australasia is at work among people whose existence was unknown to the world before World War II. Estimates of their numbers vary up to one million people. Mendi was the first area chosen for the pioneer missionaries and because of the aggressive nature of the inhabitants, no women were allowed to accompany them for the first twelve months. The great barrier proved to be language and many varied dialects were identified.

It was eleven years before the first conversions and baptisms were recorded but since then, the gospel has spread vigorously through the villages. New circuits at Tari and Nipa have been opened. Native pastors and local preaches have been trained and are transported by helicopter, over the mountains, to speak to their own people in nearby valleys. Churches, schools, hospitals have been established and agricultural guidance given to these primitive people. Language translation work, both for school books and scriptures, is being undertaken. Maternal and infant welfare work and the Hansenside Centre established at Tari have been received gratefully by the people in this newest twentieth century mission.

Malmaluan Youth Training Centre, established in 1964 was constructed by a work party of voluntary assistants from Australia in 1963. It provides one Long Course per year for up to sixty students from all denominations in the Territory desiring to participate. In addition, Short Courses, Student Conferences, Weekend and Weeklong Conferences are conducted for up to 300 students. Courses are provided in Christian Education for all ages, Youth Leadership, Group Dynamics and Community Development from the Christian View. Guest lecturers from overseas are invited.

Malmaluan is the first lay or youth leadership center in New Guinea with a full-time director, the Rev. John Mavor, and two lay assistants. It serves the whole of Papua, New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. During each year, thousands gather at the center for its special services, at Easter, Pentecost, etc.

The director also travels around the islands for a part of each year, conducting regional courses in all fields of Christian Education. Malmaluan (a New Guinea name meaning "Deep Peace") Training Centre is a liaison point between parent churches of Australia and New Zealand and the younger Pacific Churches.

Missionary Martyrs: The heaviest blow received to the work of the Australian Methodist Overseas Missions came when ten of their finest missionaries, including eight ministers, were killed in 1942. As prisoners of war they were herded together on a Japanese freighter which was sunk by an allied submarine.

They had been stationed together in New Britain, but as the enemy thrust came further south towards Australia and the territory, the danger drew nearer and all women and children from the missionary homes throughout New Guinea were recalled home. However, the men chose to remain with the people they were serving and were consequently trapped by the Japanese advance to disappear into prisoner of war camps. For three years there was complete silence about their fate. Only after the cessation of hostilities were the facts learned concerning one Sunday in June 1942, when they were crowded with hundreds of soldiers and civilians on to the "Montevideo Maru" to be transferred to a prison camp in JAPAN. Some time between June 22 and July 1, the vessel was torpedoed off the coast of Luzon in the PHILIPPINES. There were no survivors. When the news reached Australia in 1945, a Service of Remembrance was held in Wesley Chapel, SYDNEY and at this service, four of the wives of the men killed, announced their intention of going back to New Guinea as soon as possible.

The names of those who perished were: L. A. MacArthur, W. L. I. Lingood, W. D. Oakes, H. J. Pearson, J. W. Poole, H. B. Shelton, T. N. Simpson, J. Trevitt, S. C. Beazley, and E. W. Pearse.

NEW HAMPSHIRE, a New England state and one of the original thirteen colonies, was named after Hampshire, England. Called the "granite state," New Hampshire has 182 mountains over 3,000 feet high, including Mt. Washington (6,288 feet), the highest mountain in the northeast. New Hampshire ratified the constitution of the United States on June 21, 1788, being the ninth and deciding state to do so. Forty-fourth among the states in size, New Hampshire has 9,304 square miles, about eighty-four per cent of it covered by forests.

Among the early explorers who visited New Hampshire were Martin Pring (1603), Samuel de Champlain (1605), and Captain John Smith (1614). In 1641-79, 1689-92, and 1699-1741, New Hampshire was joined to the MASSACHUSETTS Colony, but during the intervening years and until 1775, it was under royal governors. A provisional government was formed in 1776 and a state constitution was adopted in 1784.

The earliest authenticated Methodist service in New Hampshire was held at the home of James Robertson in Chesterfield in 1772. At the request of Robertson, PHILIP EMBURY preached on that occasion. In the next eighteen years there were numerous unsuccessful attempts to establish Methodism in New Hampshire. Then in 1790, JESSE LEE was appointed to New England. On his first trip to BOSTON in that year, Lee went as far north as Portsmouth, N. H. In the following year he visited the state again and wrote, "We had a meeting in a private house. At Mr. Lindsay's request I preached on Psalm 1:6. I found it to be a time of much life and love and some of the people appeared to be much affected. When the service was ended some of the people blessed God for our meeting; all seemed friendly." In 1794 Lee became presiding elder in New England, and John Hill was appointed to New Hampshire under him.

Presumably John Hill gave attention to Chesterfield, because it had sixty-eight members in 1796 and the Chesterfield Circuit was formed that year. Lee wrote of Chesterfield, "It lay in the southwest corner of the State, near the Connecticut River. . . . The first society formed in the State was in Chesterfield, some time in 1795, at which time there were but a few that felt the freedom to unite with us. After some time a few more cast in their lots, and other societies were soon formed in other places. The circuit was entered upon the annual minutes in the year 1796. Some time after this there was a circuit formed higher up in the State called Landaff, and in that place religion prospered very much." The records confirm Lee's statement. By 1799 CHESTERFIELD had 131 members.

In 1804 the New Hampshire District was formed, and JOHN BRODHEAD was appointed presiding elder. In 1809 when MARTIN RUTER was appointed to succeed Brodhead, there were 1,673 members in New Hampshire.

The New Hampshire and Vermont Conference (NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE after 1831) was organized on June 19, 1829 at Portsmouth. The next year the conference reported 11,757 members, of whom 7,750 were in New Hampshire. In 1844, the New Hampshire Conference was divided to form the Vermont Conference.

The first Methodist seminary (secondary school) in New England was located in that part of Newmarket which is now Newfields, opening on Sept. 1, 1817. Newmarket was the first permanent educational institution founded by the Methodists in America. Soon a branch of the academy was located in Kingston, but because of continual financial deficits, it was transferred to WILBRAHAM, Mass., and in that location it was the beginning of Methodism's Wilbraham Academy. Another Methodist academy was started at Franklin, but soon afterward it was merged with the seminary at Tilton. The first meeting of the board of trustees of the TILTON SCHOOL was held in May, 1845. The institution was chartered by the General Court in 1852. Supported by the New Hampshire Conference, the Tilton School continues to serve as a junior college. It dedicated a new chapel in 1966. The Wesleyan Biblical Institute was started in Newbury, Vt., and was relocated in Concord, N. H. in 1847 and was incorporated as the Methodist General Biblical Institute. In 1868 it was moved to Boston where it later became the School of Theology of BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

New Hampshire Methodism has furnished two men for the episcopacy, OSMON C. BAKER and EDGAR BLAKE. Many of its ministers have served as chaplains in the armed service of the nation, in hospitals, homes, the state legislature, and state prisons, and as campus ministers and missionaries abroad and at home. In 1967, several were serving in Africa, JAPAN, and MALAYA.

Since 1844 the boundaries of the New Hampshire Conference have changed little. Today it includes all of the churches in New Hampshire, ten in Massachusetts, and one in Vermont. In 1968, it had two districts, 97 ministers, and 19,272 members.

NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE began as the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference in 1829. In 1831 it was incorporated by the state legislature as the New Hampshire Conference. Formed by dividing the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference was organized on June 19, 1829 at Portsmouth during the regular session of the parent conference, Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING presiding.

As one of the original conferences, the New England body dates from 1796. At the beginning it included the state of New York. In 1800 the New England Conference was divided to form the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, and at the outset the latter body included all of CONNECTICUT and parts of MASSACHUSETTS, NEW HAMPSHIRE, and VERMONT. In 1804 New Hampshire and Vermont were placed in the New England Conference where they remained until the formation of the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference in 1829.

The first session of the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference following organization was held at Barre, Vt., in June, 1830. Becoming the New Hampshire Conference in 1831, the body met alternately in New Hampshire and Vermont until 1844 when it was divided to form the Vermont Conference.

The first authenticated Methodist preaching service in New Hampshire was held at CHESTERFIELD in the home of James Robertson who had come from SCOTLAND in 1762. At his request PHILIP EMBURY came and preached in his house in 1772 and organized a class of five members. The religious zeal of those members gave the road through the town the name of "Christian Street" which it still bears. JESSE LEE preached in Chesterfield in 1793, and on June 20, 1803, Bishop ASBURY came and delivered a sermon in Robertson's house. In 1796 Chesterfield had sixty-eight members, and at the conference that year Philip Wager was appointed to the Chesterfield Circuit.

At its session in 1830, the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference had three districts, forty-two ministers, fifty-four appointments, and 11,757 members, some 7,750 of them in New Hampshire. In 1845, the year following the formation of the Vermont Conference, the New Hampshire Conference had 10,621 members.

There have been few changes in the boundaries of the New Hampshire Conference since the Vermont Conference was set off from it in 1844. The conference now includes all of the churches in New Hampshire, ten in Massachusetts, and one in Vermont.

In 1970, the New Hampshire Conference had two districts—Northern and Southern—ninety-seven ministers, seventy pastoral charges, 19,272 church members, and churches, parsonages and other property valued at $12,405,347.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A., population 133,543 (1970), is situated at the mouths of the Quinnipiac, Mill and West Rivers, and at the head of New Haven Harbor. The city was settled on April 10, 1638, by immigrant Puritans. It is the seat of Yale University and has over 1,000 large and small manufacturing concerns. Industrial development was begun on a large scale in 1798 when Eli Whitney, inventor of the cotton gin, returned from GEORGIA and started a gun factory.

JESSE LEE visited New Haven and preached the first Methodist sermon on June 21, 1789, in the court house. The president of Yale and many students were present. Lee returned on July 5, 1789 and was allowed to preach in the Congregational Church. "Some told me they were much pleased with the discourse," he said, "but no man asked me home with him." However, a gentleman later came to Lee's hotel and invited him to his home.

In 1790 New Haven Circuit was formed and extended from Milford to Hartford. John Lee was the first pastor and formed a class of nine people. The city was connected with surrounding churches until 1814 when it became a station. In 1800 a house was bought and used until 1807 when a building was erected on Temple Street. In 1820 a larger building was erected on the public green, and in 1848 the church moved to its present location on the corner of Elm and College Streets.

Congregationalism had a strong foothold in New Haven, and it was difficult for Methodism to grow. However, East Pearl Street Church was established in 1833 and St. Andrews in 1883. In 1954 Grace merged with the Howard Avenue Church to form Wesley; and Summerfield and Hope were put on a two point charge in 1965. Park Church remained a station church.

After the War between the States, immigration increased from the Roman Catholic countries of Europe, and all Protestant groups were vastly outnumbered in New Haven. Moreover, there has been the tendency as the city becomes more industrialized, for the older settled families to move to the suburbs and affiliate with churches there. However, the Negro migration from the South to the Northern cities has greatly increased the membership of the Negro branches of Methodism. Several old Negro Methodist churches are located in New Haven. Varick A.M.E. Zion was begun in 1818. Bethel A.M.E. Church was begun in 1837, and St. Paul's U.A.M.E. Church was established in 1849. Evers A.M.E. Zion Church has flourished, and Scott Tabernacle was organized in 1965.

NEW JERSEY, one of the thirteen original states, is located between PHILADELPHIA and NEW YORK, two important population and business centers since colonial times. With 7,836 square miles and a population of 7,084,992 (1970 census), the state ranks forty-sixth in size and eighth in population. New Jersey was settled by the Dutch early in the seventeenth century, and it was the scene of much action in the American Revolution. The state has vast shipping facilities, and it has a heavy concentration of factories, highways, railroads, and farms. It ranks first in the value of chemical products, and is a leader in many other fields. Princeton and Rutgers are outstanding universities.

New Jersey has been identified with Methodism since its beginning in America. In 1739-40 GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in ten places in New Jersey and also on Staten Island, New York, which was long associated with New Jersey Methodism. JOHN EARLY, a lay preacher, arrived from IRELAND in 1764 and settled at Penny Hill (now Wrightstown). After Whitefield, Early was the first Methodist preacher in New Jersey. John and William Wright gave a tract of land to the Methodists at Penny Hill in 1761, and there, though the exact date is not known, one of the earliest Methodist meetinghouses was erected. The first edifice was replaced by a larger one in 1795. FRANCIS ASBURY preached at Penny Hill in 1782, 1784, and 1795.

Captain THOMAS WEBB organized the first Methodist class or society in New Jersey. He went from New York to Philadelphia in 1767 or 1768 and preached at New Mills, Trenton, and Burlington en route. Afterward he visited those places several times, and he formed a class at Burlington in 1770 with JOSEPH TOY, his first convert, as the leader. It is believed that Webb organized classes at New Mills and Trenton about the same time. JOSEPH PILMORE and RICHARD BOARDMAN, who came as JOHN WESLEY's first official missionaries to America in 1769, traveled extensively across New Jersey.

Asbury made eighty-six recorded tours of New Jersey, and he and his compere developed scores of Methodist societies. Asbury preached first at Burlington on Nov. 6, 1771, a few days after his arrival in America; thence he crossed the province to Staten Island, N. Y. by the Perth Amboy ferry and preached at Peter Van Pelt's house on November 9 and 10, his first sermons in the province of New York. In the early years New Jersey Methodists also heard JESSE LEE, RICHARD WHATCOAT, WILLIAM McKENDREE, EZEKIEL COOPER and scores of other preachers.

THOMAS RANKIN conducted the first Methodist conference in America at Philadelphia in July 1773. Of the 1,160 Methodist members in America at that time, 200 were in New Jersey. At that conference ten preachers were assigned to six circuits, one of the circuits being New Jersey and Staten Island. From 1781 to 1786 there were two circuits in New Jersey—West Jersey and East Jersey. Trenton was added as a circuit in 1786. In 1794 there were 2,439 Methodists in the state. The Philadelphia Conference dates from 1788, and New Jersey was a district in that conference. A presiding elder and fifteen preachers were assigned to the New Jersey District in 1801. In 1803 the Jersey District reported eight appointments, fifteen preachers, and 4,463 members. In 1811 the East Jersey and West Jersey Districts reported together 6,980 members with twenty-four preachers assigned to fifteen appointments. In 1829 the East Jersey, West Jersey, and Asbury Districts, representing the entire state, had thirty-three appointments, fifty-one preachers, and 12,669 members.

In 1836 the New Jersey Conference was formed by dividing the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. At the time the new conference included New Jersey, Staten Island, and some adjacent New York and Pennsylvania territory. The 1856 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the NEWARK CONFERENCE by dividing the New Jersey Conference. At the beginning the Newark Conference included the northern part of New Jersey, Staten Island, and parts of Pennsylvania and New York. With some changes in boundaries these conferences have continued, but in 1965 their names were changed to SOUTHERN NEW JERSEY and NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

The METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH had work in New Jersey. At the beginning in 1830, Methodist Protestantism in New Jersey was divided between the New York and Pennsylvania Conferences of the denomination. In 1838 the General Conference designated the part of New Jersey that had been attached to Pennsylvania as the New Jersey Conference, but the journals of the New Jersey Conference say it was not organized until 1841. Apparently all of Methodist Protestantism in New Jersey considered itself a part of the New York Conference from 1838 to 1841. In 1877 the New Jersey Conference reported twenty-one preachers and 2,121 members. This conference continued until October 1912, when it was merged with the Eastern Conference. At the time of the merger the New Jersey Conference had thirty-six preachers, thirty-six charges, and 4,284 members. The New Jersey part of the Eastern Conference merged with the Newark and New Jersey Conferences of The Methodist Church at unification in 1939.

The A.M.E., A.M.E. ZION, and C.M.E. CHURCHES have work in New Jersey. The first is represented by two annual conferences, New Jersey and South Jersey; the second has a New Jersey Conference, while the New Jersey work of the third is a part of its New York-Washington Conference.

New Jersey Methodism has contributed leaders to the church. THOMAS WARE, THOMAS MORRELL, and JEREMIAH LAMBERT stood out in the early days. Six men have been elected bishops while serving as members of the Newark Conference: ISAAC W. WILEY (1872), JOHN F. HURST (1880), JAMES N. FITZGERALD (1888), HENRY SPELLMEYER (1904), JOHN WESLEY LORD (1948), and FRED G. HOLLOWAY (1960). Six bishops served part of their ministry in New Jersey, but were conference members elsewhere when elected: EDMUND S. JAMES (1844), JOHN H. VINCENT (1888), CHARLES B. MITCHELL (1916), CHARLES L. MEAD (1920), W. EARL LEDDEN (1944), and LLOYD C. WICKE (1948). Two bishops were born in New Jersey, but served no part of their ministry there prior to their election: THEODORE H. HENDERSON (1912), and FRED P. CORSON (1944). One could compile a long list of prominent preachers and leading laymen who have served Methodism in New Jersey.

In 1840 the New Jersey Conference appointed a visiting committee to the Methodist Episcopal Male Seminary, now PENNINGTON SCHOOL, at Pennington. In the same year the conference agreed to pay $500 to DICKINSON COLLEGE from the conference education fund, and requested each preacher to raise $5 during the year to reimburse the fund. CENTENARY (junior) COLLEGE FOR WOMEN was established at Hackettstown in 1867. DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY began in 1866.

Today there are Methodist Homes for the Aged at OCEAN GROVE, Ocean City, Branchville, and Collingswood, as well as the Bancroft-Taylor Rest Home at Ocean Grove for deaconesses and missionaries, and another Deaconess Home at Camden. Also, in New Jersey are the famous religious resort at Ocean Grove and the Pitman Grove Camp Meeting in Gloucester County not far from Philadelphia.

The ratio of the total membership of the two New Jersey Conferences to the population of the state in 1810, 1840, and 1967 is shown in the table below. Percentage-wise 1840 was the peak year. The reader will remember that in the early years parts of Pennsylvania and New York were in the New Jersey Conference and that a small portion of New York is still attached to the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE.

| Year | Total Membership of N.J. Conferences | New Jersey Population | Methodist Percentage |
| 1810 | 6,839 | 245,562 | 2.8 |
| 1840 | 23,275 | 373,306 | 6.2 |
| 1967 | 204,853 | 7,004,000 (est.) | 2.9 |

In 1970 the two New Jersey Conferences reported eight districts, 538 charges, about 654 ministers, 197,693 members, property valued at $158,654,875, and a total of $13,947,895 raised for all purposes during the year.

NEW LONDON, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A. JESSE LEE preached at the Court House at New London on Sept. 2, 1789, as he was making his first visit to the towns along the shores of Southern New England. Bishop ASBURY followed him in 1791. In 1793, a circuit was formed, including Windham, Hebron, Glastonbury, Lyme, and into Rhode Island, with GEORGE ROBERTS the first presiding elder. Organizing as a church in 1793, the people held services in the Court House at the head of the main street. The first church building was erected in 1798 with both Jesse Lee and Francis Asbury present. This was the church home of Epaphras Kibby, who served sixty-seven years in the ministry. Bishop Asbury held Annual Conference here on July 5, 1795 with nineteen preachers present. On April 17, 1808 Conference assembled here for the second time with fifty preachers present, and held ordination services in the Congregational Church. The second church building was dedicated in 1817. Bishop Asbury wrote his last will and testament at New London in 1813, which contains the words "I will give it all to the Book Concern." In 1840 many members withdrew to organize a WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, but they were granted the use of the same church building. However, in 1842, a new church building was erected by the remaining Methodists. In 1925 a new church building was constructed. A WESLEY FOUNDATION for students at nearby colleges, and for servicemen at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy and U.S. Submarine Base, is an important part of the life of this church.

NEW MADRID, MISSOURI, U.S.A., the site of the oldest active Methodist church in the United States west of the Mississippi River, was first known as an Indian settlement in 1786. Twelve white men joined the Indians in 1787. The settlers were mostly Frenchmen but the territory was Spanish and in 1788 a grant was secured from Spain, and then about sixty others joined the inhabitants and the New Madrid name was adopted from the Spanish capital. The area passed into French hands and the name became Louisiana and New Madrid was the capital. It was Roman Catholic by law.

In March, 1810, after the Louisiana Purchase, JESSE WALKER and JOHN SCRIPPS crossed the Big Swamp and formed a Methodist Society as a part of the CAPE GIRARDEAU Circuit. Two years later it became a circuit under its own name and since that date has never lost its identity. The church today is small but loyal and devoted.

The town was the center of the New Madrid earthquake of 1811-1812, one of the worst recorded and the greatest ever known on the American continent. It was felt over an area of 60,000 square miles, sank 6,000 square miles from three to nine feet, changed the course of the Mississippi River, damaged houses in Cincinnati, Ohio, 400 miles away, and formed Reelfoot Lake in Tennessee.

NEW MEXICO (population 998,257 in 1970), is one of the mountain group states. It is west of TEXAS and north of MEXICO, and it is a part of the land ceded by Mexico in 1848. SANTA FE is its capital, so designated by the Spanish governor de Peralta in 1610. The state was under SPAIN until 1821, then under Mexico until the war of 1846. Many citizens are of Spanish-Mexican descent. Among the non-Spanish Americans are certain Indian tribes. Large areas of New Mexico's 121,666 square miles have been made fertile by irrigation with dams and reservoirs on the Rio Grande, Pecos, Canadian, and other rivers. The climate is dry and invigorating. ALBUQUERQUE, the location of the state university, is the largest city. New Mexico, including what is now ARIZONA until 1863, became a territory in 1850, and it was admitted as a state in 1912. Among its products are uranium, oil, potash, copper, lead, and gold. The Federal government's nuclear and space research projects at Los Alamos, White Sands, and Albuquerque have contributed greatly to the state's growth since 1945.

Both the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South pushed into New Mexico with mission work after it became a territory. In 1876 the Northern Church organized the New Mexico Mission, and in 1881 the DENVER CONFERENCE (MES) organized a New Mexico District with eight charges.

The New Mexico Mission (ME) had a checkered history. It began with sixteen charges and 319 members. In 1885 it was divided to form the New Mexico Mission and the New Mexico Spanish Mission. The latter became the New Mexico Spanish Mission Conference in 1892. In 1915 the New Mexico English Mission and the New Mexico Spanish Mission Conference were merged to form the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE. In 1928 the conference became again the New Mexico Mission which merged at unification in 1939. When the New Mexico Conference (ME) was formed in 1915 it had fifty-four charges and 4,073 members. In 1939 the New Mexico Mission brought twenty-four charges and 5,630 members into the New Mexico Conference of The Methodist Church.

The M.E. Church, South organized the New Mexico Conference in 1890. In 1893 it reported seventeen charges and 868 members. In 1915 there were fifty-one charges and 8,128 members. Thereafter the conference grew rapidly, coming to unification in 1939 with 24,253 members.

THOMAS M. HARWOOD established a school for boys in Albuquerque in 1887 with the aim of preparing Mexican youths for ministering to Spanish-speaking people. The school continued until 1931. Also, in 1887 the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY (ME) established the Harwood School for Girls in Albuquerque, and in 1891 the society projected the NAVAJO METHODIST MISSION School at Farmington. Both institutions are still operating. The same society started the Houchen Settlement House in 1893, the Freeman Clinic in 1920, and the Newark Methodist Hospital in 1921, all of them in EL PASO, Texas. In 1911 the society established a sanatorium in Albuquerque which in 1952 became the Bataan Memorial Methodist Hospital. On October 31, the hospital was transferred to the Lovelace Foundation for Medical Research. The M.E. Church, South established LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE at El Paso in 1914 to educate Mexican young people fleeing to the United States during the revolution in their country. Receiving strong support from the South Central Jurisdiction, the institute continues its ministry to Spanish-speaking students.

The New Mexico Mission (ME) and the New Mexico Conference (MES) merged at unification in 1939 to form the New Mexico Conference (TMC). New Mexico Methodism grew rapidly with the state after the second World War. In 1944 The Methodist Church had approximately 16,000 members in the state of New Mexico. In 1968 the number of members was about 62,000.

NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE was organized at EL PASO, Texas, Oct. 20, 1939 with Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT presiding. The conference was formed by merging the New Mexico Mission of the M.E. Church which began in 1880, and the New Mexico Conference of the M.E. Church, South which was organized in 1890. The territory of the conference includes the state of NEW MEXICO and extreme west TEXAS through the counties of Winkler, Ector, Crane, Pecos, Terrell, and Val Verde (part). Prior to unification the New Mexico Conference (MES) included twelve charges in Colorado with some 2,600 members. These churches with their pastors were transferred to the COLORADO CONFERENCE (TMC) in 1939. When organized, the New Mexico Conference of The Methodist Church had four districts, Albuquerque, Clovis, El Paso, and Roswell. In 1941 there were eighty-nine charges and 25,464 members. (See New Mexico for beginning of Methodism in the state and for accounts of the New Mexico Mission (ME) and the New Mexico Conference (MES).)

The New Mexico Conference was in the DALLAS Area, 1939-44, and in the OKLAHOMA CITY Area, 1944-68. In 1968 the conference became a part of the Northwest Texas-New Mexico Area with the episcopal residence in ALBUQUERQUE. While in the Oklahoma City Area the conference was under the supervision of Bishop W. ANGIE SMITH.

During and following the second world war, the Federal government built nuclear and space research and testing plants and facilities at Los Alamos, White Sands, Holloman, Kirtland, and Sandia in New Mexico. These developments greatly accelerated the growth of the state's economy and its population. The 1940 population was 532,000; it had grown to 998,257 in 1970. The Methodist Church grew even more rapidly than the population in this period. Between 1944 and 1968 the number of preaching places in the New Mexico Conference rose from 121 to 152, the pension annuity rate from $16 to $72, contributions to world service and conference benevolences from $44,305 to $216,184, property value from $1,858,358 to $25,149,761, and church membership from 25,815 to 92,932.

The New Mexico Conference supports a number of institutions. Fifteen of its ministers and laymen serve as trustees of McMURRY COLLEGE at Abilene. Along with Texas Methodism the conference contributes to the Methodist Children's Home at Waco. Methodist institutions in El Paso are LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE, Newark Methodist Hospital, and Houchen Community Center. Bataan Memorial Methodist Hospital and the Harwood School for Girls are in Albuquerque. The NAVAJO METHODIST MISSION SCHOOL is at Farmington and the Landsun Manor (for the aged) at Carlsbad. The conference supports eight Wesley Foundations within its bounds, maintaining full time directors at five of them. Conference camps are maintained at Sacramento and Glorieta. The conference established the New Mexico Methodist in 1966, placing upon its board of education the responsibility for publishing and promoting the paper.

In 1970 the New Mexico Conference reported four districts, Albuquerque, Carlsbad, Clovis, and El Paso. It had 166 ministers, 122 charges, 81,446 members, and property valued at $31,537,795.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, U.S.A. In 1718 New Orleans was founded by the French explorer Bienville, and the first efforts at teaching in this community were carried on by the Ursuline nuns for girls and a priest for boys. When the city was deeded to SPAIN in 1763, its exclusiveness towards Roman Catholicism was intensified. With the LOUISIANA Purchase in 1803, Americans came to the territory, and for the first time, Protestant clergymen entered the once forbidden land.

In 1805 Bishop ASBURY sent Elisha W. Bowman to New Orleans. A modest amount of money was given to him to sustain him until he could get a work going which could help care for his needs and those of the Church. The conditions he found, however, were so bad that he was defeated on every hand. After repeated attempts at finding a place to preach and being promised the use of the Capitol building only to find that someone had arranged to have it locked when he arrived, he finally gave up the effort. He wrote to friends back in KENTUCKY on Jan. 29, 1806, "I shook off the dust of my feet against this ungodly city of New Orleans."

JACOB YOUNG, presiding elder of the MISSISSIPPI District, then made sincere efforts at establishing the work. By 1810 forty-three members were reported; and in 1811 Miles Harper was appointed the first regular Methodist pastor to the city of New Orleans.

In 1813 WILLIAM WINANS came to the city as a missionary. It was very difficult to find a place for a meeting, but he managed to secure facilities in the home of Methodists, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Knobb, which he could use for living quarters. In this he ran a school during the week and preached on Sunday.

The Church lacked both money and missionaries. It was several years later that a building was secured. The next Methodist preaching place was in the loft of a flour inspector's office at the corner of Poydras and Carondelet Streets. Through the generosity and effort of a great Methodist layman, Judge EDWARD MCGEEHEE of Mississippi, this crude place was converted into a usable sanctuary. Out of this beginning came the first real church in 1825, a frame building on Gravier Street between Baronne and Carondelet. This is the predecessor to the great First Church now located on Canal Street.

While progress in New Orleans has never been as easy for Methodism as in some other cities, still by comparison the Church was having better times. In a few years it became necessary to build both a larger and more imposing building. In the year 1836, Bishop ANDREW preached the dedicatory sermon for a splendid edifice on the corner of Carondelet and Poydras Streets.

During the next dozen years, new names appeared as churches and preaching places and Sunday schools: the Good Hope Sunday School, later Algiers Methodist Church; Seaman's Bethel; Moreau Street Church, later to combine with the Krapp Street Church to form the present Second Methodist Church; the Lafayette Mission; McDonoughville Church; and others.

When the division of the Church occurred in 1845 New Orleans, along with the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, adhered to the Church, South, and it so remained until the close of the Civil War. At that time the M.E. Church reorganized, chiefly under the superintendency of J. P. NEWMAN. Three Northern Churches remained until Unification in 1939; Napoleon Avenue, a leading Church today; Eighth Street, no longer present; and Church of the Redeemer, an Italian mission on Esplanade Street in the Vieux Carré.

It was in New Orleans that the M.E. Church, South practically reorganized in April 1866, after the Civil War. The city was then occupied by Northern troops, and for a time it was doubtful whether the Southern Methodists could get hold of a church in which to hold their GENERAL CONFERENCE called to meet there. However, the General Conference was held—the first time in eight years—and "the peeled and scattered hosts," as Bishop MCTYEIRE puts it, "discouraged and confused by adversities and adverse rumors, rallied: . . . and never did delegates meet in general conference from centers and remotest posts more enthusiastically; of 153 elected, 149 were present." This epochal New Orleans Conference adopted lay representation, and elected four bishops, WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN, ENOCH M. MARVIN, DAVID S. DOGGETT, and HOLLAND N. MCTYEIRE, the last having been for a time a pastor in New Orleans.

As early as 1842 there were several strong Negro Methodist churches in existence. Soule Chapel was built on Marais Street between Bienville and Conti Streets;

Wesley Chapel, located on Gravier Street, was also a strong colored church. In 1868 a literary institution was founded, which is now DILLARD UNIVERSITY.

Serious epidemics of yellow fever occurred with terrifying frequency between 1810 and 1909. In these epidemics the Methodist Church suffered a loss of twenty percent of its members. Highest praise and appreciation are due the faithful ministers who stood steadfast in all such times of hardships and danger, ministering alike to the spiritual and physical needs of a distressed and discouraged people.

Gambling has always been a problem in New Orleans. It had been used as a source of funds for many things, including religion. It reached its height in the Louisiana Lottery, which became so entrenched late in the nineteenth century that the State looked to this as one of its chief means of support. The united and determined effort of Protestant clergymen and laymen went far toward breaking the back of this legalized gambling. Despite the offer by the lottery company of a million and a quarter dollars a year to the State, an act prohibiting the sale of tickets was passed in 1894.

New Orleans Methodism has produced many able ministers. At one time four future bishops answered the roll of the Louisiana Conference from this area—LINUS PARKER, CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, J. C. KEENER, and H. N. McTYEIRE. FRANKLIN N. PARKER, who always claimed New Orleans as his city, was one of the few men who declined the office of bishop. John B. Matthews, John Hannon, and WILLIAM E. MUNSEY were among the great leaders of the New Orleans churches.

Other strong early Southern churches must be named to make this study accurate. Rayne Memorial Church located on St. Charles Avenue is still a leading Church. Felicity, one of the earliest and greatest, lives now largely on sentiment regarding its noble past; Louisiana Avenue was once a beautiful building on Louisiana and Magazine, but gave way when its membership moved out of the declining neighborhood.

Now there are over 20,000 Methodists in forty churches in Greater New Orleans, and the future is limited only by the manpower and financial resources available to develop this great and growing area.

Carondelet Street Church (whose successor is now First Methodist Church), one of the oldest churches in the city, occupied a building on Gravier Street near Carondelet from 1824 until 1835, when the financial assistance of Judge Edward McGehee enabled the congregation to build a church at Carondelet and Poydras Streets. On Jan. 18, 1851, sparks from a fire which destroyed the St. Charles Hotel ignited the church and it was damaged beyond repair. Undaunted, the membership purchased ground on Carondelet between Girod and Lafayette Streets, where a fine church building was erected, which was to serve the Methodists of New Orleans for fifty-three years.

In 1906, it was decided to move to a new location on St. Charles Avenue near Lee Circle, and the name was changed to the First Methodist Church. The Grand Consistory (A.F. & A.M.) of Louisiana purchased the Carondelet Street property, and it is now known as the Scottish Rite Cathedral. In the years that followed, two of the pastors of the church became bishops, Linus Parker and John C. Keener.

In 1956, First Church found itself in the path of the new bridge to be built over the Mississippi River, and merged with Canal Street Church to purchase a site at Canal Street and Jefferson Davis Parkway. There the congregation moved into a new church plant in October 1960, and a great church has come into being. First United Methodist is now meeting the challenge of a growing and changing city. Its ministry reaches over a twenty-mile radius, and shut-ins and a bi-state area are served through a television ministry once a month. The church has two services each Sunday morning and is largely visited by travelers and visitors who are in New Orleans on Sunday. Present membership is 1,115.

Felicity Church enjoys the distinction of having had three of its former pastors elected to the episcopacy. Bishop Holland Nimmons McTyre, eminent historian of Methodism, was the church's founder and first pastor. Bishop Linus Parker served as the second pastor, and while there lost his bride of three months as a victim of yellow fever. Bishop John Christian Keener, strong leader of Methodism in Louisiana, filled the pulpit just prior to the American Civil War.

It was in December 1848 that Holland N. McTyre was sent from the ALABAMA CONFERENCE, M.E. Church, South, to effect the union of three struggling mission stations in New Orleans from which Felicity was born. These were Andrew Chapel, whose pastor was killed en route to his charge with the burning of the steamboat on which he was a passenger; Elijah Steele Chapel, known as the "flatboat" church because it was built of lumber from dismantled Mississippi river flatboats; and the St. Mary Street Church.

On Christmas Day, 1850, the fifth session of the Louisiana Conference and the first to be held in New Orleans, was convened in the new red brick Felicity church. Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS dedicated the building.

This first building was destroyed by fire on Saturday afternoon, April 16, 1887. A new building, valued at $50,000, was erected on the original foundation and was dedicated by Bishop Keener June 3, 1888. Felicity is the oldest Methodist church in New Orleans remaining on its original site. At one time in its history it ranked as one of the most important churches in Louisiana Methodism. The conference Journal for 1874 indicates that the pastor's salary was $300 per annum, the second largest salary reported for the conference. The first EPWORTH LEAGUE chapter in Louisiana was organized at Felicity on Jan. 11, 1891.

FRANKLIN N. PARKER, son of Bishop Linus Parker, was licensed to preach by the Quarterly Conference of Felicity, and the father of Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON, editor of this Encyclopedia, was converted there. Parker was twice elected bishop by the General Conference, but declined the honor in order to continue his service to the church as a teacher of young ministers at EMORY UNIVERSITY.

Felicity was harassed by deadly epidemics of yellow fever, by fire, and by hurricane. Two of the most devastating hurricanes ever to strike New Orleans were those of 1915 and 1965, both of which left their angry marks upon the church. Battered and weather worn by time and the elements, the building has once more been renewed and, on Sunday, Oct. 9, 1966, Bishop AUBREY G. WALTON rededicated the sanctuary.

Felicity is now one of five churches comprising the New Orleans Inner City Methodist Parish, Church school and worship services are held every Sunday morning and a special ministry is provided for Cuban refugees by its bi-lingual pastor.

RAYNE MEMORIAL CHURCH, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA

Rayne Memorial Church, formerly the St. Charles Avenue Church and now popularly known as the "Church of the Lighted Steeple," is a stately, impressive building and "the Cathedral of New Orleans Methodism." It was erected in 1875 and its Tudor-Gothic sanctuary was erected and cleared of indebtedness before the church itself was officially organized.

The generous gifts of Robert W. Rayne, a local preacher, made the building possible. Rayne was born in Sunderland, England, in 1808. His parents were members of the Methodist society, and he embraced religion and united with the church in 1824. He immediately became an active worker in visiting the poor in work-houses; and was a visitor for the Benevolent Strangers' Friend Society, dispensing alms, and holding prayer-meetings on Sunday evenings among the poor in their dwellings. He was shortly afterwards licensed to exhort and preach. In 1832 he emigrated to the United States, and, after a short residence in NEW YORK and PHILADELPHIA, settled in CINCINNATI, where, at the invitation of the Methodist Protestant Church, he accepted an appointment in the ministry. In 1835 failing health compelled him to locate, and business arrangements led him for a short time to MASSACHUSETTS. In 1842 he removed to New Orleans, and united with the M.E. Church. At the separation he adhered to the M.E. Church, South. He continued in mercantile business till the breaking out of the war. At its close he returned to the city, and was an active and consistent member of the M.E. Church South, living in harmony and fellowship with all denominations.

The first services were held in the completed sanctuary on the morning of Jan. 2, 1876, with Bishop John C. Keener presiding, and W. E. Munsey appointed its first pastor. In the afternoon the church was organized with 108 members, and in the evening Munsey, a gifted orator, preached a notable sermon on "Elijah." The church was named the St. Charles Avenue Methodist Church. Following the death of Mr. and Mrs. Rayne, the name was changed on May 2, 1877, to Rayne Memorial Methodist Church and dedicated as a memorial to Rayne's son, William, who was fatally wounded at Chancellorsville in the War Between the States.

The Church has the further distinction of having a WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY organized in it on April 26, 1877, with Mrs. Robert W. Rayne as its first president. This antedates the organization by the General Conference of the M.E. Church, South, of a Woman's Board of Foreign Missions, by more than a year.

In 1925 an educational building and fellowship hall were erected, and a modern children's building was built in 1962. The Rayne Memorial Organ Series annually presents from two to four organists of world fame in concerts. Its C. I. Jones Memorial Lectures attract visitors from across the Southland, and annually present well known lecturers.

Rayne Memorial has always been missionary-minded. Its first local preacher, James D. Parker, organized a church on Nashville Avenue within the city, later named Parker Memorial Church. It also purchased and donated the lots upon which the Carrollton Avenue Church is located, and it assisted in the organization of that congregation. It participated in the great missionary conference of the M.E. Church, South, held in Tulane Hall in April 1901. The worship services and several committee meetings of that Conference were held in its sanctuary. Young J. Allen preached at Rayne Memorial on April 28 on the subject, "Come Over Into Macedonia and Help Us."

On Dec. 22, 1968 Hannah Chapel of Rayne Memorial was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies presided over by Bishop Aubrey G. Walton. The Chapel was named for Hannah Graham Lehde, wife of Pendleton E. Lehde, long time member of the church. The windows on the front of the building are of faceted red-yellow glass with eight side windows of stained glass with Christian religious symbols.

Rayne Memorial has traditionally been the church home of the families of the presiding bishop of Louisiana and the New Orleans district superintendent. Among its outstanding pastors have been W. E. Munsey, John Hannon, John Matthews, J. B. Walker, Franklin N. Parker, John A. Rice, Felix R. Hill, W. L. Duren, W. W. Holmes, H. L. Johns, B. C. Taylor, and Adrian M. Serex. Its tall and stately lighted-steeple, clearly visible to visitors arriving by riverboat or automobile, is an inspiration to the city; and despite the damaging hurricanes of 1915 and 1965, it points the Methodists of New Orleans godward.

St. James A.M.E. Church. JORDAN W. EARLY was the founder of African Methodism in New Orleans. He established a mission there as early as 1842. Permission to organize a Negro church in this city required an act of the Legislature. Early accomplished this through his Masonic contacts, and the charter, which was granted, named the church the "African Methodist Episcopal Church." Later, a lot on Roman Street was purchased, a church erected and dedicated as "St. James Chapel." In 1848 St. James requested a pastor from the Indiana Conference. Charles Doughty, one of their own members, was ordained and returned as the pastor. In 1858 all Negro churches in New Orleans were closed by the civil authorities. Following the Civil War this ban was lifted and St. James eventually became a leading appointment in the state.

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE was published in New Orleans, La., from 1852 until its publication was discontinued in 1946. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE met in St. Louis in 1850, a resolution was presented to that body by Jefferson Hamilton and B. M. DRAKE: "Resolved that the Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Arkansas Conferences establish a paper at such point as they may select and that the bishop presiding in said Conferences appoint an editor when requested to do so." The General Conference adjourned the following day without taking any action on the resolution. However, on their return journey, which began on May 14, 1850, on the steamer James Hewitt, a meeting was held of the delegates from these four Conferences, at which meeting a committee was appointed to consult upon the establishment of a church paper. The committee, WILLIAM WINANS being chairman and Jefferson Hamilton secretary, reported favorably upon the enterprise and it was provided that a paper should be published as soon as 3,000 subscribers and a suitable editor could be obtained. It may be correctly said that the New Orleans Advocate, like many worthy pioneers, was born on a Mississippi River steamboat!

On July 10, 1850, the committee issued a specimen number from New Orleans, with B. M. Drake serving as editor; it can be said that he was the first editor, though his term of office ran through only one edition. Copies of this publication were evidently mailed to all the preachers in the four Conferences.

The first regular edition of the Advocate appeared on Feb. 8, 1851, with HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE as editor in addition to his duties as pastor of Felicity Street Church in New Orleans. The publication was issued by a joint committee of the LOUISIANA and ALABAMA CONFERENCES, consisting of Richard H. Rivers, William E. Doty, and JOHN C. KEENER of Louisiana, and Jefferson Hamilton, William Murrah, and T. W. Dorman of Alabama. Neither the ARKANSAS nor MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES were official sponsors of the project. The Arkansas Conference never did participate and the Mississippi Conference did not assume any responsibility until 1858, seven years later, though many people in both states subscribed for the paper. One suspects that leaders of Mississippi Methodism looked with disfavor on the dominance of the paper by the New Orleans triumvirate, H. N. McTyre, J. C. Keener, and LINUS PARKER. The Alabama Conference continued as one of the supporting Conferences until 1880, and the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE began its official support in 1883.

When McTyre was elected editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate in 1858, his successor at New Orleans was Clayton C. Gillespie. He came from the editorship of the Texas Christian Advocate, though his early ministry was spent in the Alabama Conference, where he was associated with Keener and McTyre, now both in New Orleans. Gillespie edited an excellent paper until the outbreak of the Civil War. There are no files of the Advocate for the pre-war period in 1860, though it is generally assumed that publication was continued until some time in 1861, when the situation made it impossible to continue. There is a tradition that Gillespie went into the Confederate Army, but after the war his name appears no more in the records.

After the war the Advocate resumed publication in 1866 under the editorship of John Christian Keener, who brought the paper through its post-war difficulties and up to its former standard. He continued in that position until his election to the episcopacy in 1870. His predecessor, H. N. McTyre, had been elected bishop four years earlier at the General Conference of 1866.

Then Linus Parker served for twelve years as editor of the Advocate and continued the excellent character of the paper as it had been under his predecessors. This was in spite of some difficulties occasioned by the period of reconstruction in the South, and particularly in Louisiana. After twelve years of splendid leadership, Parker was himself elected a bishop, but died soon after taking over that responsibility.

When Linus Parker was elected a bishop his successor at New Orleans was the youthful CHARLES B. GALLOWAY of the Mississippi Conference, only a little more than thirty years of age, and the first Mississippian to serve as editor. He was not able to give full time to the work, since he served as pastor in JACKSON and Brookhaven during the four years he was editor. In the first issue after taking over the editorship, Galloway quoted a writer who said that the New Orleans Advocate was "a training school for the episcopacy," to which the new editor modestly replied that "all episcopal material had been used already." Nevertheless, Galloway himself was elected bishop in 1886—the youngest bishop in Methodism—and once more the editorial chair had to be filled.

His successor was Charles W. Carter of the Louisiana Conference. He held the office a number of years, giving it up without notice in the early 1890's because of the financial situation and the failure to have his salary paid and the paper supported. J. M. Beard, chairman of the Publishing Committee, then took over the editorship and business management of the paper for four months, during which time he succeeded in solving a number of problems and in turning over the paper to his successor in much better financial shape.

Warren C. Black, a native Mississippian, and for many years a popular pastor and pulpit orator, served as editor from 1894 until 1900, with his son, M. M. Black, as his assistant for part of that time. In July 1900 the Advocate observed the fiftieth anniversary of its establishment. At the close of the year, Black resigned and was succeeded by John W. Boswell, who held the position until the latter part of 1909, though he had resigned in 1907. Then T. B. Holloman was elected editor, and at his refusal to accept the office, Boswell was persuaded to continue for two more years. He was a brilliant and scholarly man and served for a number of years as associate editor of the general church organ, the Nashville Advocate.

R. A. MECK of the North Mississippi Conference succeeded Boswell and continued until June 1918, when he resigned. Meek was vigorous and aggressive in his editorial policies, and never failed to take sides in any issue before the church. He was particularly involved in the controversy over VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and also the question of unification of the divided branches of Methodism, which he greatly opposed.

The Publishing Committee in June 1918 elected Henry T. Carley, a native Mississippian but a member of the Louisiana Conference and a teacher at CENTENARY COLLEGE, as editor to fill the vacancy until the committee met again in October. At this later meeting he was formally elected editor and continued in that office for ten years. Carley was a scholarly man and piloted the Advocate through difficult years. He was progressive in his thinking and held the confidence and respect of those who did not agree with him on such issues as unification of Methodism. Later he served as associate editor under W. L. DUREN.

R. H. Harper, a lifelong member of the Louisiana Conference and an honor graduate of Centenary College, succeeded Carley as editor. Unfortunately he came into the office just at the beginning of the depression, which affected the financial stability no little. Harper was a brilliant and capable editor, but he found the financial responsibility irksome, in spite of the outstanding service of C. O. Chalmers, for a long time the paper's business manager, and Harper resigned as editor after not more than two years in that responsibility. J. LLOYD DECCELL, then presiding elder of the Brookhaven District in Mississippi, assumed the responsibility of the editorship in connection with his duties on the district, commuting, as Bishop Galloway had done, from Brookhaven to New Orleans. Decell served only one year, 1930-31, after which he went to the pastorate of Galloway Memorial Church, Jackson, from which he was elected to the episcopacy, the fifth editor of the Advocate to be elected to that office after serving as editor.

Daniel B. Raulins, a native Mississippian but a member of the Louisiana Conference, served as editor for several years. His service was significant and appreciated. After some three years, Raulins returned to the pastorate until his death.

Following Raulins, the final duties of editing this historic publication fell into the worthy hands of W. L. Duren, then of the Louisiana Conference but a former member of the North Mississippi and North Georgia Conferences. He spent twelve years as editor, through all of which he earned the respect and confidence of the readers of the paper. Part of the time he had as associate editor H. T. Carley, and for a period of time he had an associate from each of the three supporting Conferences: Carley from Louisiana, A. P. Hamilton from the Mississippi Conference, and Hugh Clayton and B. P. Brooks from the North Mississippi. Milton Chalmers succeeded his father as business manager.

Significant changes took place during Duren's editorship, all of which he viewed with calmness and discernment. The long-discussed union of the churches took place in 1939, and the Advocate's territory was then divided, the Louisiana Conference being placed in the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTION and the Mississippi and North Mississippi Conferences in the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION. This was the beginning of the end. There had been a persistent effort for many years to establish a Methodist paper in Jackson or Meridian, Miss., and at least one or two efforts in that direction had come to naught. Duren had served twelve years with fidelity and effectiveness, and on Nov. 28, 1946, the last issue of the New Orleans Advocate came from the press. The Mississippi Methodist Advocate for the Mississippi Conferences and the Louisiana Methodist for Louisiana have since been published in its place.

The files of the Advocate, with the exception of a very few years, have been placed in the Methodist Room at MILLSAPS COLLEGE. A joint committee from the Louisiana, Mississippi, and North Mississippi Conferences supervise their use.

NEW PLYMOUTH, New Zealand, Whiteley Memorial Church was built as a memorial to JOHN WHITELEY, who was killed by Maori warriors at the White Cliffs, Pukearuhe, on Feb. 13, 1869, and whose death virtually brought an end to the Maori Wars. The church which it replaced had been occupied by the congregation since 1856.

The decision to build a Whiteley Church was made in 1897, during the ministry of C. H. Garland. The idea of a memorial caught the imagination of the community, and a church designed to seat 500 people was completed within a year. An exceptionally beautiful pipe organ was later installed, as a memorial to Methodists serving in the First World War. This historic edifice, the mother church and cathedral of Taranaki Methodism, whose foundation stone had been laid by the governor of NEW ZEALAND, the Earl of Ranfurly, was completely destroyed by fire on Feb. 18, 1959, while repairs and renovations were in progress.

It was rebuilt under the superintendency of W. H. Greenslade as a noble stone building, modern ecclesiastical in appearance, chaste in design and most convenient in appointments. Its lofty tower and illuminated cross dominate the surroundings.

NEW PROVIDENCE, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., first called Turkey or Turkey Hills, was first visited by Bishop ASBURY in July 1806, who referred to it in his Journal. Long before the CAMP MEETING era, it was a prominent preaching place of the Methodists, and from it Methodism spread throughout the area. EZEKIEL COOPER preached there in 1786 and THOMAS MORRELL was there the following year.

The first Society was organized in 1789 by Johnny Robertson. Meetings were held at the home of Waters Burrows, Sr. The first meeting house was erected in 1803 on a lot donated by George Corey. LORENZO DOW in 1802 and Bishop Asbury in 1806 preached in this chapel. Asbury missed the first camp meeting at Turkey Hills in August 1806, but he was again at New Providence in 1811, always being entertained by Stephen Day. In 1816, Lorenzo Dow preached there six times. The original chapel at Turkey was replaced by a larger edifice in 1857 and a new educational building was added in 1954.

NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE, Australia. There is reason to believe that the first class meeting in New South Wales was held in the residence of one Thomas Bowden, headmaster of the Male Orphan Institute, SYDNEY, on March 6, 1812. It is believed that two classes were formed, the second supervised by John Hosking, headmaster of the Females' Orphan School. It is known that at Windsor, thirty-six miles northwest from Sydney, one Edward Eagar, who had been sentenced to transportation for forgery, regularly held a class meeting early in 1812.

In a letter to the Preachers and Members of the Committee of the METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY (British Conference) dated April 3, 1812, Bowden and Hosking addressed a strong and telling appeal for the appointment of a "single legally qualified Preacher." Consequently SAMUEL LEIGH arrived in Sydney, New South Wales, in the Hebe on Aug. 10, 1815.

In an "Address of the Methodist Societies in New South Wales to the Committee," dated March 2, 1816, Edward Eagar, Steward; Thomas Bowden, James Scott and John Hosking, Leaders, stated that Leigh was "kindly received by our excellent Governor, General Macquarie, as well as by the Rev. Chaplains of the Colony." They stressed the need of an additional appointment, "but we are under the painful necessity of stating that our present circumstances will not enable us to support two preachers unassisted by the Committee . . . and what adds to our difficulties . . . is the total impossibility of borrowing money in this Colony on any interest or security whatever."

Services in Sydney were first held in a house, but Leigh was encouraged when through the generosity of John Lees, a retired soldier, the first Wesleyan Chapel at Castlereagh, on the Nepean River, was dedicated on March 7, 1819.

By 1826 the first New South Wales District Meeting reported eleven churches and one in Tasmania. The first New South Wales Conference of the Methodist Church of Australasia was held in 1902. The Centenary of Australasian Methodism was celebrated in August 1915. The Bi-Centenary of JOHN WESLEY's conversion was celebrated in 1938. The 150th Anniversary of the founding of Methodism was celebrated in 1962.

When the "Nineteenth Annual" District meeting met in Sydney in January 1839, the following were the stations and appointments: Sydney, John McKenny, Superintendent and James Watkin, Secretary; Parramatta, Daniel Draper; Lower Hawkesbury, William Schofield; Windsor, Samuel Wilkinson; and Bathurst, Frederick Lewis.

"The Missions in Australia, Van Diemen's Land, the Friendly Islands and Feejee" were constituted by the British Conference of 1854, "a distinct Connexion to be denominated the Australasian Wesleyan-Methodist Connexion" with "an annual Conference affiliated to the Parent English Conference." The first Australasian Conference was held in Sydney in January 1855, and in an address to the parent Conference said, "We have to rejoice in the gradually increasing prosperity of the work of God, both in the colonies and in the missions . . . We have now in connection with us 116 Ministers besides a number of Native Assistant Missionaries, nearly 800 chapels, 19,897 Church members, and 1,958 on Trial."

In 1873 a scheme of Annual and General Conferences was determined upon and in the following year the first New South Wales and Queensland Conference was held. The setting apart of the QUEENSLAND District into a separate Conference was carried out by the General Conference of 1890. The first New South Wales Conference was held in 1893.

The first PRIMITIVE METHODIST Annual Assembly in New South Wales was held in 1859 and that of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1890. By a Plan of Union agreed upon after lengthy negotiations, the various branches of Methodism united as part of the Methodist Church of Australasia in 1902.

At the General Conference held in Perth, Western Australia, May 1966, the following statistics were recorded: Ministers in Active work, 1,231; Supernumeraries, 286; Probationers, 186; Students in Training, 256; Theological Colleges, 10; Home Missionaries, 779; Deaconesses, 66; Local Preachers, 12,892; Class Leaders, 15,691; Confirmed Members, 250,010; Members under Nurture for Confirmation, 243,600. Number of Sunday Schools, 4,465; Teachers, 37,492; Scholars, 285,554; Membership in Youth Organizations, 102,609; Churches, 4,912; School Halls, 1,844; Parsonages, 1,274; Colleges, 65; Book Deposits, 11; Publishing Houses, 4; Hospitals, 25.

Methodism in Australasia is indebted to the pioneers of the nineteenth century who in an environment never made easy by officialdom established and consolidated in these lands the cause of Jesus Christ.

Several departments of the work of the Methodist Church have assumed considerable social and religious significance and the most important of these are as follows:

Department of Christian Citizenship. This Department has grown from a staff of one in 1948 to a functioning instrument of the church employing over fifty people. It has developed homes, schools, and other services designed to meet the needs of the people.

Homes. The special work being done at the girls' home is to be expanded. A second home is being opened for particular work in cooperation with the New South Wales University. This represents a tremendous forward move in this highly important work with problem girls in the fifteen to eighteen year age bracket.

The boys' home is actually a mansion set on a farm of 800 acres. This particular venture, undertaken twelve years ago, has seen over 200 boys pass through its doors. Most of them have been helped to resolve the difficulties which they brought to the home. A maximum of twenty boys are taken at any one time and they and the staff live in one massive home. Most of the cost for running this place is derived from the varied activities on the farm, sheep, wheat, dairy, pigs and poultry.

Schools. Three years ago the Department opened the first school in this country for mildly mentally handicapped girls. One hundred girls can be accommodated at the delightfully situated school eighty miles south of Sydney. The aim is to train each girl to the maximum of her capacity and then find her employment in the community. This school caters for girls over sixteen years of age who previously have not had this opportunity. Already some girls have been placed in employment.

Children's Courts. In addition to conducting these special homes and school, the day to day operation of the Department involves attendance at the Children's Courts. A qualified social worker makes contact there, not only with the boys and girls before the court, but with the families. We deal with over 300 such children and families each year.

Family Needs. From this particular work and the insights derived from twenty years work in the Marriage Guidance field, plus the understanding gained through the Chaplaincy work mentioned above, we are convinced that the family and not just one member contacted in these special areas, needs our service. As society becomes more and more industrialized and population density rises steeply, the family must be given top priority if we are to prevent personal and group maladjustment.

Team Work. The Department has already begun to move in on this important front. In doing so, we do not "go it alone." We work with the State Health Department and other community organizations to discover how we can cooperate to meet the real needs of given communities. The action programmes that emerge are consequently different but they are meaningful to the people in the area where we operate.

This particular approach to our work has special significance for church congregations. They are being helped to see their mission to the local community. Through training and this kind of practical involvement, they are having their gaze turned outwards from the church building to the people who must always be the first concern of the Christian.

WAYSIDE CHAPEL, NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE

Counselling. While heavily engaged in these special areas of work, the Department has always been deeply involved in counselling a wide range of disturbed individuals. Neurotics, psychotics, drug takers, alcoholics; the inadequates have always been our concern and in dealing with them, we have had the fullest support from the medical profession in all branches, the legal fraternity and other specialist groups.

Pioneers. All of this work has been undertaken not in any mood of monopoly but that the Department might demonstrate how missions and local churches can and must come to grips with the real problems of people. It is one of the true roles of church departments to pioneer ways of contacting and serving all sorts and conditions of people and then to leave it to local churches to get on with the job while it does more pioneering and discovering.

Rehabilitation of ex-Prisoners. The Department helped inaugurate the Civil Rehabilitation organization in this state which works in the difficult area of attempting to rehabilitate persons released from prison.

National and International Affairs. Wider affairs of the nation and of international concern are additional items on our charter. The vexed question of peace and war, the population explosion, the food problem of the world, the use of nuclear power for peaceful purposes, and race relations are big issues that are constantly being studied. From the Department material is distributed to the church across the state. In addition the Director has been the national leader in efforts which have raised millions of dollars for United Nations Children's Fund, Refugees and Freedom From Hunger projects.

Church at Mission. Through this Department the church is at mission in the community in a host of ways. We are always prepared to experiment in new methods of work. We never settle back content or think we have found all the answers. We move into each day prepared to serve the living God who we believe is as modern as the task he asks us to undertake with Him for the sake of people. Enthusiastically we daily apply ourselves to work with people and their problems.

Department of Christian Education. The Department of Christian Education had its beginnings in 1904 when the Conference of that year established the Sunday School Department. The first General Secretary, Harold Wheen, was appointed in 1912.

At the same time, beside the Sunday schools, the participation of young people in the worshipping life of the church was receiving attention, and in 1914 the Young Worshipers' League was established. This organization provided some incentives for young people to attend worship to provide a record of their attendance and text cards.

The next development was that of youth organizations. This began in 1915 when a Methodist Boys' Group, later to grow into the Methodist Order of Knights, was started at Hurstville, a suburb of Sydney, by Alec Bray. Two years later the Christian Endeavour Society became an integral part of the Sunday School Department, and the same year saw the Methodist Order of Knights sponsored officially by the Department, and a sister organization, The Methodist Girls' Comradeship, formed. As a result of these developments the name of the Department was changed in 1917 to the Young People's Department. This name was retained for the next forty-seven years. In 1920 Australian Sunday school lessons were produced and in 1923 Methodist Sunday schools were linked with the Presbyterian and Congregational churches with the introduction of Graded Lessons prepared jointly by these churches.

In 1924 the Mail Bag Sunday School was initiated to serve children living in distant parts of the state and unable to attend a Sunday school.

The Harold Wheen Kindergarten was opened in 1929 in Redfern, a depressed suburban area of Sydney. This was a free kindergarten to serve the children of this area and is still currently operating. The same year saw the development of another new movement, that of camping, with the holding of the first Methodist Crusader Camp at Camden about thirty miles out of Sydney. The Crusader Movement as a camping organization quickly grew to cover metropolitan and country districts conducting camps regularly on holiday weekends, and currently conducting up to twenty camps per year.

In 1930 there began a move to include in the life of the church mixed clubs for young people. Some years later the Methodist clubs received their constitution and later in 1958 they were incorporated in the Methodist Youth Fellowship established that year.

A sub-department of Religious Instruction in Schools was developed in 1939. Stan Barrett was appointed to this sub-department to assist ministers in their task of giving religious instruction in day schools across the state. Ten years later this sub-department became a full department for Religious Instruction in Schools.

In the early 1950's there developed a movement to establish a Methodist Bible College. In 1955 an evening college was established and in 1959 the Department purchased a residence at North Sydney as the center for a regular Bible College.

In 1957 Sir Frederick and Lady Stewart donated a gift of twenty acres of land on the near north of Sydney as a Methodist campsite. This was developed as the Methodist Youth War Memorial Conference Center. In the same year the Department purchased a property next door to Gowanlea to be used as a Methodist girls' hostel. In 1958 a Pacific Island Scholarship in memory of JOHN DIXON was inaugurated to bring students from Papua New Guinea and the Pacific Islands to train in Australia. In the same year the M.Y.F. constitution was approved and this youth organization was established across the state. In 1959 the Young People's Department undertook supervision of the North Sydney circuit as a part of its work in conjunction with the Methodist Bible College established there.

In 1964 the N.S.W. Conference decided to bring together the Young People's Department and the Department of Religious Instruction in Schools to form the Department of Christian Education.

With the development of this new department the whole range of Christian Education work among children, youth and adults within the home and local church and the public school was incorporated. The Department has functioned in this way to the present time; in 1968 the Conference approved a new policy providing for a general director of the Department with an Associate Director for each of three divisions namely, Schools and Sunday Schools work, Youth Work, and Adult Work.

Alongside the Department's work has been the development of camping properties owned by youth organizations or district synods of the church. The Methodist Christian Endeavour Association, Methodist Order of Knights each have their own site in Sydney and in addition there are district sites established at Kilaben Bay at Newcastle, at Bonny Hills near Port Macquarie and Ballina on the far North Coast. Further campsites will be developed as camping becomes a more important activity in the life of the church.

The Methodist Bible College has remained a small college which at present has no resident student body, maintaining only an evening college and correspondence division.

Connexional Journal. The Methodist, traditionally described as the Connexional Journal, has now entered upon its 111th year of continuous publication, the centenary having been fittingly celebrated in July 1958.

Originally known as The Christian Advocate, it first saw the light of day in July 1858, and in its original and present forms has not failed to appear (except for a brief period of industrial upheaval) on the date of publication. It also has the distinction of being the oldest religious journal in Australia, a distinction of which the Church has some cause for pride.

Editorial policy has sought to bring before readers a balanced coverage of news from at home and abroad together with feature articles from any sources including the Australian Methodist Press Association. An editorial policy which reflects the mission and witness of the Church in the whole world in this ecumenical age is one that commends itself to thoughtful readers.

Department of Home Missions. The relationship of the Church in Australia to the British Methodist Conference in 1855 eventually brought to birth the New South Wales Department of Home Missions. In 1858 there were nineteen circuits in the New South Wales District, with thirty ministers, four supernumeraries and four Home Missionaries. The contributions of the circuits to the funds amounted to £359. This meagre amount was too small to meet the needs of a rapidly growing Church in a young and flourishing country. At a District meeting in 1857, permission was sought to form a Sustentation and Extension Fund, "after the model of the Missionary Society," to take over the work and objectives of the Church Extension and Chapel Fund. At an historic Conference which met at York Street, Sydney, on Jan. 20, 1859, it was resolved "that permission be given to the New South Wales District to form the proposed society, and that its constitution be approved." The Society was formed officially at a general meeting of Wesleyan Church officers in the school room at the Centenary Chapel on March 21, 1859.

The minutes of the first Annual Meeting of this new Society in 1859, reveal the critical process through which the Church was passing. The financial report indicates that in the first year the sum of £1,243.8.7 was raised from circuits, and a Government Grant of £670. was accepted and a deficiency was incurred of £52.19.6. The Society included in its objectives the following:

To defray the current working expenses, of the Society, and the ordinary necessary connexional expenses which belong to the Wesleyan Methodist Church in New South Wales.

To assist in sustaining ministers in neglected or scattered populations where the full support of a minister cannot be obtained. To grants in aid of the erection of new Chapels, ministers' residences and school rooms, and towards liquidation of debt on such Methodist property as may have been already acquired.

The first grants amounting to £530 was paid by way of grants to circuits as far apart as Camden, Newtown, Newcastle and Brisbane, which is now the capital city of Queensland.

Evangelism. The early documents describe the primary task of the Church as being that of evangelism and the development of the spiritual life of the colony. The following quotation reveals the mind of the Department in its early history:

The committee have learned from various sources that much spiritual destitution exists in many parts of the colony, and as a consequence of this, much darkness of mind, and immorality of life unhappily afflict the people. Thousands of our fellow colonists never hear a Gospel sermon, or frequent the house of prayer.

Between Singletown and Warwick a distance of about 400 miles on the Great Northern Road, on which are situated some 15 or 16 townships. . . . No Wesleyan Methodist ordinances exist, and in many of them there is an utter dearth of evangelical ministrations.

The records which follow indicate an enthusiastic concern for the evangelization of this early colony. So much has happened since 1859. New South Wales has developed into one of the most prosperous States in the Southern Hemisphere. Today the capital, Sydney, is a booming city of near three million people; Newcastle is the industrial metropolis of Australia, and rich rural areas have developed on the coast and western plains. The whole atmosphere is one pulsing with life and vigorous plans are developed to match the population growth which now nears twelve and a half million.

Expansion. The first Home Missionary, W. H. Thompson, was appointed to Tweed River Station on the Queensland border, in 1889. In 1968 the Home Mission Department in this State appointed twenty-five Home Missionaries, supported lay agents in circuits, made progressive loans for properties, had formed the Far West and Inland Missions, developed the Women's Home Mission League, the Woolnough Sites and Church Extension Fund, a Deaconess Order, a Methodist Nursing Service, a Department of Church Development, a Division of Mission and Evangelism, employed full time Hospital Chaplains, undertook the development of Stewardship throughout the Church and staffed a Division of Immigration. Methodism in New South Wales is the story of a young Church staking a claim for the Faith and meeting every opportunity with a dedication and zeal, representative of that authentic missionary faith so clearly defined in the best pages of Christian history, and in the spirit of New Testament Missionary outreach.

The progress of the Home Missions Department has been undertaken by the Church across the State, working as a Conference unit. Conference has given to some of the Church's most able ministers the task of leading and planning the ministry of this Department. General Secretaries have been: W. Hessel, 1859-61; G. Hurst, 1861-64; 1866-68; 1869-80; B. Chapman, 1864, 1868; J. Oram, 1865; G. Woolnough, 1880-82; G. Lane, 1882-88; G. Sellors, 1888-96; J. Woolnough, 1896-1915; J. G. M. Taylor, 1915-23; W. H. Jones, 1923-40; R. H. Campbell, 1940-49; A. C. Manefield, 1949-62; W. Whitbread, 1962-69; R. R. Smith, 1969.

Over the past three years the Department has undertaken vigorous research into the place and relevance of this Department in a time of rapid change. In 1970 the Department moved to a suburban regional center at Chatswood, where new forms of ministry and renewal will be undertaken as a pilot project for the whole State.

Deaconess Order. The N.S.W. Department of Home Missions, under the far-seeing Superintendency of the late A. C. MANEFIELD, brought into being this Ministry in 1945, conscious of the leading of God. Four candidates entered into training, two of these being multi-certificated nurses. The latter went at the close of the year to their first appointment at Brewarrina, in far west of the State, to minister to farmer families and the native people that were attached thereto.

The college period for other than nurses was set at two years; and the probation for both types of Deaconesses, at five years, followed by ordination. Some applicants have been received in full connection as Deaconesses without the prescribed formal training owing to particular experience or educational qualifications.

The LEIGH MINISTERIAL THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, Enfield, Sydney was the first place of this resident training of up to eight students per year. The onerous project here was wisely and kindly shepherded by the Principal, S. R. Bowyer-Hayward.

Within a few years, because of the influx of post-war men students, the Deaconesses were trained at the All Saints College, Haberfield, Sydney, run conjointly by the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, primarily for the purpose of Overseas Missionary Students — (previously it was the George Brown Methodist Missionary Training College). Later, the Deaconess College had its own building in Leichhardt, Sydney until 1967, then the students were transferred, joining the Methodist Bible College, Brisbane in 1968, where students in training for various spheres of influence in the Church numbered up to seventy.

In N.S.W., lecturers were drawn from Leigh College, from among senior ministers and ministers with relevant scholastic advantage. The subjects studied included Bible, Theology, Psychology, Sociology, English, Homiletics, Church History, Ethics, Teaching Methods.

The N.S.W. Women's Home Mission League continue, as at first, to identify themselves with the work and personnel of the Deaconesses; constantly with fellowship, labor and finance.

Deaconesses serve in the State's city missions, ordinary circuits, and in the far "outback" with those of the Methodist Nursing Service. Deaconesses have been appointed to the chaplaincy of hospitals and the Methodist Ladies' College, Burwood, Sydney. A deaconess has served a term as Home Missionary. In 1968 sixteen deaconesses were in appointments, and that same year the Third General Convocation of the Order was held in Sydney, to which forty ordained deaconesses from all parts of Australia came. The first woman to be accepted as a candidate for the Methodist ministry was Deaconess Kay Edwards. She was accepted at the 1969 Conference.

First Australian Mission. This amazingly enlightened venture which began in Sydney in 1821, is linked forever with the name of William Walker (1800-1857). He sailed from England with Samuel Leigh and the Rev. and Mrs. William Horton and arrived in Sydney on Sept. 16, 1821. In October in company with Joseph Hassall he visited aborigines at Blacktown, after which he wrote, "all they require is a few clothes, agricultural implements and a supply of food until their crops be reaped . . . I left them with a consciousness of having never been favoured with a more profitable or serious season during my ministerial career." On another occasion he wrote, "they are idle and vagrant and the colonists too often encourage their vices. If they cut wood or do any other trifling work they are rewarded with a mixture of spirituous liquors . . . quarrelling ensues, and if ever incarnate devils appeared in this world, surely the natives are at such times their representatives."

In 1823 the Wesleyan missionaries of New South Wales met in Conference and decided to recommend to the overseas General Committee that an institution for aborigines be set up under the superintendence of a local committee consisting of all the missionaries in the colony and twelve laymen to be elected annually by the District Meeting.

Statistics for the New South Wales Conference as of May 1969, are as follows: Ministers in active work, 271; churches, 739; members, 52,404.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

NEW YORK, the "Empire State," has an area of 49,576 square miles and a population of 17,979,712 (1970). Called New Netherlands by the Dutch who settled it, the British renamed it in honor of James Stuart, Duke of York, when they seized it in 1664. One of the original thirteen states, New York is noted today for industry, commerce, education, agriculture, and the arts. It is the leading manufacturing state, and New York is the nation's largest city and port as well as the headquarters of the United Nations, and the location of the head offices of many of the greatest national corporations and insurance companies. The state has 207 institutions of higher learning which enroll over 645,000 students.

Methodism was brought to New York City in the 1760's by the Irish immigrants PHILIP EMBURY and BARBARA HECK. Impetus was given the cause by Captain THOMAS WEBB. With his encouragement and financial help, a Methodist meetinghouse, Wesley Chapel, was constructed in 1768 and later renamed JOHN STREET CHURCH. The church, still active at the same location after 200 years, is one of the national historic SHRINES of American Methodism. FRANCIS ASBURY opened up work on STATEN ISLAND in 1771, and a visit to New Rochelle in the same year by JOSEPH PILMORE (who with RICHARD BOARDMAN was sent by JOHN WESLEY as a missionary team to New York and PHILADELPHIA in 1769) resulted in a society of thirteen members in 1774. After the arrival of Boardman in New York, Embury moved upstate to Camden in Washington County and organized the ASHGROVE Church in 1770. When the first Methodist conference in America was held at Philadelphia in 1773, New York reported 180 members, and the number was 222 in 1774.

During the Revolutionary War the Methodist movement in New York was retarded, but after 1788, as FREEBORN GARRETTSON led in opening the Hudson River Valley to Wesleyan influence, Methodism advanced. The movement then spread north and west following the river route of the Hudson and Mohawk, as well as the lake system—Lake Champlain to the east, the Finger Lakes in the central section, and the Great Lakes to the north and west. Methodist societies or churches were organized in the following places or regions in the years indicated: Newburgh, 1789; Albany, 1790; Wyoming Valley, extending into PENNSYLVANIA as well as Otsego and Saratoga counties, 1791; Herkimer County, 1793; Delaware County, 1794; Seneca County, 1796; Mohawk and Oneida Counties, 1799; and Cayuga County, 1800. The expansion of Methodism over New York state in so short a period of time was phenomenal. By 1855 the Methodist Church was the largest Protestant denomination in the state.

When the 1796 GENERAL CONFERENCE designated six annual conferences with geographical boundaries, the part of New York east of the Hudson River was placed in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE and the remainder of the state in the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. Then in 1800 the NEW YORK CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the New England Conference. At the beginning the New York Conference included the part of the state east of the Hudson River, the state of CONNECTICUT, and parts of MASSACHUSETTS, NEW HAMPSHIRE, and VERMONT. The boundaries were soon extended west to include more of New York. In 1810 the bishops formed the GENESEE CONFERENCE from parts of the New York and Philadelphia Conferences. The Canada Conference was formed in 1824 by dividing the Genesee Conference. In 1828 the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference was set off from the New York Conference. In 1829 came the ONEIDA CONFERENCE which included central New York and a part of Pennsylvania. It was formed by dividing the Genesee Conference. In 1833 the New York Conference was again divided to form the TROY CONFERENCE which included northern New York and a part of Vermont. In 1836 the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE in northern New York was carved out of the Oneida Conference. In 1848 the Genesee Conference was divided to form the EAST GENESEE CONFERENCE in western New York and northern Pennsylvania. The 1848 General Conference divided the New York Conference again to form the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE which included Long Island, part of Connecticut, and a part of New York City. In 1852 the Oneida Conference was divided again to form the WYOMING CONFERENCE. The 1868 General Conference created the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE from parts of the Oneida and Black River Conferences. In 1872 the NORTHERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE superseded the Black River Conference, and the WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE was created by merging all of the Genesee Conference and part of the East Genesee Conference. Unhappy because their conference was abolished in 1872, the preachers from what had been the East Genesee Conference asked the 1876 General Conference to re-create the body. The General Conference complied, but the new East Genesee Conference which it decreed did not include all of the old territory. Whereupon, in the fall of 1876, instead of organizing as the East Genesee Conference, the preachers, with the consent of the bishops, approached the Western New York Conference about a merger, and the two bodies immediately united to form a new Genesee Conference.

Beginning in 1876 the M.E. Church had seven English-speaking conferences in New York: Central New York, Genesee, New York, Northern New York, New York East, Troy, and Wyoming. The latter three contained more or less territory from surrounding states. There was not another change in the names of these seven conferences until 1964 when the New York Conference absorbed the New York East Conference, and the Genesee Conference again became the Western New York Conference.

Methodism had foreign language work in New York. In 1866 the EAST GERMAN CONFERENCE (called Eastern German Conference for the first two years) was formed. Including all of the German work east of the Allegheny Mountains, it continued until 1943 and was the last of the German language conferences in the denomination to be absorbed. The EASTERN SWEDISH CONFERENCE was formed in 1901 to include all of the Swedish work in the northeastern states. It continued until 1941 before being absorbed. In 1908 the General Conference created the Italian Mission to include all Italian work east of a meridian drawn through Indianapolis. The Italian language work continued until 1916.

The METHODIST PROTESTANTS had work in New York from the beginning. Before the M.P. denomination was organized, a secedent group in northern New York called itself the Rochester Conference. In February 1830, the name was changed to the Genesee Conference. At the time it had about 442 members. The conference continued until 1908 when it was absorbed by the Onondaga Conference (MP). The Onondaga Conference, which then included western, central, and northern New York, continued until unification in 1939. In 1936 it reported forty-four churches, twenty-five preachers, and 2,135 members. On April 21, 1830 the New York Conference (MP) was organized in New York City with a total of ten itinerants and local preachers. Never a strong conference, it merged with the Pennsylvania Conference in 1911 to form the Eastern Conference. At that time the New York Conference had 2,133 members.

The work of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in New York is divided between its Champlain, Middle Atlantic, and Rochester Conferences, while that of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH is included in its Genesee, New York, and Susquehanna Conferences. The A.M.E. CHURCH has a New York Conference, the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH has a New York and a Western New York Conference, while the New York work of the C.M.E. CHURCH is included in its New York-Washington Conference.

In the early years all of the New York conferences of the M.E. Church supported schools and colleges. Nearly all of them had for longer or shorter periods a "conference seminary" or academy. The Genesee Wesleyan Seminary continued for more than 100 years. Such institutions as WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, and the BOSTON and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES were commended and supported as they came into existence. In more recent years the conferences have been contributing substantial sums for the support of WESLEY FOUNDATIONS and campus ministries at many state institutions of higher learning. In 1968 Syracuse University was the only Methodist institution of higher learning in the state, though the Troy Conference was giving support to Methodist related GREEN MOUNTAIN and Vermont (junior) Colleges in Vermont.

New York Methodism has furnished leadership for the larger church. Eighteen members of New York annual conferences have been elected bishops: BEVERLY WAUGH (1836), EDMUND S. JAMES (1844), JESSE T. PECK and EDWARD G. ANDREWS (1872), CYRUS D. FOSS and ERASTUS O. HAVEN (1880), DANIEL A. GOODSSELL (1888), CHARLES C. MCCABE (1896), WILLIAM F. ANDERSON (1908), THEODORE S. HENDERSON (1912), ERNEST G. RICHARDSON and FREDERICK T. KEENEY (1920), WALLACE E. BROWN (1924), RALPH S. CUSHMAN (1928), CHARLES W. FLINT (1936), W. EARL LEDDEN (1944), and FREDERICK B. NEVELL (1952) and ROY C. NICHOLS (1968). Six men who served as members of the New York Conference at sometime in their career were not members of that conference or any other in New York at the time they were elevated to the episcopacy: ELIJAH HEDDING, JOSHUA SOULE, JOHN EMORY, DAVIS W. CLARK, RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, and LORENZO H. KING. Sixteen other men were either born in New York, or began their ministry there, but were serving elsewhere when elevated to the episcopacy: HENRY B. BASCOM, FRANCIS BURNS, CALVIN KINGSLEY, LINUS PARKER, WILLIAM X. NINDE, JOHN P. NEWMAN, BURTON R. JONES, HENRY SPELLMEYER, FRANK M. BRISTOL, WILSON S. LEWIS, RICHARD J. COOKE, FREDERICK D. LEETE, HERBERT WELCH, ERNEST L. WALDORF, FRED P. CORSON, and DWIGHT E. LODER. Two of the men in the latter list, Henry B. Bascom and Linus Parker, were elected bishops in the M.E. Church, South. Six bishops of the Free Methodist Church and two of the Methodist Episcopal Church in CANADA were born in New York. In addition to bishops, New York Methodism has furnished many leaders in other areas of the work of the church.

A number of service institutions in New York State bear witness to the outreach of Methodism's influence. Homes for the aged include Bethany Methodist Home, Brooklyn; Bethel Methodist Home, Ossining; Blocher Homes, Williamsville; Elizabeth Church Manor, Endwell; Folts Home, Herkeimer; Frontier Methodist Home, Niagara; Methodist Church Home of New York, Bronx; Methodist Church Home, West Haven, Conn.; Methodist Home, Rochester; Methodist Retirement Center, Shelton, Conn.; and New York Deaconess Home, 1175 Park Avenue, New York City. Homes for children and young people include Methodist Home, Williamsville; St. Christopher's School, Dobbs Ferry; and Alma Mathews House for young women, 273 West 11th Street, New York City. Methodism has three hospitals in the state: Bethany Deaconess Hospital, and METHODIST HOSPITAL in BROOKLYN; and the hospital at the University of Syracuse. The Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn is the oldest Methodist hospital in America. John H. Vincent, later bishop, led in establishing the CHAUTAUQUA Institute at Lake Chautauqua in 1874. Chautauqua and a number of camps and conference centers are in operation every summer. An Indian Mission is maintained at Hogsburg.

In 1939 the Central New York, Genesee, New York, Northern New York, New York East, Troy, and Wyoming Conferences had a total of 27 districts, 1,773 charges, 458,635 members, and property valued at $79,707,369.

In 1970 the Central New York, Northern New York, Western New York, New York, Troy, Erie, and Wyoming Conferences reported 28 districts, 1,459 charges, 1,989 ministers, 593,724 members, property valued at $396,789,444, and a total of $38,288,712 raised for all purposes during the year. These totals are not the exact statistics for Methodism in the state of New York. About one-half of the Wyoming Conference is in Pennsylvania; the New York Conference includes a part of Connecticut; the Troy Conference includes all of Vermont; and the Northern New Jersey Conference takes in a small part of the state of New York.

The Methodist Church had approximately 480,000 members in the state of New York in 1968.

ALBEA GODBOLD

NEW YORK CITY, U.S.A. At the suggestion of Mrs. BARBARA HECK the first Methodist sermon in New York was preached in September 1766 by PHILIP EMBURY in his home on what was then known as Barracks Street. A growing congregation moved successively to an upper room ten doors from the barracks, the famed Rigging Loft on Horse and Cart Street in 1767 and, with the assistance of Captain THOMAS WEBB, into a chapel of its own on John Street Oct. 30, 1768. During the Revolutionary War the membership dwindled from 200 to sixty. Seven annual conferences were held with no appointment made to JOHN STREET CHURCH, which was isolated from the rest of American Methodism by the military situation. John Mann, converted under the ministry of BOARDMAN, occupied the pulpit through the war. In 1783 JOHN DICKINS was appointed and gathered the fragments together. The first session of the annual conference held in New York was in 1788.

As the membership of John Street grew, and as the population of Manhattan moved north, John Street Church began to establish new places of worship on the city's frontier. The first such was the Forsyth Street Church dedicated Nov. 8, 1789. During the next few years, the following additional Manhattan churches were erected: Willett Street, Allen Street, Second Street, Bovey Village (Seventh Street), Twentieth Street (18th Street), Bedford Street, Greene Street, Duane Street.

In 1832, when Methodist membership in New York was 5,433, an administrative decision to divide the churches into an East Circuit and a West Circuit was made. Prior to that, appointments had been made to John Street with its ministers rotating among the churches. Now there were two appointments and two quarterly conferences. A further division took place in 1836, when each church became a separate charge.

Growth in the city. With the abandonment of the circuit system and the deeding of property to local churches, it was inevitable that each newly independent church would be preoccupied with its development to the neglect of other areas of the city. Established churches flourished. Churches at Allen Street, Willett Street and Second Street were overcrowded, but several years elapsed before any new churches were established.

Church extension responsibilities were engaged in by the churches cooperatively through special organizations created for that purpose. Several years earlier, about 1820, the "Sunday School Society" had been established. It appears to have been reorganized as The New York City Sunday School Society about 1838. About 1842 the "Asbury Society" was organized "for the purpose of increasing the number of churches where they were most needed."

The Asbury Society established the Asbury Church in Norfolk Street in 1843 and later the Asbury Church on Jane Street in 1844. It also was instrumental in establishing a floating chapel—"BETHESHP John Wesley"—in 1845 which ministered to Scandinavian seamen and immigrants, and became the mother church of all Scandinavian Methodism in America and in Europe.

In 1844 the Ladies Missionary Society was founded. This organization established "Drydock Mission" on Ninth Street, now Eleventh Street, "Second German Church" on 40th Street, and FIVE POINTS MISSION.

Gradually church extension interests were consolidated with the New York City Sunday School Society. The constitution and by-laws which had been adopted in 1838 were amended in 1864 to include missionary as well as Sunday School work, and its name changed to "The New York City Sunday School and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church." Under this name it was incorporated by act of the legislature in 1866. In 1871 the name was changed to "The New York City Church Extension and Missionary Society of The Methodist Church."

The Brooklyn Church Society of the M. E. Church was incorporated on May 28, 1878 to "aid churches, to give on church indebtedness, incumbrances on property, location of churches and church buildings, and to promote Sunday schools and missions in the city of Brooklyn and the vicinity." In 1917 its charter was amended to include Long Island.

North New York. The establishment of Methodist churches to the north, including Yorkville, Harlem, Bronx, Riverdale, began modestly about 1830 and accelerated in the period 1850 to 1870. The "Harlem Mission" first appears in the conference minutes in 1830, and includes all of Manhattan Island north of 23rd Street. Prior to this more than half of Manhattan Island was without regular Methodist preaching. The Seventh Street Church, and the Eighteenth Street Church, were on the frontier. The area above 23rd Street was served by only two Dutch Reformed churches and perhaps four Protestant Episcopal churches. Here, however, Methodism developed some of its strongest churches among which were St. Paul, St. Andrews, Madison Avenue (now Christ Church) and Park Avenue.

The first Methodist church established in the area now known as Harlem was St. James, about 1830. After worshipping in several buildings, the present location on Madison Avenue at 126th Street was obtained in 1869. A strong Negro congregation continues a noble tradition in this building under the name Metropolitan Community Church. Negro people have held an important place in New York Methodism since the first meeting of the small group of five to which Philip Embury preached in the autumn of 1766. One of the five was a woman identified only as Betty, an African servant. The conference journal for 1786 reports 178 whites and twenty-five colored members in New York. In 1871 the most successful Methodist church for Negroes, St. Mark's, was established on Broadway, between 36th and 37th Streets. It was later relocated to St. Nicholas Avenue and 137th Street, Harlem, and shares with Salem Church in Harlem the honor of being the strongest churches of New York Methodism.

Even before the Harlem Mission, and the early spread of Methodism through the northern half of Manhattan Island, a Methodist church appears to have been established in Kingsbridge, north of the Harlem River, in 1826. It was known by various names: South Yonkers, Kingsbridge, North New York Mission, and in 1876, became St. Stephen's Church.

In the period between 1850 and 1865 several churches were established in the Bronx—Morrisania 1850, Fordham 1854, Tremont 1855, and Willis Avenue 1865.

Brooklyn. Attention was given Brooklyn early in Methodist history. Captain Webb, while riding the Long Island circuit in 1768, had occasionally preached a sermon in the home of a friend in Brooklyn. Prior to the revolution the few Methodists living in Brooklyn ferried to Manhattan to attend services first at the Rigging Loft and later at Wesley Chapel. FRANCIS ASBURY records a visit to Flatbush, a part of Brooklyn, Sept. 7, 1774, when he "heard Mr. Peabody preach." Woolman Hickson, who was assigned to New York in 1787, and who died in 1788, preached his first sermon in Brooklyn in the open air, standing upon a table in Sands Street, at the location upon which the Sands Street Church was later built. Peter Cannon accepted Hickson's invitation to make a regular meeting place available. This was his coopers shop. A class was soon formed, the first in Brooklyn, and NICHOLAS SNETHEN was the first leader.

By 1790 Brooklyn had become a regular preaching appointment, and was attached to the Long Island circuit. This circuit was served by two preachers. They alternated preaching a month in Brooklyn and a month elsewhere on Long Island. Those serving during the early years were Jacob Brush, John Eagan, James Boyd, Joseph Totten, and George Straveck.

Formal organization took place in the home of Peter Cannon on May 19, 1794. Property on Sands Street was purchased and a church erected and dedicated by Joseph Totten on June 1, 1794 as the "First Methodist Episcopal Church in the town of Brooklyn, Kings County, Nassau Island." Brooklyn became a separate station in 1795 and Joseph Totten became the first station preacher with thirty-five members.

Methodism was first established in the Borough and County of Queens, in New York City, with the organization of a church in Newtown (now Middle Village) in 1784. It was then the western point on a Long Island circuit with Commack the eastern point. These two accounted for twenty-four Methodists. Sixteen years earlier, 1768, Captain Thomas Webb first conducted Methodist services in this community at the home of James Harper, whose sons founded the publishing firm of HARPER & COMPANY. Meetings were held in the kitchen of his home in what is now Metropolitan Avenue. Later Newtown was a stop on the "circuit riding route" of JOSEPH PILMORE (1769-71) and Francis Asbury (1771-73). The first frame church was erected in 1785 at the corner of Dry Harbour and Junifer Roads.

Early Methodism in Jamaica is also associated with Captain Webb. The kindred of his wife lived in Jamaica. When retirement offered more leisure for travel "he went thither, hired a house and preached in it, and twenty-four persons received justifying grace." However, it was not until 1807 that a church was organized. It was a part of a circuit until 1843 when Joseph Ensign became its first resident pastor.

The old Long Island circuit was divided into two circuits in 1810—one in Suffolk County, on the east, and the other the Jamaica circuit on the west. This arrangement lasted until the Flushing circuit was organized in 1824.

Staten Island. The first sermon Francis Asbury preached in the State of New York was on Staten Island. His diary notation for Nov. 6, 1771 states: "In the way from thence [Philadelphia and Burlington] to New York I met with one, Peter Van Pelt, who had heard me preach at Philadelphia. After some conversation, he invited me to his house on Staten Island; and as I was not engaged to be at New York on any particular day, I went with him and preached in his house." PETER VAN PELT's family settled on Staten Island in 1687. He was a prominent citizen and a Methodist. His house was on Wood Road, about one half mile from the place where the Wood Road Church was built in 1787.

On Nov. 10, 1771, Asbury again preached at the home of Van Pelt, and in the evening a large congregation had gathered at the home of Justice Hezekiah Wright. He was Justice of the Court of Common Pleas of the Province of New York, and a prominent citizen who operated a fleet of vessels in coastal trade. Obviously, the seeds of Methodism had been sown on Staten Island earlier. Pilmore, Williams, and probably Boardman and Webb, had preceded Asbury in preaching on this Island. The Woodrow Church was organized May 5, 1787 in the home of Abraham Cole. The frame church was built and dedicated that year. Thomas Morrell was assigned as the first settled minister. The present Colonial church was dedicated Dec. 25, 1842—the earlier church having been destroyed by lightning.

The second Methodist church to have been established on Staten Island was Asbury in 1803 on what is now Richmond Avenue, New Springfield. Until 1806 it was known as both North End and Bold Neck Church. The present church was built on the same site in 1849. HENRY BOEHM was the first settled minister, 1802-3.

The Kingsley Church in Stapleton was organized in 1835. It was located at a private home until a frame church was dedicated Sept. 1, 1838 on the site of the present church.

Those three churches established outposts which was the pattern by which Methodism spread on Staten Island. Woodrow Church established Bethel Mission in Tottenville in 1822, St. John's Chapel at Rossville in 1854 and Pleasant Plains Church in 1854 (originally a class in 1837).

Asbury started Mariners Harbour Church in 1839, Dickinson Church in 1842, and Bloomfield Church in 1884. Kingsley established Quarantine Mission in 1840 and took on St. James of Rosebank as a mission as late as 1910.

Bethel A.M.E. Church. In the fall of 1817 Bishop RICHARD ALLEN, desiring to establish work in New York City where the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH had already made substantial progress, commissioned William Lambert, a member of the Philadelphia Conference, to go to New York City as an A.M.E. missionary. After arriving in New York Lambert secured the use of a school room on Mott Street in which he held services often, consecrating it for that purpose. Later in that same year (1818), Henry Harden was appointed to New York City. The young society remained at the Mott Street location until 1827 and continued to grow under Harden's leadership. Between 1827 and 1836 Bethel moved to locations on Orange Street, Centre Street, Elizabeth Street and Second Street, where they remained until about 1860. In 1860 Bethel moved to Sullivan Street where it grew to become one of the largest and most influential churches in the city. Between the First and Second World Wars it followed the Negro population of the city to its present uptown location.

Christ Church, Methodist, at Park Avenue and Sixtieth Street, is the denomination's central and leading church in America's metropolis. Standing at the heart of New York City and at "the gateway of the continent" it approximates in aim and influence JOHN WESLEY's concept, "the world is my parish."

It had its beginning in 1881 as the Madison Avenue M.E. Church. It was organized by a group of Methodists who wished to provide a Christian ministry for the increasing number of families who were establishing homes on the east side of Central Park, then a newly occupied part of the city.

From 1882 to 1917 the church had eight pastors: O. H. Tiffany, Charles Putnam Masden, Ensign McChesney, Sylvester F. Jones, Andrew Longacre, Wallace MacMullen, CHARLES L. MEAD (later bishop), and WORTH M. TIPPY. In 1915 RALPH W. SOCKMAN joined the staff and became pastor in 1917.

Sockman's fifty-year record of active service in the single metropolitan parish is unique in the annals of the ministry: lay member, 1911-13; student assistant, 1913-15; associate minister, 1915-17; senior minister, 1917-61. Under his guidance and radio ministry Christ Church became known throughout the Christian world. He was succeeded as senior pastor by HAROLD A. BOSLEY.

The new church building located at Park Avenue and Sixtieth Street was planned in 1929. Meanwhile, the present name, Christ Church, Methodist, had been adopted. The cornerstone was laid in November 1931, and the building was dedicated Nov. 26, 1933. Effective Nov. 15, 1933 the East Sixty-First M.E. Church was consolidated with Christ Church. This was pursuant to agreement and the order of Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL with Sockman and Benjamin F. Saxon, who had been pastor of the East Sixty-First Church since 1909, as associate pastors.

The desire to build a beautiful sanctuary, as well as a structure adequate to its program, led to the selection of Ralph Adams Cram as architect, and his design was strongly influenced by the older Byzantine and Romanesque churches of the Mediterranean area. He recognized the limitation of the site in a mid-city area and created a church building with a restrained and well-proportioned exterior. Within he gave maximum space to the sanctuary, using glittering mosaic and rich marble for heightened color, with Christ as the central figure. Today the mosaics in Christ Church are regarded as among the best in America. The cost of land and building was over $3,000,000 in the 1930's, and the value has been greatly enhanced by the growth of the city.

In its physical form the church blends the East and the West. In its ministry and its work, it seeks to transcend man-made boundaries. Its membership includes leaders in the professional, economic and political life of the city, a large number of business and professional women and many students. Because of its pulpit, its beauty, and its central location, Christ Church attracts many week-day visitors as well as Sunday worshippers.

The Church Center for the United Nations is a twelve-story edifice on the U. N. Plaza—directly opposite the U. N. Headquarters Building—in New York City. It is an ecumenical building for the programs and services of interdenominational and denominational agencies concerned with humanitarian, peace, and social welfare interests. The edifice was erected by the BOARD OF MISSIONS and by the BOARD OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS of The Methodist Church—both boards combining their programs of seminars and study of subjects and projects related to the U. N. Other organizations have headquarters in the building. It was opened for occupancy in May 1963, and consecrated the September following.

Notable in the Center are the Walter Van Kirk Memorial Library, the Dag Hammarskjöld Memorial Lounge, the Charles F. Boss Conference Room, and the Sadie Willman Tillman Chapel.

Interchurch Center, the principal center of united Protestant and Orthodox witness and outreach in the U.S.A., is a modern nineteen-story edifice in New York City, bearing the address "475 Riverside Drive," and facing onto the Hudson River in upper Manhattan Island. It is in the area known as the City's cultural "Acropolis" which includes Columbia University and related institutions.

The site was donated by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and many church organizations and individuals contributed to the erection of the edifice. The cornerstone was laid by President Eisenhower on Oct. 12, 1958, and the dedication was on May 29, 1960.

The Interchurch Center houses many tenant organizations, these employ about 2,200 persons. About 30,000 persons "sight-see" the Center each year; and many more thousands visit for church and related business. Besides denominational offices, exhibits, etc., visitors are interested in the Chapel and its sculptured ceiling, the Orthodox Room and its display of ancient icons, the Treasure Room which has many rare manuscripts of hymns and church music, and the original manuscript of the RSV Bible; and throughout the building tablets and other memorials to church leaders of recent years—men who contributed to the ecumenical movement.

The Board of Missions of the United Methodist Church occupies three floors in the Interchurch Center. Other Methodist agencies, presently housed there include: the A.M.E. CHURCH; the Foreign Missions Department of the A.M.E. Zion Church; the Interboard Committee for Christian Work in JAPAN, OKINAWA, the PHILIPPINES; the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF; the New York City Society; the Brooklyn and Long Island Church Society; the New York Area Episcopal Office; the TELEVISION, RADIO, AND FILM COMMISSION; the New York Area Planning Commission.

Interdenominational and ecumenical organizations there with which the United Methodist Church works closely include: Agricultural Missions, Inc.; the Hymn Society of America; the Japan International Christian University Foundation; the Congo Protestant Relief Agency; Ludhiana Christian Medical College Board; the John Milton Society; the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ; the Protestant Council of the City of New York; the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; the World Council of Religious Education; Vellore Christian Medical College Board; and the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia.

John Street Church (See JOHN STREET).

St. Mark's Church, in upper Manhattan, is one of the largest churches in the United Methodist connection, having presently approximately 4,700 members. It was organized on June 12, 1871, but moved to the present site on Nov. 22, 1920. The building is a stately one and acts as a center for the community about, serving many of its needs. It has an unusually active youth program, and is a member of the Harlem Interfaith Housing Corporation—a non-profit organization for the development of housing for community residents in that part of New York. A staff of four ministers serves St. Mark's.

Salem Church is a large church far up on Seventh Avenue, which ministers to a congregation of 2,600 members in the heart of Harlem. It was begun in April of 1902 in a storefront at 250 St. Nicholas Avenue as a mission of St. Mark's Church under the ministry of Williams H. Brooks. F. A. Cullen of the DELAWARE CONFERENCE was appointed to develop the new work. In August that year Salem moved to 232 West 124th Street in a private home previously used as a club and gambling center. In February of 1904 fire destroyed the worship area of Salem. With the help of the New York City Society, FRANK MASON NORTH, Secretary, six houses were purchased in 1911 at 133rd Street and Lenox Avenue. In 1908, Salem became an independent charge, and its rapid growth continued. In 1924 when Old Calvary M.E. Church, on Seventh Avenue and 192nd street decided to relocate, Salem was ready to occupy the 2,000 seat sanctuary.

Dr. Cullen led Salem Church for forty-two years. He was succeeded by Charles Y. Trigg whose thirteen years of distinguished service witnessed a major renovation and won the fight that saved the facilities from threatened demolition to make way for city housing. Dr. Trigg retired in 1955, and is presently Minister Emeritus. In 1955 Joshua O. Williams became pastor of Salem until his death in 1963. During his pastorate major plans for an exterior renovation and a new community center were made. Samuel Sweeney served as interim pastor until June, 1964. In July Dr. Roy C. NICHOLS became pastor and by November 1967 the new community center had been completed and exterior renovation realized at a cost of over $800,000. The complete plant of Salem is valued at $1.3 million. Salem continued its outreach and service to the Harlem community. In July 1968, at the North-eastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, Dr. Nichols was elected bishop. F. Herbert Skeete was thereupon appointed as pastor in August 1968.

Salem was the first Negro work organized in Harlem by a major denomination. Other older churches moved to Harlem from downtown in later years. The outstanding ministry of Salem to the social problems of its people continues with faithful support given the National Association for Advancement of Colored People and the New York Urban League. The latter was organized in Salem's dining room on 133rd Street.

Salem is located in the midst of St. Nicholas Housing project, and eighty percent of its membership live in Central Harlem. This cross-section congregation combines enthusiastic worship with twenty-eight John Wesley type classes, and these classes have accounted for the warmth and vigor of Salem from its inception. Six choirs serve the musical needs of Salem, with five directors and 240 members. Three ministers serve the pastoral needs of Salem and its community.

NEW YORK CONFERENCE (ME) was created in 1800 by dividing the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. Its territory at the outset was NEW YORK east of the Hudson River, the state of CONNECTICUT, and parts of MASSACHUSETTS, NEW HAMPSHIRE, and VERMONT. The conference was organized at NEW YORK CITY, June 19, 1800 with Bishop ASBURY presiding. Forty preachers attended, and appointments were made to twenty-eight charges. In 1803 the conference reported 11,458 white and 391 colored members.

As the years passed the boundaries of the New York Conference were altered many times. The most important boundary changes occurred when other conferences were carved from it or merged with it. The following conferences were set off from New York Conference territory in the years indicated: GENESEE, 1810; NEW HAMPSHIRE and VERMONT, 1828; TROY, 1833; and NEW YORK EAST, 1849. The latter merged with the New York Conference in 1964, thereby making the new New York Conference one of the strongest in the denomination. After the division into two conferences in 1849, the New York Conference was left with about 25,000 members. When the two conferences merged in 1964, the total membership was about 198,000.

Credit is due PHILIP EMBURY, BARBARA HECK, RICHARD BOARDMAN, JOSEPH PILMORE, and FRANCIS ASBURY for establishing Methodism in New York City and its immediate environs. (See New York.) In 1788 FREEBORN GARRETTSON began work as presiding elder in the region that stretches from New York City to CANADA and from Connecticut to Utica, and in the next thirty years he more than any other man was responsible for establishing Methodism in that area. At RHINEBECK up the Hudson is the house in which Garrettson and his wife, Catherine Livingstone, lived until he died in 1827. In that year the New York Conference reported 30,223 members.

In 1841 a mission to German-speaking people was founded in New York City. In time there were two German districts in the conference, and in 1866 the EAST GERMAN CONFERENCE was organized.

Responding to the directive of the 1820 GENERAL CONFERENCE that annual conferences found colleges, the New York Conference established WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown, Conn., in 1831. It is the second oldest permanent college in America founded by the Methodists. Wesleyan received strong support from the New York Conference and other surrounding conferences for more than a century until it ceased to be a Methodist related institution. A number of secondary schools which continued for longer or shorter periods were established throughout the New York Conference, the more prominent ones being Charlotteville Seminary at Charlotteville, Amenia Seminary at Amenia, Hedding Literary Institute at Ashland, Hudson River Institute at Claverack, and Drew Seminary for Young Women at Carmel.

In 1881 the METHODIST HOSPITAL in BROOKLYN, the oldest Methodist related hospital in America, was established in response to a challenging editorial in the Christian Advocate by the editor, JAMES M. BUCKLEY. GEORGE I. SENEY, the son of a Methodist minister, read the editorial which asked, "Is it not time that somewhere we built a hospital?" Seney then gave property and cash totaling $410,000 for launching the hospital. The institution started a school for training nurses in 1888. The hospital now covers a city block and there are plans for its further enlargement.

Other service institutions within the bounds of the New York Conference are: St. Christopher's Home for Children, Dobbs Ferry; Bethany Deaconess Hospital, Brooklyn; Bethel Methodist Home, Ossining; Methodist Church Home of New York, Bronx; Methodist Church Home, West Haven, Conn.; Bethany Methodist Home, Brooklyn; New York Deaconess Association Home, 1175 Park Ave., New York City; Methodist Retirement Center, Shelton, Conn.; and the Alma Mathews House for young women, 273 West 11th Street, New York City.

The New York Conference Center and Business Offices are located on a twenty-acre tract at Rye, N. Y. The Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church is domiciled at the Interchurch Center, 475 Riverside Drive, and the Church Center for the United Nations is at 777 United Nations Plaza in New York City.

The New York Conference operates four camps for children, youth, and adults: Quinipet at Shelter Island, Long Island; Sessions Woods at Bristol, Conn.; Epworth at High Falls; and Kingswood at Hancock.

Throughout its history the New York Conference has been affected by, and has endeavored to wield some influence on, the large number of immigrants entering the United States through New York. Starting with the German-speaking people in 1841 there have been ethnic churches down to the present. (See East German and Eastern Swedish Conferences, and Italian Mission.) In recent years Negroes from the South and Spanish-speaking people from PUERTO RICO have come to New York in large numbers. Much of the conference's effort to minister to ethnic groups in the inner city is channeled through the New York City, Brooklyn, and Long Island Methodist Societies. These societies join with the National Board of Missions and with other denominations in the work. In recent years the New York Conference has raised $5,000,000 to strengthen its ministry in the inner city, the suburbs, and the rural areas of the conference. The New York Conference has had some Negro members in its churches from the beginning, and it has had some large Negro congregations in New York City for many years. In 1959 Bishop FREDERICK B. NEVELL appointed a Negro minister to the church at Modena, New York, and beginning in 1962 the conference has had at least one Negro district superintendent in the bishop's cabinet. In 1968 Roy C. NICHOLS of the New York Conference was elected a bishop by the Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference, the first Negro ever elevated to the Methodist episcopacy "without regard to race" by a white JURISDICTIONAL or GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Over the years the New York Conference has provided the larger church with a number of bishops, missionaries, educators, theologians, editors, and other leaders. (See New York for a partial list of the bishops.)

The New York Conference came to unification in 1939 with four districts, 218 charges, 65,165 members, and property valued at $18,592,899. In 1963 the conference had 185 charges, and 74,129 members.

In 1968 the New York Conference reported eight districts, 441 charges, 709 ministers, 201,257 members, property valued at $165,637,374, and a total of $16,061,871 raised for all purposes during the year.

NEW YORK CONFERENCE (EUB) traces its origin to 1812, when the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION first gained a foothold in New York State. Although this mission failed, Christian Wolf then was sent into the state where he worked patiently around Fayette, Seneca County, N. Y., until he had established a nucleus for the denomination. Help arrived later and a circuit was formed. While Jacob Kleinfelter served the field, JOHN DREISBACH made regular visits as presiding elder. The work became organized as the "Seneca Circuit" and was a part of the Williamsport, Pa., District. The "Mohawk Circuit" was established in 1833 to minister to the Mohawk-German people along the Mohawk and Canajoharie Valleys.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE meeting at New Berlin, Pa., Sept. 29, 1847, decided that the work in New York and CANADA should be formed into a conference. The following February, at the session of the East Pennsylvania Conference, the New York Conference was formally organized with Bishop JOHN SEYBERT presiding. This conference brought the missionary efforts of the Canada, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and Albany Districts into one body with eleven circuits and 1,856 members. The first separate session was held in Buffalo on April 25, 1849. The work in Canada was separated from the New York Conference in 1865 and continued as the Canada Conference until January 1968, when it merged with the United Church of Canada.

Following favorable votes for conference union, the New York Conference churches were united with former Methodist conferences, Sept. 14, 1968. Eleven congregations were received into their respective conferences by the TROY, WYOMING, NORTHERN NEW YORK, and CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCES. The remaining twenty-two churches united with the WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE.

In 1966 there were thirty elders with thirty-four organized congregations and 6,929 members. Total money raised for all purposes that year amounted to $599,546, while congregational property was valued at $3,886,996.

NEW YORK CONFERENCE SEMINARY AND COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE was a co-educational school, located in Charlotteville, Schoharie Co., N.Y., established in 1850. Though financed by private funds, it was endorsed by the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. Under the principalship of Alonzo Flack success was almost immediate, necessitating the addition in 1852 of two wings attached to the main building. Students by 1854 had increased to 1,253.

It was in 1854 that the original Seminary building was completely destroyed by fire. A single building had been in the meantime erected about a quarter of a mile away, designed to house the collegiate portion of the institution. Into this building the Seminary moved.

The original intent of the founders had been to operate the Seminary in conjunction with a collegiate department and also with a university, located in Troy, N.Y., and known as Troy University. This latter institution was built and operated long enough to graduate one class, but financial reverses faced by the promoters of this enterprise brought about failure, and the property was sold to one of the Roman Catholic orders.

A second fire, in 1867, reduced the Seminary to ashes, yet the trustees and faculty persisted in endeavoring to continue the life of the school. A large hotel in the community was purchased and fitted for school purposes, under the management of Solomon Sias, the son of the Rev. Solomon Sias, associate of ASBURY and later publisher of Zion's Herald. Charlotteville Seminary closed some time in 1875 and was not revived.

The significance of this Seminary is not to be measured in terms of its disasters, not the least of which was the decimation of much of the male portion of the students by the Civil War. The school offered an impressive curriculum. Literally hundreds of teachers went out from this school and an uncounted number of Methodist preachers received formal training there. Academically, Charlotteville Seminary rated among the best.

New York State Education Department markers have been placed to mark the site of the Seminary, beside the country road passing through Charlotteville.

NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE (ME). The 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the New York East Conference by dividing the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. A list of appointments for the New York East Conference was read out at the 1848 session of the New York Conference which was held in the Washington Street Church, BROOKLYN, beginning June 14. However, the New York East Conference did not hold its first separate session until May 30, 1849 when it met at Middletown, Conn., with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. The conference began with four districts, New York East, Long Island, New Haven, and Hartford. It had 114 charges and 21,485 members. At the beginning the territory of the conference was a part of New York City, Long Island, and the part of CONNECTICUT west of the Connecticut River, and its boundaries remained essentially the same throughout the conference's 115-year history.

The New York East Conference came to unification in 1939 with four districts, 259 charges, 96,874 members, and property valued at $20,265,241.

In 1964 the New York East Conference merged with the New York Conference to form again the larger New York Conference. In its last year the New York East Conference reported four districts—Brooklyn North, Brooklyn South, New Haven, and New York—262 charges, 390 ministers, 124,090 members, property valued at $74,553,701, and a total of $8,791,480 raised for all purposes during the year.

ALBEA GODBOLD

NEW ZEALAND. This favored land consists of eight islands in the South Western Pacific, 1,200 miles across the Tasman Sea from the east coast of AUSTRALIA. The two main islands, the North and the South, are separated by the narrow Cook Strait (fourteen miles across at its narrowest part), and are inhabited by 2,808,590 people (1970). Though the South Island is the larger, two thirds of the people live in the North Island.

The large majority are Europeans, or "Pakehas" as they are often called to distinguish them from the Maoris. The latter number about 160,000, and were here before the Europeans. They claim that the islands were fished up out of the sea by Maui, the god-man. The geologists offer a similar explanation. Three hundred million years ago the land rose out of the sea, and since then has sunk beneath the waves again and again. This claim is supported by the rocks of the Southern Alps, the mighty backbone of the South Island, by the petrified forests on the coast line, and by fossil remains in many places.

Present-day Maoris trace their descent from those who came to New Zealand by canoe during the fourteenth century. They mark the southern limit of the Polynesian advance in the Pacific, the northern limit of which is Hawaii. After reaching New Zealand, the Maoris multiplied here until there were, perhaps, 200,000 in all.

They are a noble people, and evolved an impressive culture, though they possessed only bone and stone implements. Sinclair, in A History of New Zealand, says of them:

In some of their crafts they produced objects not yet surpassed in beauty of design or decoration by the works of their successors. They excelled in carving in wood, on their canoes, on their ornate meeting houses, on their boxes and tattooing funnels, and in stone. (p. 19)

The Maori recognised vast numbers of gods: but some recognised a supreme God who created the other gods and the universe. His name was Io; Io the parentless, Io of the hidden face, Io the giver of life. (pp. 20-21)

were the great excitements of the Maori public, and the greater of these was war. The Maoris were the greatest of the Polynesian peoples. (p. 24)

In 1642, the Dutchman Abel Tasman sailed down the west coast of New Zealand. In 1769, Captain James Cook sighted the east coast of the North Island, and sailed right round the two islands. In 1773 for the second time, and in 1777 for the third time he visited the land. Many other explorers followed Cook, and then the sealers, missionaries, whalers, and traders appeared, much in that order.

Christian Mission. In 1814, Samuel Marsden, an Anglican clergyman from SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES, preached the first Christian sermon, and in 1822 SAMUEL LEIGH, the first Methodist missionary in the same state, came to New Zealand, and began work at Kaero in the far north of the North Island. In 1827, the station (Wesleydale) was destroyed by a Maori war party, and the missionaries narrowly escaped with their lives. The following year they began again on the opposite, or west, coast of the far north, at Mangungu on the Hokianga Harbor. It proved a successful venture, and by 1840 there were fifteen to twenty missionaries throughout the two islands.

The Maoris were most responsive to the Christian message. One missionary declared at that time that ninety percent of the people were disciples of Christ.

In 1840 the Treaty of Waitangi was signed. In this, Queen Victoria extended her protection to the Maori people, and reserved to them their fishing and other rights. Thus, without bloodshed, New Zealand passed under the control of Britain. The treaty played, and still plays, an important part in the development of the land. Without the influence of the missionaries, this treaty would probably not have been signed. This applies especially to the Anglican and Wesleyan missionaries. The Roman Catholic Bishop Pompallier and his French priests were present; they played no leading part in persuading the chiefs to sign.

At this time the Methodists had eight stations, two of them in the South Island: fifteen missionaries, with 1,300 members, and there were good working arrangements with the Anglican mission to prevent overlapping.

Unfortunately, the growing influence of the Pakehas and disputes regarding land led to fighting between the two peoples. The Maori Wars, as they were called, lasted sporadically from 1845 to 1869, and with one exception, they gravely affected the Methodist mission. One of the missionaries, JOHN WHITELEY, was killed in 1869 by the Maoris, and his death so shocked them that they would fight no longer.

Until the turn of the century it was thought that the Maoris were a dying people, but then there was a renaissance under Maori leadership, and ever since, the Maoris have increased, so that today their birth rate is much higher than that of the Europeans. The Methodist mission has not prospered to the extent that seemed likely in the early days, largely through resistance on the part of the Maori people—an unhappy legacy of bitterness from the Maori Wars. According to the 1970 census, there are today 225,435 Maoris and about 7½ percent of the Maori population claim to be Methodists.

There has been a revival of nationalism among the Maori people. Movements have combined old Maori pagan beliefs, a blend or mixture of Old Testament and New Testament teaching, and a strong national sentiment. "Ratana" is the strongest of these movements, and it ranks as the third largest Maori denomination and the eighth largest in the country. The Methodists have privileges in Ratana Pa and among the children granted to no other church. This is due to the foresight and devotion of some of the missionaries thirty and more years ago.

The great majority of the Maoris today are under twenty-one years of age. There is a gradual fusion of the two peoples. Not a great many full-blooded Maoris are left even now.

Nowadays, Maori ministers are being trained in the same theological classes as European students, and some of them have won university degrees. Deaconesses are doing a splendid work among the women and children. Other denominations and sects are now at work among the Maoris, and some of them are right up alongside the Methodist stations. Others are in hitherto unoccupied areas.

Figures for other denominations in the 1961 census were: Anglican, 51,000; Roman Catholic, 28,500; Ratana, 22,000; Methodist, 12,611; and Mormon, 12,000.

The Methodist mission to New Zealand has been a noteworthy one. At the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi, Methodist chiefs played a leading part in persuading the other chiefs to sign. In large areas Methodist influence prepared the way for the white settler. In Otago, for instance, when the pioneers from Southland began negotiations with the Maoris for the purchase of land, the Maoris opened proceedings each day with prayer. These are some of the indications of the value of the mission to New Zealand at large.

The European Mission. Gradually the emphasis of the work changed from the Maori to the European. At first the work was administered from England. It was financed largely by the mission committee in London, both by direct grants and by providing the missionaries with articles for barter. From first to last over £200,000 was devoted to the mission. In 1844 the grants began to grow smaller, though the needs were greater. During these years the missionaries were poor. They lived in homes meantly furnished. At times they were severely handicapped in their work by the shortage of money.

In 1854 New Zealand was transferred to the Australasian Conference. In 1869 the grants from England ceased altogether, and the New Zealand circuits took over the cost of the Maori work, as well as paying their own expenses. Ever since, the home and Maori missions have been closely linked.

As for barter, the mission society in London sent out articles like axes and tobacco to be paid to the Maoris for services rendered, or in return for food bought from them. It was a cumbersome system, for the missionaries had to provide storerooms, often costly to build. Moreover, the extravagance of some missionaries encouraged idleness among the Maori lads, who, as one missionary wrote, "share no little of the property."

In 1873 New Zealand became a separate conference in the Australasian church, and sent representatives every three years to a General Conference. In 1896, the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES and the BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH in New Zealand joined with the Wesleyan Methodists. On Jan. 1, 1913, the Wesleyan Methodist Church in New Zealand separated from the General Conference of Australasia, and on the following February 6, the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS joined the Wesleyans to form "The Methodist Church of New Zealand," the first Conference of which met at once in WELLINGTON.

Until 1869, every minister in the Methodist churches of New Zealand had been born overseas. Slowly the proportion of New Zealand-born men began to increase, until, by the turn of the century, nearly all the candidates for the ministry were New Zealanders. It is probable that Methodists would have been a stronger church had they continued to receive a larger number of overseas men into the ministry.

The training of the men for the work was inadequate in those early years. Not until 1912 did Methodists possess a theological college proper (Dunholme), and then it was a rented building. In 1929, a worthy college with a hostel for students (university and other) attached, was opened in AUCKLAND (Trinity), and since then the standard of training has consistently risen, until today that standard is high.

Much of the pioneering work of the earlier years was carried out by consecrated home missionaries, who took the message into every corner of the land, and laid the foundations of what are today the circuits. For example, in 1913 Methodists had forty-four home missionaries, all untrained, but their witness was most effective. In 1966 there were only two home missionaries and four home missionary "supplies." It is now the policy of the Conference to man the stations either with ministers or supplies, the idea of offering men a life service as home missionaries having been abandoned. The country is still developing, and "supply" appointments will still be needed for some time to come.

Education. The early missionaries attached great importance to their Maori schools. There were, of course, no other schools. The government began to make grants to the schools of different denominations, the Methodist share being, all told, about £20,000. The missionary society expended about an equal amount. In 1853, there were 88 day schools, 188 Sabbath schools, and 5,846 scholars.

Some of the schools were boarding schools, but through the Maori Wars they were closed. In 1877, the government began to establish state schools, but even then the day schools had been closed. The Methodist missionaries were convinced that the work of educating should be left to the state.

Meanwhile the missionaries in the South Pacific had established a school for their own children in Auckland, Wesley College and Seminary, which later became Prince Albert College, but in 1906 even this college was closed.

There were also some Wesleyan schools for European children, but one by one they were all closed. Then in 1876, the work of the former Wesleyan Native Institution was resumed under the name of Wesley College at Three Kings (an Auckland suburb), and the training of the ministers began there. Gradually it built up a roll of scholars, and today, as Wesley College, Paerata, thirty miles south at Auckland, with an enrollment of two hundred boys, it is the one secondary school.

There can be no doubt that Methodism is weaker today than it should be because its record in education is poor.

Sons and daughters of Methodist farmers and professional men have been lost to the schools and colleges of other denominations. Methodists do not have their proportion of leaders in the professions. Despite these facts, there is still solid support among Methodist people that education should be left to the state, because of its greater resources in men and money, and that the churches should have the right to enter the schools, through their ministers and others, to teach the story told in the Bible.

Missions. Until 1913, the year of union with the Primitive Methodists, New Zealand Methodists were sharing with Australian Methodists the work in the South Seas: TONGA, FIJI, NEW GUINEA, and SAMOA, to name the chief fields.

When New Zealand became an independent Conference New Zealanders asked to have their own field, and in 1912 accepted responsibility for the Western Solomons. Here a vigorous mission has been carried on, and in 1966 ministered to 22,000 people. The depression years in the mid-nineteen-thirties, when it was necessary to withdraw some of the staff, and the years of the Second World War, when the Japanese occupied the islands, meant temporary setbacks. Today New Zealand Methodists have joined forces with the Australian Methodists in an additional mission to the highlands of New Guinea. These missions have become a precious part of the interests, and their reflex influence upon the Church in New Zealand has been most valuable.

Of late years New Zealanders have found themselves part of the Southeast Asian group of nations, and there is a growing interest in the Christian witness in these lands.

Missionary interests are shared by the Solomon Islanders themselves, for they have sent eighteen workers to the New Guinea Highlands, proving the genuineness of their own Christian experience.

Publication. The Methodist Board of Publications, carries on the work of a Publications Committee, set up in 1940 to issue pamphlets "setting out in popular form the teaching of the Methodist Church." At the beginning, its policy was somewhat timid, largely through lack of funds.

A bolder frame of mind emerged with the constitution of the Board of Publications in 1946, pledged "to carry through a vigorous policy of publications." It was planned to have a full-time director of publications who would also edit The Methodist Times. Widespread advertising in 1947 failed to attract a suitable candidate and the editor-manager policy has been in abeyance ever since. An appeal for £5000 in 1951 failed to receive adequate support, and this left the board hampered for lack of capital. In spite of this a useful supply of instructional and devotional material has been issued.

RANGIATEA MAORI GIRLS' SCHOOL HOSTEL,

With the commencement of a widely circulating, free, fortnightly newspaper, The New Zealand Methodist, 1966, with Alun Richards as editor, the editor-manager policy still awaits realization, and the board continues with a part-time director.

Social Concerns. The Methodist Social Services Association was established in 1950 and succeeded in co-ordinating the various social services in New Zealand Methodism. This department surveys and makes recommendations annually on a nationwide level to the Conference and gives publicity to, and administers funds for, social service work. Its members consist of city missions, orphanages, eventide homes, hospitals, hostels and Maori Mission relief work.

Statistics. These tell their own story, which, probably runs parallel to the Methodist story in other lands. The following figures are taken from government census returns:

|------------------------|---------|-----------|-----------|
| New Zealand population | 703,360 | 1,334,469 | 2,414,984 |
| Anglican | 40.11% | 43.45% | 34.6% |
| Presbyterian | 22.83% | 25.93% | 22.3% |
| Roman Catholic | 14.23% | 13.60% | 14.4% |
| Methodist | 11.1% | 7.94% | 7.2% |

1. During these years an increasing percentage of people have availed themselves of the opportunity of "objecting to state their religious beliefs." The law allows them to do so. In 1926 there were 62,567, about four percent of the population. In 1956 there were 173,569: roughly eight percent. This exercises no little effect upon the figures in the above table, though one would suppose that the Methodist figures were not greatly affected.

2. It appears from these figures that, like the other Protestant churches, the Methodists have not kept their proportionate place in the community. It also appears that the Roman Catholic Church, in the period 1896-1926, declined, while the two largest Protestant churches increased. In the 1926-61 period, the reverse was the case. Over the last sixty years the Roman Catholic proportion has not altered significantly.

3. If to the table above we add some figures for Methodism, taken from the Minutes of the annual conferences, we learn that the year 1914 marked a high-water mark, that is, proportionately. Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists had just united: and in 1914 the First World War broke out, and hundreds of young men went overseas.

|----------------------------------|--------|--------|--------|
| Churches | 442 | 437 | 445 |
| Other preaching places | 487 | 380 | 213 |
| Ministers in active work | 163 | 176 | 248 |
| Home missionaries in active work | 47 | 32 | 6 |
| Total agents in active work | 210 | 208 | 254 |
| Members | 22,226 | 25,315 | 32,496 |
| Sunday school scholars | 30,191 | 18,913 | 21,458 |

In 1914, 81,713 attendants to public worship were reported. This figure was the largest ever returned. By 1931 it had dropped by 13,000, and the column was eliminated from the Minutes.

It would appear that Methodist Union was followed, whatever the reason, by a falling away. This was undoubtedly due in some measure to the impact of war. In 1939 war again weakened the church (this time by slowing up considerably the rate of increase), and only lately have Methodists begun to resume something of the earlier rate of advance. In the thirty years, 1914-44, the membership increased only 3,089. In the next sixteen years it grew almost 6,000.

But in thirty years (1880-1914) the membership grew from 3,542 to 22,226. The conditions now are different from those of the young pioneering days; but, by careful training of our ministers, and by keeping the evangelistic note in its proper place, and by avoiding another global war, the Methodist witness will fully justify itself in the life of New Zealand.

Trust Board. The Methodist General Purposes Trust Board is incorporated under the provisions of the Charitable and Educational Trusts Act, 1908. Its objects are to hold and administer any real or personal property transferred, devised, or bequeathed to the board, or in any other manner vested in the Board for special purposes or trusts in connection with any Methodist Church in New Zealand, or any church trust, organization, or department of the church. The personnel of the board is identical with that of the Supernumerary Fund.

In 1966 over a hundred different trusts and accounts were being administered, covering funds amounting to some £140,000—evidence of the growing importance of this fund in the general work of the church.

Other Methodist Bodies: Bible Christian Church. BIBLE CHRISTIAN work in New Zealand was started in 1841 at New Plymouth, with the arrival of a local preacher, Henry Gilbert. A small church was built and the Bible Christian Conference was asked to send a preacher. A long-delayed favorable reply came too late—the little congregation joined with the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS. A second beginning was made at Christchurch in 1877 by Edward Reed, a local preacher, who opened several preaching places. The first minister, W. H. East, arrived during the following year. With passing years, churches were built in Palmerston North, Wellington, Christchurch, Dunedin, and several smaller places. The two outstanding ministers of the connection were JOHN ORCHARD (superintendent, 1886-95) and WILLIAM READY, whose work in Dunedin was a spectacular success. Like the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, the Bible Christians were too small to survive for long as a separate denomination, and they united with Free Methodists and Wesleyans in 1896. In the year of the union there were eleven ordained ministers and 609 members in full connexion.

Primitive Methodist Church began its work in New Zealand when ROBERT WARD arrived at New Plymouth from England in 1844. He visited from door to door, began to preach in the open air, and formed a society class of four members. A small congregation of Bible Christians joined with him, and the denomination was off to a good start. The work continued until 1913. Then the church united with the Methodist Church of Australasia in New Zealand to form the Methodist Church of New Zealand. By that time the Primitives were at work in every city and large center in New Zealand, and its laymen were playing a worthy part in the development of the country. Primitive Methodist statistics at the time of Union were: Members, 3,291; ministers and probationers, 43; churches, 81; other preaching places, 91; home missionaries and deaconesses, 5, and local preachers, 208.

Scandinavian Mission was formed in 1872 by the appointment of Pastor Edward Nielsen, a probationer of the M. E. Church of Norway, who came to New Zealand to minister to a large community of his fellow countrymen who had immigrated to New Zealand. This mission covered an area in Southern Hawkes Bay and Manawatu. It was continued with the appointment of other workers (among whom was Otter Christoffersen) until 1893, when the work was merged with the neighboring circuits.

United Methodist Free Churches in New Zealand began effectively in 1868 with the arrival of MATTHEW BAXTER in the South Island city of Christchurch. He gathered some others about him, and churches were soon built at St. Asaph Street and the suburb of Addington. Six years later his health failed, and the virtual leadership of the young connection passed to Samuel Macfarlane, who became connectional secretary. In the years that followed, churches were founded in various places, notably in Auckland, Wellington, Napier, Westport, and Rangiora. From the beginning Free Methodism was hampered by lack of finance and manpower, but the real difficulty in the path of progress was that it could not compete with the larger Wesleyan Methodist body, from which it differed only by inclining to a congregational form of polity. Union between Wesleyans, Bible Christians, and Free Methodists was effected in 1896. At that time the United Methodist Free Churches reported 23 churches; six other preaching places; fourteen ministers; 34 local preachers; 941 church members; 208 Sunday school teachers; 1,880 Sunday school scholars; and 2,143 attendants at worship.

Wesleyan Methodist Church. Organized Methodism in Australasia began in 1815 with the appointment of Samuel Leigh to New South Wales by the British Conference. Seven years later Leigh pioneered the Wesleyan Mission in New Zealand. At first work was chiefly among the Maori people, but from 1840 on, churches mainly for Europeans sprang up in the larger centers. When the direct link with the British Conference was severed in 1854, New Zealand continued to be administered as a district of the Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Conference. From 1874 onward, New Zealand had its own annual conference, but continued to send representatives to the triennial General Conference in Australia.

Union with two small Methodist bodies—the Bible Christians and the United Methodist Free Churches—was consummated in 1896. Primitive Methodism stood aloof pending separation from Australia, and the name of the church was changed to the Methodist Church of Australasia. The direct link with Australia was severed in 1913, except for partnership in overseas mission enterprise, which continued until 1922, when the Solomon Islands field became a distinct New Zealand responsibility. Separation from Australia removed Primitive Methodist objections, and union with that body was consummated in 1913. Thus was the Methodist Church of New Zealand born.

At the time of the 1913 Union, the statistics of the Methodist Church of Australasia in New Zealand were: 19,753 members, including 2,052 Maori members; ministers and probationers, 146; Maori ministers and probationers, 10; churches, 372; schoolrooms and other preaching places, 239; home missionaries and deaconesses, 57.

Church Union. New Zealand Methodism has always been well to the fore in church union discussions. In 1900, union sentiment was so strong that for ten years the Presbyterian, Methodist, and Congregational churches combined their denominational newspapers. However, no enduring and positive action resulted at that time.

Conversations continued sporadically "between the Wars," and then in 1942 and 1948 two successive votes were taken on a basis of union. These resulted in a majority declaring for church union. However, it was agreed by the negotiating churches that on neither occasion was the majority large enough to warrant proceeding with organic union at that stage.

In 1953 the joint committee of the three churches took the initiative in inviting interested churches to join in fresh conversations. The Associated Churches of Christ responded favorably, and later, in 1964, the Anglican Church joined the negotiations.

In 1966 a joint Declaration of Faith was given general approval by all five churches, and progress was made toward a basis of union. Meanwhile the five negotiating churches were conducting many local experiments in co-operative working—reciprocal membership, union parishes, and joint use of buildings.

NEWARK, Hokianga, NEW ZEALAND, was the site of a mission station at Pakanae, near the Hokianga Heads. The station was founded in 1836, by JOHN WHITELEY, who named it Newark after the town in England from which he came as a candidate for the ministry. It was never a large station because it was only a few miles from the head station at Mangungu. The site is still marked by several lofty Norfolk pines planted by Whiteley.

NEWARK CONFERENCE. (See NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE.)

NEWCOMER, CHRISTIAN (1749-1830), pioneer bishop of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, was born in a Mennonite home, nine miles from Lancaster, Pa. In the spring of 1775, Newcomer married and moved to Beaver Creek, near Hagerstown, Md. He came under the influence of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN and GEORGE ADAM GEETING. He then joined one of the little groups of Otterbein people, who were referred to as "Dutch Methodists."

In 1777, Newcomer began to preach. He was a member of the first conference of the United Brethren, which met in Otterbein's parsonage, BALTIMORE, Md., 1789. He was elected bishop in 1813 and served until his death.

He was the foremost organizer of the United Brethren, bringing life and organization to the young church. Not satisfied merely to convert people, Newcomer insisted upon organizing classes and keeping records.

A half-century was spent as a circuit rider, Newcomer travelling as far west as INDIANA and KENTUCKY, and north into CANADA. He crossed the Allegheny Mountains thirty-eight times on horseback, the last trip at the age of eighty-one. A faithful record of his last thirty-five years was kept and this Journal was published following his death. He died at his home, March 12, 1830 as the result of a fall, and was buried in Beaver Creek Cemetery, near Hagerstown.

Christian Newcomer constantly urged union of the United Brethren with the Evangelicals and the Methodists. His references to the Methodists appear more than 125 times in his Journal. The United Methodist Church of the present can look back upon Christian Newcomer as one of its true fathers.

NEWMAN, JOHN PHILIP (1826-1899), American pastor, church organizer, chaplain, bishop, was born in New York, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1826. John Philip's father died when he was only eight years of age leaving his wife, Mary D'Orfey Allen, a vivacious and richly intelligent woman of Huguenot ancestry, with seven children.

At sixteen John Philip was converted and, after a few terms in Cazenovia, N. Y., Seminary, began to preach with rustic eloquence in country churches. He did not take a college course, and entered the Oneida Conference in 1849.

At Fort Plain, N. Y., a blunt schoolmaster told him that his grammar and pronunciation were abominable. Immediately he began zealously to remedy these and other faults. He married Angeline Ensign, an inspiring companion, in 1855. After filling a number of appointments, he was transferred in 1855 to the TROY CONFERENCE. Beginning to write out and memorize his sermons, his rich musical voice and imagination attracted the attention and admiration of the Governor of New York when Newman was stationed in Albany. In a short time he was transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE where he crowded the largest churches in New York City—Bedford Street Church in 1859, and Washington Square, 1862-64.

In 1860 he made an extensive tour of Europe and of the East which resulted in a book, From Dan to Beersheba, 1864. He published six other books and some smaller booklets. From 1864 to 1869 he was responsible for establishing the M. E. Church in the South. He was stationed in NEW ORLEANS, La., and succeeded in building a fine church in that city, opening a seminary and an orphanage, and starting a paper.

In 1869 Newman was appointed to the new Metropolitan Church, WASHINGTON, D.C. President GRANT, Vice-President COLFAX, Chief Justice CHASE, Major-General LOGAN, and other notables, were members, as was later President MCKINLEY. Newman was chaplain of the U.S. Senate three terms. President Grant made him Inspector of U. S. Consulates in Asia, 1874-76, and by Grant's appointment, he made a trip around the world. His report was valuable and he published Thrones and Palaces of Babylon and Nineveh. Newman served Metropolitan Church a second time, 1876-79. His next pastorate, 1879-82, was Central Church, New York City, of which Grant became a trustee. He was a member of the first and second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES. For the third time he was appointed to the Metropolitan Church.

A delegate to several GENERAL CONFERENCES, Newman was elected bishop in 1888. His episcopal residences were OMAHA (Nebraska), 1888-96, and SAN FRANCISCO (California), 1896-99. Bishop Newman made visits to JAPAN, South America and MEXICO.

Bishop Newman was not a distinguished administrator but his fine spirit and broad sympathy redeemed some of his weaknesses. His rehearsed gestures and literary illustrations pleased the prevailing taste of his day. The friend of Grant, Bishop Newman watched by his hero's bedside and pronounced the official eulogy.

Childless himself, he and Mrs. Newman educated scores of young men. He died at Saratoga, N. Y., his summer residence, July 5, 1899, and was buried in Mechanicville, N. Y. His estate was divided between DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, New Jersey, and a school in Jerusalem.

NEWMAN, JUNIUS E. (1819-1895), American preacher and founder of permanent Methodist work in BRAZIL, was born near Point Pleasant, W. Va., on Oct. 16, 1819. He was licensed to preach in 1843, and in January 1848 was received in full connection into the ALABAMA CONFERENCE. Until 1867, Newman worked mainly in eastern MISSISSIPPI. Having lost most of his moderate fortune in the War Between the States, he decided to follow many of his Southern friends who were leaving the Reconstruction South for Brazil. He was therefore regularly accredited and appointed by Bishop W. M. WIGHTMAN for missionary work in Central America or Brazil.

Paying his own way, he arrived in RIO DE JANEIRO on Aug. 5, 1867, lived there for a period and then moved into the then province of SÃO PAULO, where many of his countrymen had settled, and bought a farm which served as a means of livelihood. He preached regularly to these transplanted North Americans; and on Aug. 17, 1871, organized a church with nine members, all Americans, in the community around Santa Barbara do Oeste, São Paulo. Until 1879, he served as superintendent of this mission. Finally, broken in health, he returned to the United States in the fall of 1889.

Newman's was the only voice raised for Methodism during the twenty-five-year silence that followed the Spaulding-Kidder Mission (1836-1845). He not only organized a work that became permanent; but his letters to the NASHVILLE and NEW ORLEANS Christian Advocates, addressed to the bishops and others of the M.E. Church, South, presented the urgent need of Brazilians, and resulted in the definite and official founding of the Brazil Mission, by act of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1874. In 1876, JOHN JAMES RANSOM was sent to initiate this work.

Junius Newman's two daughters, Mary Phillips and Annie Ayres, founded the Newman School in PIACABANA, province of São Paulo, in 1879. Because of Mary's illness and Annie's marriage to J. J. Ransom, the school was closed. But it became the precursor of the Colegio Piacabano, later called Instituto Educacional (see PIACABANO), opened in September 1881, by Martha H. Watts—the oldest Methodist educational institution in Brazil.

J. E. Newman died in Point Pleasant, W. Va., in May 1895.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND, U.S.A. Before the Revolutionary War of 1775, Newport was one of the largest cities on the Atlantic coast, having grown rich with trade in molasses, rum, and slaves. It was the capitol of the State until 1900, and has long been a favorite watering place of the wealthy as well as a strategic naval station. JESSE LEE preached there, soon after the Revolution, in 1790. It was included in the Greenwich circuit, and Joshua Hall was appointed in 1800, and the society organized as the First Methodist Church. The church building, of colonial architecture, erected in 1806 was still being used in 1966, and is said to be the first Methodist church in the world with a steeple and a bell.

Bishop ASBURY preached in this building, and frowned upon the church having a steeple. His journal records, "we crossed Narragansett Bay on Friday, May 28, 1809, and came into Newport—grand house, steeple, pews; by lottery; the end is to sanctify the means. Ah, what pliability to evil." Actually, the lottery never worked out, and the money was returned to the people. Bishop COKE was in Newport in 1804. The present church is the mother of the Thames St. Church (1856-1923) which reunited with First Church in 1923 to form St. Paul's. The church building was partially burned in 1881, and renovated in 1882. In 1910 the building was enlarged, and in 1960 an educational unit was added.

Methodism in adjacent Middletown on Newport's Aquidneck Island at Portsmouth began in 1790 with Jesse Lee, and is the oldest church on the island, the society being organized in 1793 with Bishop Asbury preaching.

NEWPORT NEWS, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., on the VIRGINIA Peninsula, has a good harbor and is a foreign and coastwise shipping point. The Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company plant covers 150 acres and is one of the largest in the world. The city was laid out in 1882 and incorporated in 1896. The population in 1970 was 137,348. The Civil War engagement between the Monitor and the Merrimack, March 9, 1862, off Newport News, was the first ironclad naval engagement in history.

Trinity Methodist Church was organized Dec. 8, 1886, with ten members under the first pastor, J. T. Bosman, who served 1886-88. The first services were held in the Union Chapel, and the first building was erected on Washington Avenue in 1887. The name was changed from Washington Avenue to Trinity in 1900 when a new building was constructed. During the pastorate of W. W. McIntyre, 1945-49, the membership was 1,429. In 1970 the membership was 901 and the property valued at $680,000.

First Church is the largest Methodist church on the Virginia Peninsula. It was designed originally to serve Hilton Village, an early experiment in suburban living during World War I. The Village was built far away from the city of Newport News, contact was made by street-car. Since that time the city has surrounded the village, and First Church has become a central church for the city.

Started in 1920, its first buildings were of stucco design, but with the rapid growth during World War II, these buildings were demolished and replaced with buildings of modern colonial design. It now has a membership of 2,129, and a church school membership of 1,344.

The last church organized in the city was Asbury, which was established in 1961 in an area adjacent to Fort Eustis. There are plans for immediate establishment of two more Methodist churches.

In 1905 St. James Church was established by Negro Methodists. In 1970 St. James reported seventy-six members. There are two other Negro churches here: Walter's Temple A.M.E. Zion and St. Paul's A.M.E.

The twelve United Methodist churches in the city had 7,774 members in 1970, and property valued at $4,059,220.

NEWTON, MINNIE E. (1878-1944), was an eminently successful educational missionary in Gujarat State, INDIA. She was born in East Aurora, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1878, graduated from the New York State College for Teachers and later from Columbia University, earning the B.S. and M.A. degrees.

She went to India as a M.E. missionary in 1912. Her first appointment was to a small girls' school in Godhra, Panch Mahals District, which had been opened in 1900 to care for orphans saved from the terrible famine of that year. Out of that unpromising beginning she developed a highly successful junior-high school and a training school for women teachers of primary classes.

Her services were appreciated by her own and other churches and missions, and by the educational department of the Government of Bombay State, with which Gujarat was then associated. She was appointed chairman of the government school board for Panch Mahals District. It has been said that she trained more women teachers for service in India than anyone else had ever done.

Miss Newton died at Godhra, where she had served during most of her thirty-two years in India. She is buried in Godhra.

ROBERT NEWTON

NEWTON, ROBERT (1780-1854), British Methodist, was born at Roxby, North Yorkshire, April 8, 1780, the son of a farmer. Converted in 1798, he began to itinerate almost immediately, and was received into full connexion in the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1803. He was a famous preacher and advocate of overseas missions. He was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1824, 1832, 1840, and 1848; between 1821 and 1847 he was secretary of the Conference on nineteen occasions. In 1840 he was fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Episcopal Church in BALTIMORE.

Newton was prominent in all the internal Methodist controversies of his lifetime; as chairman of the Manchester District in 1833-35, he had to cope with both J. R. STEPHENS and SAMUEL WARREN. After JABEZ BUNTING he was the most distinguished of the conservative Wesleyans, and as such he was one of the chief targets of the FLY SHEETS. He superannuated in 1852 and died at Easingwold on April 30, 1854.

NGAROPI, HAMIORA (1809-1887), was a pioneer Methodist Maori minister of New Zealand. Little is known of this man except that he became a Christian in 1835 and entered the ministry in 1856. His work is commemorated, along with others, on a granite monument on the site of the Mangungu Mission Station. The inscription concerning him reads: "Hamiora Ngaropi, who laboured among the Waikato tribes, he being the first Maori to be ordained to the ministry."

NIAGARA FALLS, NEW YORK, U.S.A., a large city and a tourist resort on the Niagara River, is surrounded by the Niagara fruit belt. The present city includes three former villages—Niagara Falls, Niagara City and La Salle, which was annexed in 1927.

The Scenic Gateway to America, Niagara Falls has the Niagara Falls Museum, and the Peace Memorial, honoring John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, Pope John and John Kennedy.

Methodist missionaries preached throughout the Niagara Frontier in 1788. George Neal seems to have been the first of these circuit riders, followed by WILLIAM LOSEE in 1791; Capt. WEBB, NATHAN BANGS, Joseph Sawyer, James Coleman, 1794; Andrew Prindle, 1810; Joseph Gatchell and Elder Loring Grant, 1811. Each of these men traveled about 300 miles in a circuit, touching each spot only about once a month.

They left CLASS LEADERS in their wake and held meetings in the private homes. The earliest of these class leaders at Niagara was known as Brother Post. Regular circuits followed in the beginning of the nineteenth century. Some seventy-seven circuit riders traveled the local circuit which at one time included a part of CANADA.

In 1815 Methodism was organized in the village of Niagara Falls. (This was the beginning of present St. Paul's Methodist Church.) The first house of worship was purchased in 1824 by civic-minded citizens and it served all denominations as Union Chapel until 1839 and later as Methodist Chapel. In 1839 the first Methodist Sunday school was organized with seventy-eight pupils, and the society was incorporated as First Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Niagara Falls Village.

The Methodists purchased the frame Presbyterian building in 1849. It was used until 1865 when a new building was planned and completed in 1872, dedicated by Bishop PECK Oct. 2, 1872.

In July 1865 the corporate name of this old church in Niagara Falls was changed to St. Paul's M. E. Church. The old St. Paul's building was in continuous use until July 1919, when it was sold. During the two and a half years of construction, the Y.W.C.A. edifice was used.

St. Paul's new church cost $276,764. The church was dedicated Aug. 12, 1923. The mortgage was not burned until Nov. 7, 1948. At this celebration, Bishop F. J. McCONNELL delivered the morning sermon and WILLIAM L. STRIDER, the evening sermon.

From 1943 to 1965, St. Paul's had sixty-four Lenten speakers, all outstanding clergymen of different denominations. The first was MERTON S. RICE. This was his last service. The following Sunday he died of a heart attack. The speakers included Charles R. BROWN, HENRY HITT CRANE, BISHOP G. BROMLEY OXNAM, and Martin Niemöller.

First Church was organized in September 1855, in the La Salle section of the city. This became a part of Niagara Falls in 1927. A church was dedicated in February 1856, on the River Road (Buffalo Avenue). Several renovations were made in the original building prior to its being razed in 1916 to make room for a Community Hall. The present church building and parsonage were dedicated on July 1, 1924.

Although the church had been called First Methodist for many years, the legal change to First Church from La Salle was not made until 1939. A new educational facility was dedicated in March 1953.

St. James Church first met Dec. 25, 1892, in a small wooden structure and was organized March 13, 1893. In 1913 a much larger new brick church was erected and dedicated in June. The church moved to a new location in an educational building in the late 1950's which was dedicated in 1963.

Wesley Church was started as a Sunday school in 1929 and assigned a supply pastor in 1941 as a mission post of First Church of La Salle. Officially organized in March 1948, and with help from other local churches and the conference, a modern church was dedicated Oct. 15, 1961.

The membership of the four Methodist churches in the city in 1970 totaled 2,516 and property was appraised at $2,316,153.

NICENE CREED. (See CONFESSION OF FAITH.)

NICHOLAS, WILLIAM (1838-1912), Irish minister, was born at Wexford, and graduated at TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN. He travelled some of the most important circuits in Irish Methodism, including three terms in Portland, and was twice Vice-President of the Conference (1894 and 1903), the highest office in the Church. In 1893 he delivered the FERNLEY LECTURE of the British Conference, on the subject "Christianity and Socialism," and in 1895 became President (Principal) of the METHODIST COLLEGE, BELFAST. He was Secretary of the Education Fund for many years, and had a special interest in candidates for the ministry and in junior ministers. His personal friendship for these young men meant much to them in later life.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

NICHOLLS, MARGARET WAIATA (1894-), NEW ZEALAND deaconess, was born at Normanby, Taranaki, and brought up in Te Kuiti. Many gracious influences of home and church which surrounded her in childhood and youth led her to enter the Methodist Deaconess Order in 1920. Her whole life was then spent in the service of the Maori people, in the Waikato, King Country, and Auckland circuits.

She made a special study of Maori religions, language, and customs, and was active in promoting social, educational, and religious welfare among the Maori people. Her outstanding service was recognized when she was made a Member of the Order of the British Empire in 1962.

It was largely through her influence that the famous Maori leader, the late Maharaia Winiata, entered the service of the Methodist Church.

Though interested in a wide variety of activities, Sister Nicholls claims that the preaching of the Gospel of Christ remains the most important factor in her life. She retired in 1967, after forty-six years' service.

NICHOLS, DECATUR WARD (1900-), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in CHARLESTON, S. C., on Oct. 15, 1900. He earned the A.B. degree from Howard University in 1923 and the B.D. degree from DREW THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL in 1926. He was admitted to the New Jersey Annual Conference in 1925, ordained deacon in 1926 and elder in 1927. He held pastorates in RHODE ISLAND and NEW YORK having served also in the metropolitan New York Area. Several A.M.E. colleges granted him the D.D. degree and WILBERFORCE granted him the LL.D. He was elected bishop in 1940. Bishop Nichols was instrumental in the organization of the Pension Department of the denomination.

NICHOLS, FLORENCE (1865-1958), American missionary who was twice principal of the ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE at LUCKNOW, INDIA. She was appointed to Lucknow in 1894 to assist Miss THOBURN in her effort to establish the pioneer Christian Woman's College in Asia. She was highly qualified, holding B.A. and M.A. degrees from BOSTON UNIVERSITY and having been trained for Christian service in the Deaconess Training School in BOSTON.

Persistent health problems interrupted her service. The doctors urged her to return to America in 1898. She went reluctantly, but less than a year later returned and was able to resume a heavy schedule of teaching and administration. In the emergency created by the tragic death of Miss Thoburn from cholera, Sept. 1, 1901, Miss Nichols became principal, and met the exacting need with great courage and ability. In 1908, health problems again made her departure from India necessary.

In another emergency in 1921, when the college had grown so that its separation from the high school and location in a new site was necessary, she accepted the call to leadership; and in the next four years, she put the college firmly in a position to achieve growth in service to the church and the nation. During her second principalship the college became an integral but semi-independent part of the new University of Lucknow, acquired a choice location, had excellent buildings constructed, and extended its service into many new fields of education.

Miss Nichols was born in Lynn, Mass., Oct. 27, 1865. Throughout her life, Boston and its suburbs were the center of her America. On retirement in 1925, she returned to the environs of her youth and continued both her Christian witness and her advocacy of educational opportunity for the youth of India. She died on Feb. 4, 1958.

NICHOLS, MILTON HAROLD (1872-1958), American pastor of the Arch Street Church, PHILADELPHIA, for twenty-one years, was born in Vineland, N. J. He was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE and joined the PHILADELPHIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. He served various pastorates, but his greatest work began in 1933 at Arch Street Church, which he molded into one of the commanding churches of the East. During his first year as pastor he began one of the first, regular religious radio broadcasts in the city; during his second year, he began Noonday Lenten Services, for which the church became noted, as well as the three-hour Good Friday services. Under his leadership the church became the virtual headquarters of the Philadelphia Conference, which began holding the annual sessions of the Conference in its spacious sanctuary. An orator noted for his poetic style in preaching, and for his simple presentation of profound theological truths, M. H. Nichols attracted large congregations. During World War II he brought an especially helpful ministry to the youth in the Armed Forces. He died May 12, 1958.

FREDERICK E. MASER

NICHOLS, RAYMOND HOWARD (1888-), American newspaper editor and lay leader in the M.E. Church, South, and later in The Methodist Church, was born in Lampasas, Texas, on Oct. 6, 1888. His wife was Ethal Rhoads, whom he married on Jan. 29, 1914. He joined the Methodist Church in 1902, serving on the official board of his local church and then becoming district lay leader, 1932-34, a member of the World Service Commission of the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, 1960, and lay leader of that Conference, 1934-60.

He has been a member of every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1938 to 1970, the president of the General BOARD OF LAY ACTIVITIES (TMC), 1944-60, a member of the General BOARD OF PUBLICATION, 1960-68. In national life, Mr. Nichols was director and vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, 1953-62, and a member of the National Labor-Management Manpower Policy Committee, 1952-60. He is a trustee of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas, elected to that position in 1950; also a member and past president of the Texas Press Association.

At the 1952 General Conference in SAN FRANCISCO when the reorganization of the various agencies of the Church was under consideration, Nichols was named as one of a six-member committee to consider and report back recommendations concerning the proposals which had come in dealing with the Church's reorganization. The General Conference accepted practically all the recommendations of his committee. He resides in Vernon, Texas.

was educated in the schools of PHILADELPHIA and received his B.A. degree from Lincoln University; the B.D. from the Pacific School of Religion; and an honorary D.D. degree from the same school in 1964, and also one in 1959 from the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC. His wife was Ruth Richardson, and they have three children, Melisande, Allegra, and Nathan.

He began his pastorate in Berkeley, Calif., serving the Downs Church. A member of the Berkeley Board of Education, he served as its president in 1964. For seven years while minister of Downs Church, he was a radio pastor of "The Christian Answer" broadcast in Berkeley and in Oakland. He was the organizing pastor of South Berkeley Community Church (one of the first interracial churches with biracial co-pastors in the nation), 1943-46. In 1964 he was transferred to NEW YORK CITY to assume the pastorate of Salem Church, a 2,800-member Negro church. This church became deeply involved in direct services to the Central Harlem Community under Dr. Nichols' leadership, constructing an $800,000 community center, which presently includes in its program all manner of helpful counselling and vocational interests.

Dr. Nichols was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in 1960, '64, '66, and '68, and at the 1968 session of the Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, he was elected a bishop of The United Methodist Church, assigned to supervise the PITTSBURGH Area.

He is presently chairman of the Section on Project Development of the BOARD of EVANGELISM of The United Methodist Church; a member of the Board of Managers, METHODIST HOSPITAL of BROOKLYN, New York, 1964-68; vice-chairman, Advisory Board, Harlem Hospital, New York City, 1966-68; and of the executive committee of the New York City Society of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, 1968. He is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL of CHURCHES, on its Executive Committee and Central Committee. He was the lecturer at the Convocation on Medicine and Theology, 1967, and the Frank S. Hickman lecturer on the Ministry at DUKE UNIVERSITY, in 1968. He is the first Negro to be elected a bishop by a Jurisdiction other than the Central in which he served for a time but which now is no longer in existence.

NICHOLS, SIDNEY R. (1921-), American layman, son of Sidney A. and Lucy (Beach) Nichols, was born in Merrill, Wis., Aug. 16, 1921. He was married to Miss Vivian Helen West, June 14, 1942, and they have three children.

Enrolling at the University of Buffalo in 1941, he enlisted in the United States Air Force serving in the European Theatre of War. Upon his return to college he graduated from the University of Buffalo with B.A., cum laude, 1948 and M.A., 1952. Special studies were also taken at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY.

From 1948-52 Mr. Nichols was Associate Mathematician for Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory, Buffalo, and from 1952-63 he was Chief Engineer and Technical Marketing Advisor for Firewel Co., Buffalo, a division of ARO, Inc. In 1963, he was appointed Associate Executive Secretary, Men's Work, General Board of LAY ACTIVITIES for The Methodist Church. With the 1968 union he became Associate General Secretary, Division of Lay Life and Work, General Board of the Laity.

Mr. Nichols is a past president of the East Aurora, New York Association of Churches, a former trustee of the Silver Lake Institute, and has been a member of the WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE Board of Laity as well as dean of the annual conference Lay Retreat.

MRS. THOMAS NICHOLSON

NICHOLSON, EVELYN RILEY (1873-1967), wife of American bishop THOMAS NICHOLSON and a leader in women's work in the United States and in international causes. She was president of the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church for nineteen years, 1921-1940. She became widely known for her interest in the WORLD FEDERATION of METHODIST WOMEN, and in the cause of world peace.

Born Evelyn Riley in a parsonage in Jackson, Minn., on June 30, 1873, she received her A.B. degree from DEPAUL UNIVERSITY in 1897, and the next year a Master's degree from the same school. Later she received three honorary doctorate degrees in 1928 and 1939. After college Mrs. Nicholson taught Latin in FLORIDA and INDIANA high schools, and then became Professor of Latin at CORNELL COLLEGE, Mt. Vernon, Iowa, from 1901-17, when she married Bishop Thomas Nicholson, a widower who had been elected bishop in 1916. During this period of teaching she spent one year in ROME at Crandon Institute, 1903-04.

HELEN KIM of KOREA suggested in 1923 that the Christian women of the world should unite to work for peace and the betterment of all mankind. Mrs. Nicholson joined with Dr. Kim in this idea and in 1939 the World Federation of Methodist Women was founded. Mrs. Nicholson became the first president, 1939-44. Today this organization has over six million members in fifty-five countries.

Mrs. Nicholson became active in other international organizations also and was a member of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, and World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. She attended many international conferences, such as: Conference on Cause and Cure of War, and the International Conference at Oxford (1923), at Budapest (1927), and at Jerusalem (1928). She was a delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1928 and 1936, and of The Methodist Church in 1940. Her book, The Way to a Warless World, was placed in the cornerstone of The Church Peace Center at the United Nations Plaza, New York. Upon retirement Mrs. Nicholson lived in Chicago until her death on Feb. 15, 1967.

THOMAS NICHOLSON

NICHOLSON, THOMAS (1862-1944), American educator and bishop, was born at Woodburn, Ontario, CANADA, on Jan. 27, 1862, the son of James, a farmer, and Hannah (Burkholder) Nicholson. He was educated at Toronto Normal, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1893, A.M., 1895); GARRETT SEMINARY (B.D., 1892; and later honorary D.D. and LL.D.). He married first Jane Boothroyd, on Aug. 20, 1885 (who died on May 10, 1915), and they had two daughters. He married Evelyn Riley on June 9, 1917.

He joined the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE in 1884. After teaching high school in Canada, 1878-83, he served various charges in MICHIGAN until 1889; pastor Big Rapids, 1893-4; principal and professor, Philosophy and Biblical Literature, Academy of CORNELL COLLEGE, Iowa, 1894-03; president and professor of Philosophy, DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1903-08; secretary of the General BOARD OF EDUCATION (M.E. Church), 1908-16 (New York City).

Under Nicholson, the Jubilee Educational Movement raised $35,000,000 for educational purposes. He was elected bishop in 1916, and served the CHICAGO area, 1916-24, and the DETROIT area, 1924-32, when he retired.

Bishop Nicholson supervised the building of Boulevard Temple Church, Detroit, and took a leading part in national and international affairs. In 1912 he was chairman of an association of Board Secretaries out of which was developed the WORLD SERVICE Commission. He was the founder and first president of the Council of Church Boards of Education. In 1920 he was chairman of the reorganization Committee of the Interchurch World Movement and President of the Board of SUNDAY SCHOOLS, BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES and DEACONNESS WORK, 1924-28.

A delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1908-16; the fourth ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE, 1911; and fraternal delegate to Irish and British Wesleyan Conferences, 1923, he attended many international conferences officially. A Bible lecturer in many states, he was president of the Anti-Saloon League of America, 1921-32; staunch supporter of NICHOLSON, ROY S. (1903-), American WESLEYAN METHODIST minister, was born July 12, 1903 in Walhalla, S.C. He was ordained by the North Carolina Conference (W.M.C.) in 1925 and was a pastor in it eleven years. He served the denomination as general secretary of Wesleyan Youth (1924-1935), editor of Sunday school literature (1935-1939), secretary of Home Missions (1939-1943), editor of The Wesleyan Methodist (1943-1947), first supervising president of the denomination (1947-1959), and delegate to the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL/CONFERENCE (1956). He served on the boards of the National Holiness Association and of the National Association of Evangelicals. He is the author of Wesleyan Methodism in the South, History of the Wesleyan Methodist Church (two revised editions), Notes on True Holiness (also translated and published in Korean and Japanese languages), and Studies in Church Doctrine, as well as of numerous articles for religious periodicals. He has been evangelist and special lecturer at CAMP MEETINGS, conferences, seminaries and colleges. He was a member of a number of Church Commissions, such as the Hymnal Commission and the Commissions on Church Merger with the FREE METHODIST and PILGRIM HOLINESS CHURCHES. He was honored by his election as General Conference President Emeritus in 1959, after serving in that office for twelve years. He continues to serve his Church as Chairman of the Department of Religion at CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE.

JESSE A. EARL

NIEBEL, HENRY (1784-1877), American Evangelical minister, was one of the early and influential leaders of the EVANGELISCHE GEMEINSCHAFT. He was born in Berks County, Pa., March 16, 1784 and died near Sycamore, Ohio, May 2, 1877.

The family in his early youth moved from Berks County to Dry Valley, Union County, Pa. By 1806 he had become a public school teacher at Winfield in the Susquehanna valley where the influences of the emerging Evangelische Gemeinschaft were rapidly expanding in the area. He considered the ministry in the Reformed Church, but was dissatisfied with what he felt was a spiritual dearth in that fellowship. Making his home with the Abraham Eyer family, he there met and heard JACOB ALBRIGHT and his associates in their interpretation of the Christian faith, had a new religious experience and became a charter member of the Eyer Class in 1808.

At the second conference of the emerging church in 1809, held in the home of GEORGE MILLER at Albany, Berks County, Niebel was granted credentials as a minister on probation. At that time the church numbered but 426 members served by six itinerant ministers.

Early appointments served by the young Niebel included the following: 1809-10 (with another assistant, M. Betz, under JOHN DREISBACH), the Schuylkill Circuit; 1810-11, the Schuylkill-Lancaster circuit with JOHN WALTER in charge. In 1811 he was ordained deacon and with M. Becker, another assistant, they served the York Circuit with John Dreisbach in charge; 1812-13, he traveled the Schuylkill circuit; in 1813 he was ordained elder and assigned to the Franklin circuit. In 1815 he was elected the second presiding elder of the emerging church. During the years 1815-21, he presided over two Conference sessions of the church, and served seven sessions as secretary. He was elected secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1816.

In 1821 Henry Niebel for health reasons found it necessary to relinquish for a time the active work of the ministry. In 1829, however, he re-entered active work with the Western conference. At a critical time of need in 1833, he was sent to Ohio and elected a presiding elder to replace Joseph Long who had been supervising the work in that state. Niebel served in this capacity until 1843. The trip from PENNSYLVANIA to Ohio was made by covered wagon with his wife and seven children, the youngest at that time being but four months of age. Mrs. Niebel was the former Mary Eyer from Pennsylvania. Niebel was a brother-in-law of John Dreisbach, with whom he shared many responsibilities in the early church.

Niebel made definite contributions in the early literary and liturgical fields of the church. In 1816 he served as assistant publisher of the first printing establishment of the church at New Berlin, Pa. In 1816 he and John Dreisbach were appointed by the church to prepare a suitable hymn book and to amend the Discipline which had been previously compiled by George Miller. It was the first hymn book (German) of the church and served many years as the only such hymnal of the denomination. It was named "Das Geistliche Saitenspiel."

Henry Niebel was superannuated in 1848. He died at the home of his son Enos, near Sycamore, Ohio, May 2, 1877, his wife having preceded him in death. Nine children, all worthy supporters of the church, survived their father. He was buried at Bibler Cemetery, a few miles south of McCutchenville, Ohio.

NIGERIA is a country of West Central Africa located at the eastern end of the Gulf of Guinea. It is a member of the United Nations and the British Commonwealth of Nations. The coastline is approximately 400 miles, from Badagry (west) to Calabar (east) where the African coast makes a 90° turn from east-west to north-south. The area is 356,669 square miles, and the population is 61,450,000 (UN 1967 estimate), making Nigeria the most populous nation of Africa. The capital is Lagos, on an island of the same name, separated from the mainland by a superb harbor.

Portuguese navigators were the first Europeans to report contact with this sector of the African coast, sailing as far as the Niger Delta in the late 1400's. French, British and others also came and went. By the close of the eighteenth century, the British had displaced others as traders and pioneers from Lagos to beyond the Delta. Mungo Park, noted explorer and geographer, died on the upper Niger River in 1805.

Lagos and the adjacent mainland, annexed by Britain in 1861, was first administered from SIERRA LEONE. In 1874 control passed to the Gold Coast colony, and a Protectorate was established in 1896. Meanwhile, in 1886, the Royal Niger Company had been chartered to govern the older Oil Rivers Protectorate at the Niger Delta, as well as other areas. In 1900, that enterprise surrendered its rights and properties to the Crown. The country was then reorganized as The Protectorate of Northern and Southern Nigeria. In 1914, these jurisdictions were amalgamated as the Crown Colony of Nigeria. An elected Council was established in 1923, a long step towards self-government. Independence was granted in 1960, Nigeria then entering the United Nations and the British Commonwealth. The adjacent narrow strip of British territory in Cameroons, under the United Nations, joined independent Nigeria by virtue of a plebiscite in 1961. In 1966, a military government assumed power in the North and West, but was not recognized by the military governor of the East. The Eastern Region declared itself an independent republic, and from 1967 to 1970, there was civil war.

In 1838, several Africans who had been wrenched from this area as slaves were freed and taken to the British depot for free Negroes at Sierra Leone. They made their way to Lagos, recognizing it as the port from which the slave-runners had taken them. Venturing up the Ogun River, they came to Abeokuta, a town of the Yoruba people, where they were reunited with their families. Returning to Sierra Leone, they organized a company of other Yoruba captives, securing permission to leave for Abeokuta. Among these were several Methodists of Sierra Leone, these being the first Methodists of whom we have knowledge to settle in the Lagos-Niger territory. They reported arrival and begged for mission assistance.

FIRST MISSION STATION AT BADAGRY

In September 1842, THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN, pioneer Wesleyan Methodist missionary, left his port in the Gold Coast, landing at Badagry near Lagos. He proceeded to Abeokuta, receiving hearty welcome from the chief, Shodeke, the entire city, and the Methodists he had known. Freeman established stations at Abeokuta and Badagry.

At first the work was administered from the Gold Coast. Under the leadership of John Milum such gain was made as to warrant setting Lagos apart as a separate District in 1878, the membership approximating 1,000. In 1913, the Centenary year of West Africa Methodism, the Wesleyan Methodist community included eleven missionaries, twenty-two African ministers, eighty-six catechists, and over 6,000 members on the District. By 1919, the membership had risen to 9,000. Meanwhile, PRIMITIVE METHODISM had entered Eastern Nigeria, and developed centers at Umuahia, Oron and Chewhee.

Steady growth marked Nigerian Methodism, with constant emphasis on Biblical instruction and personal religious experience. The school program is integrated into the government's system of education. Medical work is of a high standard, the church superintending the outstanding government supported leper settlement in the Uzuakoli area.

In July 1962, the Conference of the Methodist Church, Nigeria, was inaugurated, under the leadership of its Nigerian president, Joseph Soremekun. The Conference consisted in 1968 of seven districts, on both sides of the division caused by civil war. It had 1,540 places of worship, 54,332 full members and a total constituency of 146,640. The Conference had under its care fifteen medical institutions, including hospitals at Ilesha and Ituk Mbang, 522 primary schools with 121,482 pupils; eighteen secondary schools with 3,412 students. Ministers are trained in joint theological colleges: Immanuel College, Ibadan and Trinity College, Umuahia. Church union negotiations between the Anglican, Presbyterian and Methodist churches broke down in 1965. Civil war, beginning in 1967, caused serious disruption to the life of the nation. The Nigerian Methodist Conference met without Biafran representatives, while in Biafra, a Methodist Assembly was constituted to carry on essential business.

American Methodism is represented in Nigeria by the small mission of the A.M.E. CHURCH.

E.U.B. Church. In 1904 the principal free churches of Nigeria united to form the Sudan United Mission. The first Evangelical member to work in this mission was Miss Rose Boehning, a deaconess from ILLINOIS. Miss Boehning sailed for Africa in 1905 to work in industrial missions. In 1906, Rev. C. W. Guinter, a member of the Central Pennsylvania Conference (United Evangelical) went to Africa to work among the Jukin and Chamba tribes. It was not until 1922 that the merged Evangelical churches assumed a mission support work in Africa. At that time Rev. and Mrs. I. E. McBride of the Platte River Conference (NEBRASKA) joined the Guinters in Nigeria.

With Guinter as teacher, a primary school was opened in Bambur in 1925. Other schools were started in surrounding areas. Since there were no reading books, the mission sponsored the publication of a Hausa Grammar.

At about the same time, temporary chapels were being constructed in the area. The first church building was dedicated in 1925 in Bambur.

It was not until 1932 that medical work was begun in a mud-wall dispensary. In this humble building African young people were trained to carry on dispensary work among their people. Other dispensaries were soon to be erected in strategic places. Because there were no doctors on the field every missionary was required to have six months' training in tropical diseases.

In 1965 there were 131 preaching places with nineteen organized congregations, 128 evangelists, and ten ordained ministers. There were eleven primary schools and one secondary school, one hospital with 110 beds (dedicated in 1951) and nineteen dispensaries.

The major emphasis in Nigeria has always been at the point of developing national leadership through training schools for evangelists, dispensary training, and teacher training.

NILES, DANIEL THAMBYRAJAH (1908-1970), Asian minister, author and ecumenist, was born near Jaffna, North CEYLON. He was educated at the United Theological College, Bangalore, India, and the University of London.

Before coming to the position as President of the Methodist Church in Ceylon, Niles held various Methodist and ecumenical positions. He was chairman of the North District of his Church, served for many years as the general secretary of the EAST ASIAN CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE, and at his death was President of the Conference.

He also served as principal of Jaffna Central College; pastor of St. Peter's Church in Jaffna; chairman, World's

D. T. NILES

Student Christian Federation; and secretary, Department of Studies in Evangelism of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Niles delivered many lectureships, among which are the Lyman Beecher Lectures on Preaching at Yale University Divinity School; and lectureships at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, as well as in colleges and universities in SCOTLAND and AUSTRALIA.

He was the preacher at the opening service of the World Council of Churches at its organizing session in Amsterdam in 1948, as well as the preacher for the opening session of the 1968 Assembly in UPPSALA, SWEDEN. He also was a speaker at the 1954 and 1961 Assemblies. In 1968 he was elected one of the six Presidents of the World Council of Churches.

D. T. Niles made one of the principal addresses at the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in London in 1966 and led in a movement for the restructuring of the World Methodist Council of which he became a Vice-President. He was a prolific author and among his most recent volumes are Buddhism and the Claims of Christ and Who Is This Jesus?

He died very suddenly in Velore, India, on July 17, 1970, while at the height of his power and influence. "Though he became known as a symbol of Christian unity," the New York Times said of him, "both within his native Ceylon and on the international level, Dr. Niles always remained essentially a preacher with strong evangelical convictions."

NIND, GEORGE BENJAMIN (1860-1932), American lay preacher and missionary to BRAZIL and to Portuguese-speaking people, was born in St. Charles, Mo., on Nov. 23, 1860, of devout Christian parents. He received his education at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and went to Brazil through the influence of WILLIAM TAYLOR, later bishop, who had opened work there in 1880, with the plan of enlisting self-supporting missionaries. Nind arrived in Recife, capital of the then province of Pernambuco, in 1880.

Nind made a living by teaching music but held preaching services in his house and on city streets, even organizing a congregation. Licensed only as an exhorter, he repeatedly appealed for an ordained minister to come and take charge of the work, but Bishop JOHN H. VINCENT in the States refused to send any on the grounds that they were needed at home.

Nind remained in Recife twelve years until in September 1892, the illness of his wife forced a return to the United States. Here he was asked to take the place of a missionary who had been working with the Portuguese in New Bedford, Mass. About a year later, Nind was asked to go to the Cape Verde Islands. From there he went in 1900 to the island of Madeira, where he served about nineteen years as pastor and as editor and publisher of a religious paper, A Voz de Madeira (The Voice of Madeira). Authorized by Bishop J. C. HARTZELL, he compiled a book of hymns in Portuguese, some of his own authorship, some translated by himself or by JUSTUS H. NELSON, his brother-in-law. These were published together with a Manual of Doctrine and Worship for Portuguese Methodists.

After his first wife died he was married to Mary Elizabeth Foley.

When he finally returned to the United States, Nind edited for eight years a paper called Aurora (Dawn), designed to spread the Gospel among the Portuguese in the United States. He also taught Portuguese in BOSTON UNIVERSITY and in the Kennedy School of Missions in Hartford, Conn.

Nind died after a brief illness on June 1, 1932. He was survived by his wife and a daughter, Gretchen, a trained nurse.

NINDE, WILLIAM XAVIER (1832-1901), American bishop, was born at Cortlandville (Cortland), N. Y., on June 1, 1832. He was the oldest son of the Rev. William Ward Ninde, who was the oldest son of the Rev. William Ninde. This apostolic succession in the Ninde family goes back to a lay preacher mentioned with esteem in JOHN WESLEY'S Journal, James Nind. This man came to America to serve with Bishop ASBURY.

William Xavier Ninde was only twelve years old when his preacher father died. The son united with the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1856. In time he ministered to the church at Adams, N. Y., where his father had served before him. He was appointed to Rome, N. Y., and twice to Central Church, DETROIT, Mich., before he accepted the presidency of GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He was known for his regular habits of study and for his dependence on prayer. In preaching he always used the right word in the right place, and careless phraseology "caused him positive pain." He brought great comfort to the sick.

He was elected bishop in 1884 and assigned residence at TOPEKA, Kan. He lavished on the whole church the same patient love for which he had become noted in his relation to his own children and to the people in the local churches. He became known as "The Saint John of the Episcopacy."

Among Bishop Ninde's writings we note his "Report on the great cities of South America," and his authorship of introductions to various books such as O. J. Perrin's Manual of Christian Ethics. He was a member of the first and second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1881 and 1891.

He travelled extensively throughout the church. He spent almost five months in INDIA and visited JAPAN and KOREA; and his daughter's work in CHINA won his heart to that land. Many costumes, curios and gifts which he received from overseas were presented to the Chicago Art Museum. His noted daughter, Mary Ninde Gamewell, represented the Church in Christian mission work in China, and wrote interdenominational mission study books. She is author of the biography of her father, entitled, William Xavier Ninde . . . a Memorial. The bishop also rejoiced in the ordination and work of his preacher son, Edward S. Ninde.

Bishop Ninde died in his sleep, Jan. 3, 1901. Memorial addresses were given and published by Bishops ANDREWS, JOYCE and WALDEN. Burial was in Woodland Cemetery, Detroit, Mich.

NIPPERT, LOUIS (1825-1894), missionary and Methodist educator in GERMANY, was born on March 23, 1825, in FRANCE (Alsace). In 1830 the family emigrated to America and settled in Belmont County, OHIO. They were converted under the preaching of two German-speaking ministers and joined the German Methodist church there. In early 1840 Nippert became a printer's apprentice in the Methodist BOOK CONCERN at CINCINNATI. After some years of service as a lay preacher, he became a minister and joined the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1846. His first independent task was to found a mission among German immigrants in INDIANAPOLIS. After various other appointments, he was sent to Germany in 1850. One year later he started work at Heilbronn in the south and moved to Frankfurt the succeeding year to supervise the total work in the south and the southwest. After a brief appointment to Bremen, including a provisional half year as dean of the new seminary, he went to Berlin, where he founded the first Methodist church in that city (1858). After beginning Methodist work at Basel, Switzerland, he moved to Zurich in 1862 as a presiding elder, from where he returned to Heilbronn (1866-68). His essential contribution proved to be in his service as dean of the Frankfurt Theological Seminary (PREDIGERSEMINAR) from 1868 to 1886. The seminary had just moved from Bremen to Frankfurt. Nippert was a great educator and the author of many valuable books—among them an outline of doctrine, lives of Francis Asbury and JOHN W. FLETCHER, and the superb Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. After thirty-six years of service in Germany, Nippert returned to America, where he worked in several circuits before his death on Aug. 17, 1894.

NISHIZUMI, DANIEL M. (1901-1946), pioneer Japanese FREE METHODIST missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Osaka, JAPAN, Dec. 22, 1901. Graduated from Free Methodist Seminary, Osaka in 1928, he migrated to Brazil in 1929, supporting himself by teaching in public schools and later by establishing his own Christian school in SÃO PAULO. He pursued advanced studies in the Methodist and Presbyterian seminaries of Brazil.

He married Miss Yoshie Fugita in 1931. He organized the first Free Methodist Church in Brazil, Oct. 1, 1936. He visited the United States in 1938, was ordained elder and was made the superintendent for Brazil.

The first American missionaries arrived in June 1946. Nishizumi met with a fatal accident, June 26, 1946. A strong church has developed in Brazil on the foundations he laid.

NITSCHMANN, DAVID (1696-1772), was one of three MORAVIANS of the same name. He was born at Zauchenthal, Moravia, on Dec. 27, 1696. With Leonard Dober he was a pioneer missionary to St. Thomas. He was placed in charge of the Moravian settlers in SAVANNAH, and accompanied JOHN WESLEY on his journey to GEORGIA in 1736, where he protested against Wesley's determination to admit Mrs. Hawkins to Holy Communion. Wesley consulted him about his proposal to marry SOPHIA HOPEY. Nitschmann became a bishop in 1735, and died at Bethlehem, Pa., on Oct. 8, 1772.

NOBLE, FRED B. (1883-), American lawyer, prominent lay leader and JUDICIAL COUNCIL member, was born at Preston, Md., April 17, 1883. He was the son of Isaac L. and Mary Elizabeth (Corkran) Noble. He was educated at Washington College, A.B. in 1902; LL.D. in 1953; a student at the University of Maryland, 1904-05; Harvard, LL.B. in 1907. He married Eva L. Wyand on May 20, 1910, and they have one daughter, Mary. He was admitted to the MARYLAND Bar in 1907, to the FLORIDA Bar in 1908, and thereafter practiced law in JACKSONVILLE, Fla. He has held various responsible positions in the State. He was a member of the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939, as a representative of the M. E. Church of the then ST. JOHN'S RIVER CONFERENCE. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1936, and of The Methodist Church in '40, '48, '52, '60, '64; a member of the BOARD OF EDUCATION from 1936-48; of the GENERAL BOARD OF LAY ACTIVITIES, 1948-52; and a lay leader of the FLORIDA CONFERENCE, 1940-52, and 1952-56. He became a member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church in 1952 and was automatically retired from the Council in time to serve on the Jurisdictional Conference (SEJ) of 1956. His activities in his local church have continued as he continues to reside in Jacksonville.

he sailed for CEYLON. He remained there until 1922, when he became a secretary of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY; after 1932 he remained a secretary of the Methodist Missionary Society until 1947. He was President of the Methodist CONFERENCE in 1942. He died on Feb. 21, 1962.

JOHN KENT

NOBLE, WILLIAM ARTHUR (1866-1945), pioneer missionary to KOREA, was born in Springdale, Pa., on Sept. 13, 1866. He entered the WYOMING CONFERENCE in 1892 after studying at Wyoming Seminary and graduating from DREW SEMINARY, and then set out for Korea, where he arrived with his bride of three months in October of that year.

For three years he taught in Pai Chai College in SEOUL, and then was assigned to take up the work of the newly opened Pyongyang mission station to succeed William James Hall. After fifteen years he was transferred to Seoul where he remained until final retirement twenty-four years later.

He was an outstanding administrator with an amazing capacity for constant work. He served as mission superintendent for two years and for forty years was a district superintendent, often over more than one district. For three years he served the Pyongyang and Seoul districts (1908-1910) comprising more than half of his mission area and seventy percent of its Korean membership. He had travelled over the entire mission area and at one time or another had been district superintendent of ninety percent of the districts. In his forty-two years he saw his Korean church grow from fifty full members centered in Seoul to an autonomous Methodist Church with a membership of over 20,000.

He did considerable writing for the Korea Repository and the Korea Review and wrote one novel, Euca, A Tale of Korea. He was officially retired in March 1933, but continued in service in Seoul to December 1934. He died at Stockton, Calif., Jan. 6, 1945.

AGUSTIN NODAL

NODAL Y RUEDA, AGUSTIN (1882-), a Cuban pastor, the oldest of a family of eleven brothers and sisters, was born Aug. 28, 1882, in Remedios, Las Villas province, CUBA. At an early age he lost his father, mother and sister from tuberculosis due to his father having been held as a prisoner in Spanish concentration camps. With only a few months of formal education, he learned to fend for himself and became an expert in the sale and manufacture of tobacco products. With his brother he became the owner of a cigar factory in San Juan de los Yeras, where MANUEL DEULOFEU was pastor of the Methodist Church.

Nodal considered himself an atheist and would not allow his workmen to discuss religion in the factory, and put up signs to that effect. Observing the quiet fortitude of Deulofeu as he continued to witness his faith while lying on his death bed, Nodal attended Deulofeu's funeral and memorial service. As a result he was miraculously converted and asked for license to preach, 1913.

The same year he joined the Annual Conference and was assigned to Aguado de Pasajeros. At first his wife thought he had lost his mind when he professed conversion, but was soon reconciled. They were married in 1908 and had eight children.

In an active ministry of forty-seven years, he served twenty different pastoral charges and never missed a roll call at Annual Conference, although at one session he went with a high fever. For many years the government gave him a special permit for preaching in any jail and on the streets of any city in the island. As a result of his preaching several outstanding Christian leaders were converted.

Serving some of the most difficult places, he often had to be away from his family for weeks at a time, yet he never complained. Twice he served as District Superintendent of the Oriental District. Because of his evangelistic fervor he was often called on to hold revival services in opening work in new areas.

A Mason, he was instructor in the Grand Lodge of Cuba and was sought after for masonic lectures. One of his outstanding lectures was "Masonry and the Bible."

He was unsurpassed as a story teller and many of his stories appear in his book, Para los Pequeños y Para los Mayores. Although he had retired officially he continued to work in three different places before the communist regime forced him to leave Cuba. Retiring to MIAMI he was active among the Cuban refugees until he was past eighty years of age.

NOLLEY, RICHMOND (1785-1815), pioneer American preacher, was born in Brunswick County, Va. Left an orphan soon after birth, he was reared in Sparta, Ga., by a Methodist merchant named Captain Lucas. After a dramatic and enduring conversion experience in 1806, he decided to become a Methodist minister, and in 1807 was received into the traveling connection. He was sent to the Edisto Circuit in the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. For five years he served in NORTH CAROLINA and SOUTH CAROLINA. He was long remembered there for his patience, and especially for his diligence. He was a wonderful pastor, ministering to the sick and the aged, and his work in training the children under his care put him far ahead of his time. He also ministered to the slaves and taught their children.

In 1812 Nolley and three other young missionaries were sent to the MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA territories, which had scarcely been opened to Methodism. Amid Indian insurrections, Nolley moved from fort to fort, preaching and teaching the people on the Tombigbee Mission.

He was appointed in 1814 to Attakapas and Opelousas in Louisiana, where he established Methodism in a field as difficult as any in the wilderness country. This was not only because of the problems of nature, but by reason of a hostile Roman Catholic community of French and Spanish descent. Returning from his annual conference in late November of 1815, with the entire southern portion of what is now the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE as his charge, he attempted to cross flooded Hemphill Creek near the town of Jena, La. He was washed from his horse but managed to reach the other shore by clinging to overhanging branches. He started up a country trail to the home of Methodists nearby, but died on the way. The next day a friendly Indian found his body along the trail, his knee prints in the soft wet mud, and his hymn book opened to a familiar hymn. Methodist friends buried him nearby.

In 1856 the Louisiana Conference erected over his grave a small monument, which later was carried to the Jena church, and the location of the untended grave site was then almost forgotten. In 1956 it was decided to rebury his remains on the lawn of the church in Jena named for him, the Nolley Memorial Church. Traveling the lonely trail Nolley had traversed from the creek to the place his body had been found, people from throughout the state participated in a commemorative service, led by Bishop PAUL E. MARTIN and District Superintendent Jolly B. Harper. A suitable marker slab on the lawn of the church now tells the story.

NORFOLK, NEBRASKA, U.S.A. First Church is the principal downtown Protestant church in a town of 16,500 population. Its chimes ring out over the downtown business district at regular intervals from a Gothic spire which rises nearly a hundred feet above the level of the street. The present edifice was planned during the pastorate of Harry E. Hess in 1943. The educational building was erected in 1953 during the pastorate of Everett E. Jackman, and the sanctuary during the pastorate of Melvon L. Ireland in 1959.

Methodism came to Norfolk with the circuit riders in the years following the Civil War. A surge of immigration then brought many homeseekers to the rolling hills and valleys of northeastern NEBRASKA. Courageous and hardy settlers survived drought, insect plagues and floods to establish a permanent community. In 1871 the first circuit rider, S. B. York, preached in Norfolk and a class was soon organized. He rode a wide circuit stretching across northeastern Nebraska to the Dakotas, a distance of more than fifty miles and covering a territory of 10,000 square miles. His visits were at intervals of a fortnight or longer. Norfolk became a station in 1882.

The first permanent home for the little congregation was erected during the pastorate of Charles F. Heywood, who before entering the Methodist ministry had practiced law and served a term in the Nebraska legislature. The membership enjoyed a remarkable growth under the leadership of Jesse W. Jennings, 1889-93, and this necessitated the building of a larger church edifice under the able leadership of William Gorst, 1896. This served the needs of the congregation until the building of the present structure.

During the last decade of the nineteenth century large evangelistic CAMP MEETINGS were held in the vicinity of Norfolk, and these profoundly shaped the moral and religious character of the community. To this day the Methodist congregation counts among its members many people of stature and leadership in the community, and these account for the strength of the church as a significant force in the city.

In the main stream of the population explosion and urban growth of the twentieth century, Norfolk found itself a center of trade, industry and education for northeastern Nebraska. The Methodist Church rose to the challenge with a new and larger ministry, multiple services, a staff of professionally trained workers, and a broadened vision of its mission to the world. In 1970 First Church had a membership of 1,686.

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., one of the great ports of the United States, is also one of the most historic cities of the nation. In the Colonial, Revolutionary, Civil War and both World War periods, Norfolk was of prime importance. Its present population is listed as 268,331.

The credit of organizing the first Methodist Society in Norfolk has been generally accorded ROBERT WILLIAMS. However, the Journal of JOSEPH PILMORE states, under date of Nov. 16, 1772, "Having proposed to form a society in Norfolk, I went to the preaching house, a playhouse, and gave an exhortation on the nature and necessity of meeting together, to help and build up each other in the faith of the gospel. I then withdrew to Captain Carson's, where I laid the foundation of a society by joining together twenty-six of them." According to this account, it would appear that the first society in Norfolk was formed by Pilmore and not Williams. Two days later Pilmore wrote, "I went over the water, to Portsmouth, with Mr. Williams and Mr. Watters, who arrived here today, to meet the society."

Robert Williams is, however, universally called the pioneer and apostle of Methodism in VIRGINIA and the south. He was the first Methodist minister to come to Virginia, and for the time his active ministry lasted, the most successful. Robert Williams kept no journal or records of his work. When he first arrived in Norfolk, he is thought to have preached from the court house steps. His preaching was new and strange, sometimes with strong language, which aroused the curiosity and opposition of the people. At first he was treated with incivility and unkindness, but later, as he became better understood, some willingly received him into their homes.

Norfolk first appears in the minutes of the Annual Conference for 1773, and for several years thereafter as a circuit of Norfolk and PORTSMOUTH. From 1776 to 1782, this circuit was omitted from the lists of appointments. The conflict between the colonies and the mother country and the burning of Norfolk in 1776 very nearly extinguished Methodism for a few years. ASBURY left the circuit because of these conditions in 1775. When the circuit was reestablished, James Morris was the preacher. Norfolk was a circuit until 1805, when it was permanently made a station.

When Asbury took charge of the society, he found about thirty members, no plan of regular class meetings, and the meeting house an old shattered building which had been a playhouse. He attempted to take subscriptions for a building. Only about thirty pounds, or about $170 was pledged, but with the war coming on the undertaking was abandoned until about 1792.

When Asbury returned in 1791 and again in 1792, he found the state of religion among the Methodists encouraging. He writes, "The seeds which I have been sowing for twenty years, begin to spring up. Norfolk flourishes."

In 1793, although the society numbered only about fifty members, most of them poor, they were determined to have a house of their own, even though on the plainest and cheapest scale. A lot on Fenchurch Street, adjoining the Academy lot, was leased for sixty years, at the price of "ten pounds in specie." The property was conveyed to "Francis Asbury, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and to each minister and member of the said church in the United States, individually and collectively."

The small wooden building erected on the lot was very plain and rude in form and finish, and was used by the society for six years. This was the second place of worship to have been erected in Norfolk, the first being St. Paul's Episcopal Church. It was the first one to be built by private or voluntary contributions.

Land was purchased in 1800 on Cumberland Street for the second church building, which was first occupied in March 1803. Bishop Asbury in his Journal under that date says, "I preached in the new house, the best in Virginia belonging to our society." This was the first Methodist church to be built on Cumberland Street, from which it derived its name. It was the scene of some of the grandest triumphs the gospel ever achieved in the city of Norfolk.

The second church built on the Cumberland Street site was dedicated in 1834. The building was destroyed by fire in 1848. In less than one year the third church was ready for the congregation, and served the Methodists until about 1900. The fourth and last church erected on Cumberland Street was only about two blocks from the original site and was used until 1922, when the congregation again decided to build and in another section of the city. This was erected in three units and was completed about ten years ago.

The "Cumberland Street Church" had remained as such for about 118 years but it is now known as the First Church and is the Mother Church of Methodism in Norfolk.

A notable event occurred on Cumberland Street when on Sunday, Feb. 27, 1848, at the 11 o'clock service, two volunteer foreign missionaries, BENJAMIN JENKINS and CHARLES TAYLOR, of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, were ordained as elders for the CHINA mission. This was the last service held in that church building before it was destroyed by fire.

In 1848, WILLIAM A. SMITH, minister, advocated the building of another Methodist church as the congregation had become too large to be served by one minister. Subsequently, in 1850, the Granby Street Station was built and used for the first time in December 1850. The minister, John E. Edwards, who was then serving Cumberland Street Church, transferred to Granby Street. This second church in Norfolk is now known as Epworth Church.

Sometime prior to the year 1854, the A.M.E. CHURCH was organized in Norfolk. Details are missing. The preacher of this church was a member of Cumberland Street Church and was recorded in a membership ledger as a Chapter Leader. It is thought that the minister of this congregation was white.

In May 1892, the Union Mission was organized in Cumberland Street Church by S. Q. Collins, who in all probability was a member of the church. The Mission, which is still active, was to serve needy families of the city.

In 1970 there were seventeen United Methodist Churches within the city, with a total membership of 17,788. There is a Norfolk District in the conference which lists 33,157 members.

Epworth Church occupies a physical position in this seaport city that is not excelled by any other church. At the heart of the great business and seaport metropolis, Epworth is easily accessible to the tens of thousands of military and naval personnel who pass through its life and program each year.

In an era when other downtown churches have closed their doors or moved to residential areas, Epworth maintains a unique position, with net increases in church school and church enrollment and attendance, a varied program of activities for all age groups, an evangelical ministry, and a missionary program that touches the far-away places of the world.

Epworth directs to the men and women of the Armed Forces and related groups a large portion of its annual budget, and a vast segment of its program. It has become a city-center for worship and recreation to the military representatives of many nations.

Epworth Church, dating from 1850, is also known for the twenty-two stained glass windows in the sanctuary, which rank among the finest examples of art-glass in the country. In equipment and properties, the church claims to be able to meet the variant needs of a changing, contemporary, urban generation of members and constituents. There is a membership of 2,279 people who are scattered throughout the Tidewater city-complex of Norfolk, Portsmouth, Chesapeake, and Virginia Beach. The "Y's," the hotels, and high-rise apartments that surround the church, are said to find a renewal spiritual oasis in its multifaceted ministry.

Miles Memorial Church was organized in the year 1910 and was a part of the circuit then known as Bethel Pine Beach and Ocean View. In the year 1911 Pine Beach was dropped and in 1912 Ocean View was established as a station. The little church on the corner of Cherry and First View Streets was started in 1911 and the cornerstone was laid in 1911 with Masonic and church ceremonies.

Because of the rapid growth in population and after World War I, the congregation outgrew the small church and the Ocean View School was once more used as a Sunday school. Then in 1923, under the leadership of L. T. Hitt, a two-story building was constructed next door for educational purposes. In 1930 the large social hall on the first floor was converted into a worship sanctuary and remained as such until March 19, 1950. With the continual growth of Ocean View as a residential area, the church facilities became inadequate. The church received 526 members into its fellowship in 1956, setting a record for accessions in one church in one year.

Ground breaking ceremonies for the erection of a new church home at 9450 Granby Street was Easter Sunday, 1949. Rufus A. Miles, after whom the church was named, is credited with full support for his financial aid. An additional educational building was erected in 1955. This great plant has an evaluation of $732,531. The present membership of Miles Memorial is 2,170. Two ministers and one missionary to COSTA RICA have gone out from this church. The church has a unique ministry to the retired ministers of the Virginia Conference. Many homes for the retired brethren are located on Selby Place behind the church.

Park Place Church is an influential mid-town church, with a large percentage of its members residing beyond the radius of five miles.

The church was organized in 1902 near the outer limits of the city in a public school building, with thirty-seven members, under Daniel T. Merritt. During the year they purchased a site and started their first building, to which they soon added. Their religious success in the new community of "Park Place" warranted the procurement of a larger site to provide for even greater expansion; therefore, the corner-stone of the present church was laid by Ruth Lodge of Masons in 1916, and it was dedicated in 1917 by Bishop E. R. HENDRIX. The church burned in February 1923, causing complete loss of the sanctuary, which was rebuilt to a larger capacity and rededicated in October 1923. It suffered another fire in 1949, with major loss to the sanctuary and extensive spoilage to the Sunday school facility. Then the entire institution was modernized, making it a more practical facility for church activities, and dedicated finally by Bishop WILLIAM WALTER PEELE and R. Orman Bryant, Pastor.

Great emphasis is placed upon religious education and character building and the training in the field of music in this church has been of importance to both the youth and adult talent. Park Place is among the top ten Methodist churches in the country in supporting mission; it plays an important part in the spiritual lives of the military and naval personnel stationed in Tidewater; and eleven of its men are serving as ordained ministers of the Gospel, three of whom are in other denominations. On July 15, 1960, Bishop WALTER C. GUM was elected to the episcopacy from this pastorate.

The religious influence of Park Place has permeated into state, city, civic and fraternal affairs, many of the members being chosen or elected to high offices of responsibility and recognition. Present membership of the church is 2,230.

NORMAL, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church was organized by a small group of Methodists in 1865, eight years after the founding of Illinois State Normal University (now Illinois State University), the second teacher's college to be established west of the Alleghenies. The church and the university, neighbors for more than a century, have experienced a mutual growth. By its centennial year First Church had grown to a church with a resident membership of more than 2,500 and an average worship attendance of more than 900. The church's peculiar responsibility to students has been recognized from the beginning. The original church was built only a block from the campus. When it became necessary to build a new edifice, the site chosen was even closer. The new building erected included separate quarters for the WESLEY FOUNDATION program. It appears that within ten years the church will be completely surrounded by a university with an enrollment of 20,000 students.

The new church and educational building, completed in 1957, is of contemporary design. A cross thirty-eight feet high, extends above the stone tower at the entrance to the sanctuary. The bell, which was brought from the old church, calls resident members and students to three morning worship services. The sanctuary windows, made of imported French slab glass, one inch thick and set in concrete, are placed in large panels on either side of the nave. The symbolism in the windows is a richly colorful reminder of the Christian debt to the Jewish faith, and of the most significant experiences in the life of Christ. Hundreds of students, both from Illinois State University and from nearby ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, regularly join the resident members in Sunday worship. In 1970 the membership was 2,739.

The Baby Fold is an institution founded to care for the following multiple services: (1) adoption of infants and pre-school children; (2) counseling for unmarried parents, including provision for prenatal care; medical and legal services, financial aid if needed—all under case-work direction; (3) residential treatment center for emotionally disturbed pre-school children, living in a controlled setting with houseparents, daily medical attention, psychiatric counsel and continuing casework supervision; (4) interim care and training for mentally retarded infants, from birth to three years of age, including casework counseling with parents and long-range planning for the child's continuing care; (5) foster home placement and supervision for children uprooted from natural homes but not legally available for adoption.

The Baby Fold was founded in 1902 and is a non-profit corporation, sponsored by the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. Its Board of Trustees consists of thirty members—fifteen clergy and fifteen lay. The Illinois Department of Children and Family Services license it as a child care facility and a child placement facility and it is certified by the Board of Hospitals and Homes.

NORMAN, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A., McFarlin Memorial Church. In 1921, Mr. and Mrs. Robert McFarlin asked for the privilege of building a church as a memorial to their son, Robert B. McFarlin, who died at the age of two years on July 28, 1893. Thousands of lives have been touched through this House of God which bears the name of this brief life.

The Church was built during the years 1923 and 1924 and dedicated on Dec. 7, 1924. It covers a floor space of 130 x 180 feet and cost in excess of $700,000. It is of Gothic style architecture and is built of Indian Lithic Limestone. It took some seventy cars of stone for the construction of the ninety-plus rooms. The church tower is a landmark for the community; it is 112 feet above the ground and can be seen at a distance from all highways leading to the city.

In the early years the University of Oklahoma used the modern dining room and kitchen facilities as these were the only adequate accommodations for large meeting and dining groups.

The seating capacity of the sanctuary is 1,700, with accommodations for an additional hundred at the rear of the sanctuary. The classrooms were originally built to accommodate an enrollment of 1,700 in the Sunday school—currently, McFarlin has an enrollment of 1,933 in Sunday school, out of a total membership of 3,522. This has, of course, necessitated the remodeling of many areas.

The first Sunday school enrollment was a total of 441 in twenty-two classes in 1924. The present program is guided by 216 officers and teachers with an average attendance of 1,000. Many of the charter members are still active in the life of the Church.

A bronze memorial tablet in the sanctuary expresses the love and spirit of this memorial which states: "This House of Worship is built for the youth of Oklahoma and the people of Norman, and whomsoever may find it in his heart to worship here."

NORRIS, WILLIAM H. (1801-1878), a pioneer missionary to URUGUAY and ARGENTINA, was born in MAINE. He was admitted on trial to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1825, transferring to the MAINE CONFERENCE a year later.

In 1839, in response to a request by JOHN DEMPSTER, he was appointed as a missionary to MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay, the first permanent Methodist missionary appointment for that country. Because of unsettled conditions and war between Uruguay and Argentina, he was unsuccessful in erecting a church building, although he did organize a congregation and hold services for two years. He returned home in 1842, but later the same year was reassigned to BUENOS AIRES, Argentina, where he worked with John Dempster. There he ministered primarily to the English-speaking community, which was broken up by civil war and a blockade of the port by British and French warships. He returned to the United States in 1847.

In 1847 he visited Mexico as a Bible agent, going to Vera Cruz with United States troops engaged in the Mexican War. During the military occupation he placed Bibles in thousands of homes in Vera Cruz, Jalapa, Puebla, and Mexico City. He then began to fill a series of appointments in the NEW YORK EAST ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Norris then served in that conference until 1863, when he became agent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY in PANAMA and Central America. A year later he returned to Buenos Aires to assist in raising funds and in superintending the building of a new Methodist church and school.

NORTH, CHRISTOPHER RICHARD (1888-). British scholar, was born in 1888. He became a Methodist in 1904, offered for the Wesleyan ministry in 1908; he served as a missionary in LUCKNOW, 1918-20. In 1925 he went to Handsworth College, BIRMINGHAM, as Old Testament tutor, and remained there until the college closed during the Second World War. After five years in circuit he became professor of Hebrew at Bangor, where he was also dean of the faculty of theology from 1948 until his retirement in 1953. He was secretary of the Society for Old Testament Studies (1928-48), president in 1949, and treasurer (1952-57). His writings include The Old Testament Interpretation of History, which was the FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURE for 1946, The Suffering Servant in Deutero Isaiah (1948), and Isaiah 40-55 (1952).

PETER STEPHENS

NORTH, ERIC MCCOY (1888-), American minister, teacher, and executive secretary of the AMERICAN BIBLE

SOCIETY, (1928-56), was born in Middletown, Conn. on June 22, 1888, the son of FRANK MASON and Louise J. (McCoy) NORTH. He was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, receiving the B.A. in 1909, the M.A. in 1910, and the D.D. in 1931. He received the Ph.D. degree from Columbia University in 1914, and is also a graduate of Union Theological Seminary. He married Gladys Haven, daughter of WILLIAM I. HAVEN, on April 17, 1920, and their children are Theodora, Louise Haven and William Haven. He became assistant professor of the history of Christianity at OHIO WESLEYAN, 1915-17. At intervals, 1917-24, he was an associate editor of Methodist Sunday-school publications. He was ordained a minister of the M. E. Church in 1918, and served as a departmental secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of that Church from 1919 to 1924. He lectured at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1919-1924. He was executive secretary of the China Union Universities, 1924-27; associate secretary of the American Bible Society, 1927-28; and general secretary from 1928-56. He served as Assistant Secretary of the General Wartime Commission of the Churches, 1918, and as CHAPLAIN in the U. S. Army, 1918-19. He was many years a trustee of the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia, the Harvard-Yenching Institute, and DREW UNIVERSITY. He was decorated with the order of Orange-Nassau by the Netherlands. He has written Early Methodist Philanthropy, 1915; Organization and Administration of the Sunday School (with J. L. Cuninggim) in 1917; The Kingdom and the Nations, 1921; The Worker and His Church (with Louise M. North), 1921. When he was general secretary of the American Bible Society, he edited The Book of a Thousand Tongues, 1939. He resides in Chatham, N. J., and continues as a consultant of the American Bible Society.

NORTH, FRANK MASON (1850-1935), author of the hymn, "Where Cross the Crowded Ways of Life," was an American pastor and administrator, an ecumenical statesman. Born in NEW YORK CITY on Dec. 3, 1850, he received a total of four degrees from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY: B.A. (1872, with high honors and Phi Beta Kappa), M.A. (1875), D.D. (1894), LL.D. (1918). He had two sons by his first wife, who died in 1878. In 1885 he married Louise McCoy, daughter of a Congregational minister, and they had one son, ERIC MCCOY NORTH, long-time general secretary of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

North served six pastorates in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE between 1873 and 1887, then transferred to Middletown, Conn., in the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE. From 1892 until 1912, as corresponding secretary of the New York City Church Extension and Missionary Society (later New York City Society), he supervised a network of urban parishes, immigrant congregations, and interracial centers, including the Church of All Nations. During this period he also directed the National City Evangelization Union and edited The Christian City.

After administering Methodist work in New York City, he turned his talents to Methodism around the world, as corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions from 1912 to 1924. North was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1908, 1916, 1920, 1924, and 1928; to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1901, 1911, 1921, and 1931; and to the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910. He served on the Methodist Committee on Unification from 1920 until 1928, and on the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL from its formation in 1921 until 1928.

As one of the founders of the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, he shared in the drafting of the SOCIAL CREED adopted by the General Conference of 1908. That same year he helped to organize the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and, as chairman of its Committee on the Church and Modern Industry, secured the adoption of the modified Methodist Social Creed as "The Social Creed of the Churches." As chairman of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council (1912-16) and as its president (1916-20), he represented the American churches in several missions of reconciliation and relief during the war years. For these services he was decorated by the French and Greek governments.

Besides his famous "Where Cross the Crowded Ways of Life," North's poems include "O Master of the Waking World" and "The World's Astir!" in The Methodist Hymnal, as well as in many others.

NORTH AFRICA PROVISIONAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

This is a Conference organized of the Methodist work in ALGERIA and TUNISIA. The beginnings of Methodist work in North Africa and its growth into a Provisional Annual Conference are outlined under Algeria with certain of the general centers noted. The work in these may be briefly described as follows:

Algiers with a population of about 1,000,000, counting its outlying suburbs, is the principal city, seaport, and educational center of Algeria. It began as a trading post of the Phoenicians. The church there began to meet in a rented hall, but now meets at a new center at El-Biar, a suburb now part of the city of Algiers. The Methodist congregation is composed of both European Christians and certain converts from Islam. A new chapel has been erected at La Palmeraie in El-Biar. Algiers also has a Youth Club, a Young Women's Hostel (Villa Elisabeth), a Social-evangelistic Center at El-Biar, where a visiting nurse ministers to numerous families, a Sewing School with sixty students, while other missionaries work with women and girls through various group activities. There is also a Christian Social Center at El-Biar, which includes a chapel for the Algiers congregation. A trained Algerian social worker is appointed to social service there. The Christian Center of Maghreb Studies in which The Methodist Church has a part, is located at Le Polmeroit. Merston Speight, a Methodist minister, is one of the two men in charge of the Center. The C.C.E.M. offers training in Islam to members of all churches and tries to conduct a dialogue with Moslems.

Constantine is one of the largest cities of eastern Algeria, about 280 miles east of Algiers. There are about 200,000 inhabitants, most of whom are Arabic-speaking Muslims. It is a very ancient city, formerly a fortress considered impregnable because of its situation.

The church in Constantine worshipped in a girls' home chapel until a new church building was erected. There is a Constantine Boys' Home, a Frances Nast Gamble Memorial Home, which is for Muslim girls as well as for girls who attend certain governmental and vocational schools. There is also a Hannah Bradley Goodall Memorial Evangelistic Center, supported by the Women's Division of Christian Service, which ministers to Arabic-speaking girls who attend classes and clubs and use the library.

Fort National is a strongly fortified village up in the mountains of Great Kabylia, eighty miles east of Algiers. Fortifications here were built by the French in 1857. Evangelistic work has been part of the program of both Divisions of the General Board of Missions of The Methodist Church through the past years. A Home for Boys was the outstanding feature of the Division of World Missions and still is. The home is now under the direction of a Kabyle Christian.

Les Oudhias is a growing market center thirty miles from Fort National, named for a tribe of Kabyles in Great Kabylia. A number of governmental administrative units were for a time installed there, and many Kabyles from surrounding villages have settled at this center, which has a dispensary as well as an evangelistic center in this location. There are also a library for the men in the village, a new athletic field for basketball, volleyball, and handball, and handicrafts for women.

Il-Maten is a Kabyle village where there is a station of The Methodist Church. It is located four miles from the railway and 150 miles east of Algiers, overlooking the Souman Valley. Provision is made to do evangelistic work, carry on a dispensary, as well as a social and recreational program for the young men. Since 1963 there is a surgeon at Il-Maten, and a very well equipped hospital was built in 1966. Now there are fifty beds and two operating rooms.

Oran is the capital city of western Algeria, and a very important seaport almost 400 miles west of Algiers. Its population is something over 400,000 with 380,000 of these registered as Muslims. The Methodist Church supports there a small congregation composed mostly of European Christians who worship in the local church. There is also a weekly church school.

Tunis, which is the capital of Tunisia, has an Arab population. It is situated about ten miles from ancient Carthage and is a sizeable seaport and the site of a large Muslim university and several other important schools.

A small congregation worships in one of the halls of the Methodist Center at Tunis, which is jointly supported by the Women's Division of Christian Service and the Division of World Missions. The missionaries conduct evangelistic meetings and visit in the Muslim homes and work shops, taking advantage of every occasion to share the gospel with the people. There is also a young men's center and a Christian Social Center in Tunis. A center for women and girls was opened in 1954.

Bizerte. In this city about forty miles away a weekly worship is conducted as well as meetings with young people. Methodist missionaries cooperate closely with Swedish lady missionaries whose work is mostly with women and girls.

North Africa Provisional Annual Conference is part of the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE and is administered from Zurich with Bishop FRANZ SCHAFER as the present presiding bishop. Rev. Paul Bres, district superintendent, oversees all this area in his one district.

NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE was created in 1870. Prior to that date, parts of the territory which comprised it had been included at one time or another in the following conferences: WESTERN, TENNESSEE, MISSISSIPPI, ALABAMA (ME), and ALABAMA (MES).

Following treaties signed with the Chickasaw Indians on July 23, 1805 and the Cherokee Indians on Jan. 7, 1806, ratified on May 22, 1807 and Dec. 13, 1808, respectively, people of wealth and culture poured into Madison County, constituted in 1808. According to Anson West, "The first white people who touched the soil of North Alabama were Methodist, and Methodist services were held before a preacher was assigned. Joshua Boucher, a class leader and exhorter, came in 1808. Methodist Societies were organized, leaders appointed, exhorters licensed. As early as 1811 Methodist Quarterly Conferences were being held."

The first Methodist preacher appointed to the part of ALABAMA now included in the North Alabama Conference was JAMES GWIN. A member of the Western Conference, Gwin was appointed as "a missionary to go to that section in the great bend of the Tennessee River and to any contiguous territory where he might find the opportunity to hoist the banner of Methodism." A year later Gwin reported to the conference that the Flint Circuit had been organized with 179 members, four of whom were Negroes. The Flint Circuit had many preaching places, among them State Line, Ford's Chapel, Shiloh, Blue Springs, Lebanon, and Hunt Springs. Such was the beginning of Methodism in North Alabama.

When Alabama became a state in 1819, there were some 1,600 white and 206 Negro Methodists in the area which later comprised the North Alabama Conference. In 1832, when the Alabama Conference was created, it had 8,196 white and 2,770 Negro members. Whites and colored usually worshiped together, but in some places, particularly in Tuscaloosa, separate services were held. By 1830 Alabama Methodism had won 1,028 Indian members. Five Indians were ordained as Methodist preachers. In the part of Alabama which belonged at that time to the Tennessee Conference, there were 3,607 white, 653 Negro, and 260 Indian members.

Apparently the METHODIST PROTESTANTS formed the first regular Methodist annual conference in Alabama. LYMAN DAVIS (Democratic Methodism in America, p. 239) says the organization "was a process rather than a clear-cut beginning on any single date." There was a preliminary organization on May 1, 1829. A second meeting in September of the same year resulted in the formation of the Alabama Conference of the M. P. Church. Many of the outstanding members of the old church became Methodist Protestants.

Alabama Methodists, like those in other Southern states, were involved in the controversy over slavery. Some Methodist slave owners sought to minister to the spiritual well being of their slaves. Two colored missions were established in North Alabama. The wives and daughters of some white masters taught Negroes in Sunday schools. But the efforts to ameliorate the lot of the slaves did not satisfy northern Methodists, and the M. E. Church divided over slavery at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844. In 1845, the M. E. Church, South was organized, and the Alabama Conference adhered South.

Methodism in North Alabama suffered from the ravages of the Civil War. LA GRANGE COLLEGE, the oldest institution of higher learning in the state, was burned by Federal troops. The college was founded in 1829 by the Methodists, antedating RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE (chartered in 1830), which today has the distinction of being the oldest Methodist college still in existence. Before it was destroyed LaGrange College had served Alabama more than a quarter of a century and during that time it was regarded as one of the strong colleges in the United States. The loss of the school was a great blow to North Alabama Methodists. Generally the destruction of property in the sections of Alabama overrun by Federal troops was great. Vagabonds connected with the northern army committed outrages.

In 1867, the M. E. Church officially re-entered Alabama. Many Alabamians regarded that church as a political organization under the dominance of radical politicians. But it is fair to say that many good Alabamians believed that the M. E. Church could "more perfectly serve an important and respectable minority to whom the Southern Church would not be acceptable." (Lazenby, p. 365). Thus there came about the two branches of episcopal Methodism in the state, and each had an Alabama Conference. It should be said that in spite of Southern antipathy the Alabama Conference (ME) rendered sincere and honorable service.

At its first session in 1870, the North Alabama Conference had almost 100 ministers whose membership had been in other annual conferences serving the area, along with seventeen others who were admitted on trial. The new conference had 261 Sunday schools with 1,386 teachers and 9,952 pupils. There were seven districts and eighty-six appointments, including three in college presidencies—W. H. Anderson, Florence Wesleyan University; J. G. Wilson, Huntsville Female College; and B. F. Farabee, Tuscaloosa Female College. The conference claimed Athens Female College which was founded in 1842, and it held a half interest in Southern University at Greensboro. At the time of organization the conference had 22,648 members, 188 of them Negroes.

In 1872, the districts of the conference were rearranged, and for the first time there was a BIRMINGHAM District. However, it contained only one appointment in the city of Birmingham—Birmingham-Elyton Station.

On May 25, 1881, the first issue of the Alabama Christian Advocate appeared; the paper was sponsored jointly with the Alabama Conference. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized at Tuscaloosa in 1879. In 1886, the conference Minutes carried the names of the officers of "the Woman's Department of the Board of Church Extension." The Conference Parsonage and Home Mission Society came in 1897; a year later the name was changed to the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Methodism grew rapidly in the Birmingham area. The 1887 Minutes included the Bessemer District with twelve pastoral charges.

In the field of education, the conference emphasized the maintenance of both colleges and high schools. By 1892, there was sentiment in favor of a "North Alabama Conference College for Men" to be located in Birmingham. The institution was opened under that name in 1898.

By the turn of the century, the North Alabama Conference had made considerable progress. There were 217 preachers (nineteen retired and four supernumerary), 617 Sunday schools with 3,903 teachers and 36,407 pupils, 802 congregations, 670 houses of worship valued at $715,802, and 161 parsonages.

Succeeding years brought advances along many lines. The laymen, led by J. E. Morris of Saganaw, began a movement to provide homes for supernannuated ministers. A board was set up to raise a fund for conference claimants, and a conference agency on supernannuate homes with a director in charge was established.

The WESLEY FOUNDATION movement was launched in 1904 at the Alabama State College for Girls at Montevallo, with the Methodist church in that community ministering to the spiritual welfare of the students. In 1912, the conference established a committee to consider plans for improving the temporal, moral, and religious conditions of the Negro population. An offering was taken for MILES COLLEGE in Birmingham. In 1913, seven missionaries were sent to the foreign field. In the same year, JOHN WESLEY GILBERT, president of Miles College, accompanied Bishop WALTER R. LAMBETH as he established a new mission at WEMBO-NYAMA, Africa. Gilbert urged Alabama Methodists to support the new mission.

In 1917, Southern University and Birmingham College were consolidated to form BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE. In the same year the conference enthusiastically endorsed the Methodist CENTENARY MOVEMENT, accepted its quota of $1,249,083, and two years later reported it had been oversubscribed.

In 1929, the conference cast a majority vote against the proposed plan for the union of American Methodism, the laymen being more opposed to it than the ministers. Twelve years later the vote for union was 344 to 100.

The North Alabama Conference went into The Methodist Church in 1939 with 344 ministers and $9,297 church members. The Methodist Protestant conference, after 110 years in the state, had thirty-four pastoral appointments and property valued at some $250,000. The Alabama Conference (ME) had 156 preaching places, 136 church buildings, and property valued at $371,481.

The first session of the North Alabama Conference of The Methodist Church was held at Woodlawn Church, Birmingham in November 1939, with Bishop J. L. DECELL in charge. Bishop WALLACE BROWN, who had presided at the final session of the Alabama Conference (ME), and J. S. EDDINS, substituting for Bishop JAMES H. STRAUGHN from the former M. P. Church who arrived late, participated in the formal service recognizing union. The united conference had eleven districts, 340 pastoral charges, 957 organized congregations, and 165,667 church members.

The North Alabama Conference has grown with the state. In addition to the metropolis of Birmingham, the conference has within its boundaries such strong cities as ANNISTON, BESSEMER, DECATUR, GADSDEN, FLORENCE, HUNTSVILLE, JASPER, and TUSCALOOSA. The conference has magnified the program of the rural church, and it has established Camp Sumatanga. The two Alabama conferences have greatly enlarged the Methodist Hospital in Birmingham, and they joined in building Fair Haven Home for the Aging in the same city in 1961. In 1970, the North Alabama Conference reported 517 pastoral charges and 195,301 members.

NORTH ANDOVER, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A. Rolling Ridge, Methodist Center for church-related activities, located at 660 Great Pond Road, was purchased in 1948 through the initiative of laymen, and is controlled by the New England Conference and its Board of Education. This thirty-eight acre estate, twenty-five miles north of BOSTON, can accommodate 125 people in a campus-type setting of buildings and spacious grounds on a lakeside location. Originally designed for summer youth programs, the facility is now operated year round for seminars, institutes, and week-end retreats for all age groups under the administration of a bishop-appointed "Dean-Director" and a small staff.

NORTH ARKANSAS CONFERENCE was formed in 1914 by merging the Arkansas and White River Conferences. (See ARKANSAS for dates of predecessor conferences and early history.) The territory included in the new conference was identical with that of the Arkansas Conference before it was divided in 1870 to form the White River Conference.

The two conferences were consolidated in 1914 for practical reasons. As matters stood, they were too small in men and resources for economy of administration and for the appropriate appointment of the preachers to the churches. Moreover, by 1914 improved means of travel made it possible for preachers to gather for annual conference sessions from over a wider geographical area. The new body was called the North Arkansas Conference because the name properly identified its location in the state.

The North Arkansas Conference includes the fertile farming territory in the northeastern part of the state, locally called the "bottom," and the Ozark Mountain region in the northwest which is referred to as the "hill country."

The WESTERN METHODIST ASSEMBLY, established by the M. E. Church, South, in 1923, is at MOUNT SQUOYAH, Fayetteville. Traditionally the superintendent has been a minister from the North Arkansas Conference. HENDRIX COLLEGE, since 1934 the only Methodist institution of higher learning in Arkansas, is within the bounds of the conference at Conway. The conference works cordially with the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE in support of many area-wide and denominational causes.

When organized in 1914, the North Arkansas Conference had 180 pastoral charges and 58,163 members. In 1970, there were six districts, 213 pastoral charges, and 98,880 members. The churches, parsonages, and other property belonging to the conference were valued at more than $37,000,000.

NORTH CAROLINA is one of the thirteen original states, lying between VIRGINIA and SOUTH CAROLINA and bordering on the Atlantic Ocean. The first permanent settlement in North Carolina was made in 1660. The land area of the state is approximately 50,000 square miles, and its population in 1970 was 4,961,832.

North Carolina's wide coastal plain is well suited to farming, and though the region has some industry, it is primarily agricultural, growing cotton and tobacco; it leads the nation in the production of the latter. The piedmont section has become highly industrialized and urbanized, making North Carolina the foremost state in the production of textiles, tobacco, brick, and household furniture. The scenic Blue Ridge and Great Smoky Mountains in the west make tourism an important industry. More than 125,000 students are enrolled in seventy senior and junior colleges and universities in the state, DUKE and the University of North Carolina being the strongest educational institutions.

Peculiar to the geography of North Carolina and dominating its history more than any other factor are the Carolina Banks—long sandbar-like islands along the coast which block the rivers of the piedmont and cause them to flow for the most part into large bodies of shallow water called sounds. These banks have left the state without a single outstanding port for oceangoing ships, and they account for the fact that until recently North Carolina was a state of small farms without large cities or towns.

The lack of a port tended, through much of North Carolina's history, to tie the northern part of the state economically to Virginia and the southern part to South Carolina, while the mountain region developed close ties with TENNESSEE. As a result, sectionalism became more dominant in the political and religious life of North Carolina than in most states. Sectionalism in the state became more pronounced because the settlement of the western piedmont was not effected by a westward movement of people from the coastal plain, but rather by a sudden influx of immigrants who came down the valley of Virginia, turned east through the gaps in the Blue Ridge, and spread over the piedmont. Later they were joined by Marylanders and Virginians moving west and turning south when they reached the Blue Ridge. Prominent among those who came from PENNSYLVANIA were the Scotch-Irish and the Germans.

Organized Methodism entered North Carolina from Virginia about the beginning of the American Revolution. To be sure, GEORGE WHITEFIELD made several trips across the colony between 1738 and 1770, and in late 1772 JOSEPH PILMORE preached in the sound region en route to CHARLESTON, but the impact of those two men was not enduring. The first permanent foothold of Methodism in the colony was in the western coastal plain and eastern piedmont just below Brunswick County, Va. It was made possible by the preaching of ROBERT WILLIAMS there in 1774. By 1776 there was a North Carolina Circuit with 683 members. From that time forward Methodism spread rapidly in North Carolina. By 1779 there were three circuits with 1,467 members totally within the state. These circuits extended from the Virginia line down past the center of the state, while at the same time Virginia's Pittsylvania Circuit was extending into the western piedmont and the upper Yadkin valley.

The Yadkin Circuit, organized in 1780 by Andrew Yeargan, spread Methodism around the foot of the Blue Ridge into upper South Carolina. The SALISBURY Circuit began the spread of Methodism down the Yadkin and Pee Dee Rivers under the leadership of BEVERLY ALLEN in 1783, and the large Bertie Circuit formed in the same year was indicative of the spread of Methodism eastward. In 1787 a Bladen Circuit was formed for the lower Cape Fear region, and in 1789 DANIEL ASBURY organized a group of Virginia Methodists who had moved to the lower Catawba River. In 1793 SAMUEL EDNEY was sent across the mountains to organize the Swannanoa Circuit. Thus except for a few areas, Methodism succeeded in covering the entire state of North Carolina in a little less than two decades.

The spread of Methodism in the piedmont was most successful among the Marylanders and Virginians, many of whom were already Methodists when they moved south. Some of the Scotch-Irish people had been influenced in Pennsylvania by the preaching of George Whitefield and Jonathan Edwards and were therefore ready to join the Methodists, especially during the great revival of 1801-02. There were some followers of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN among the Germans in North Carolina, but the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST which he organized did not appear in the state as a separate organization.

During the spread of Methodism over North Carolina, FRANCIS ASBURY often traveled through the central and eastern sections holding important conferences. The first annual conference in America, following the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE, was conducted by Bishops ASBURY and COKE at the home of MAJOR GREEN HILL near Louisburg, April 20, 1785. The house is now one of the historic SHRINES of American Methodism. Asbury held a conference at Salisbury in 1786 and conducted three at the home of GEORGE MCKNIGHT near Salem—1789, 1790, and 1791. With the development of conferences on the frontier across the mountains, the center for Methodism in the state shifted eastward, and conferences were again held at the home of Green Hill in 1792 and 1793, the last to be conducted in the state during the eighteenth century.

When the 1796 GENERAL CONFERENCE created conferences with fixed geographical boundaries, North Carolina was divided between the Virginia and South Carolina Conferences. Then when the HOLSTON CONFERENCE was formed in 1824, the section of North Carolina across the Blue Ridge went with that body. In 1836 the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the Virginia Conference, thus beginning a long drawn out process whereby all of North Carolina Methodism was finally placed in annual conferences which were wholly within the state. Over much opposition the North Carolina Conference acquired the churches in the Cape Fear Valley in southeastern North Carolina from the South Carolina Conference in 1850, and it got the work around CHARLOTTE and west of the Catawba River from the same conference in 1870. During the 1850's there was a strong movement in the North Carolina Conference for independence from Virginia. The goal was achieved when the North Carolina Conference withdrew support from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE and the Richmond Christian Advocate, the two institutions which the two conferences had held in common up to that time. By the end of the decade the North Carolina Conference had established the North Carolina Christian Advocate, and Trinity College near HIGH POINT (later moved to Durham), the forerunner of DUKE UNIVERSITY. During the same period the state line from the sounds to the mountains became the boundary between the Virginia and North Carolina Conferences. When the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was formed in 1890 it included the mountain section of the state which had been in the Holston Conference since 1824, and in 1894 the four counties in the extreme northeastern section of North Carolina were taken from the Virginia Conference and placed in the North Carolina Conference. This completed the process of unifying North Carolina Methodism in annual conferences wholly within the state.

Another factor which complicated the growth of Methodism in North Carolina was the demand for democracy in the church. It was first felt when JAMES O'KELLY and his associates walked out of the 1792 General Conference. O'Kelly had a strong following in the northern piedmont section of North Carolina which resulted in the formation of the Christian Church (now a part of the United Church of Christ). O'Kelly's followers established Elon College near Burlington, N. C., which still survives as an A-grade college.

Of course, the METHODIST PROTESTANT schism in the 1820's was a more important result of the demand for democracy in the church. On Dec. 19, 1828 a group of preachers and laymen met at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL in Halifax County, N. C., and organized the first M. P. Conference in the land. The movement spread to Guilford County the next year, and by the time of the Civil War there were Methodist Protestants in most of the rural sections of the state. As time passed the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE became one of the stronger M. P. conferences in the United States.

While the North Carolina Conference and all others which included parts of the state within their boundaries adhered South after the division in 1844, there was some dissatisfaction with that action. Several congregations in the old Quaker section of Guilford and surrounding counties affiliated with the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH and sustained a precarious relationship with that body until they were driven underground or out of the state during the Civil War. In 1870 the group reorganized at Colfax, Guilford County, and in 1879 they formed a North Carolina Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church with three circuits. Growth was slow until the turn of the century when their emphasis on HOLINESS drew many who thought the older churches were surrendering an important emphasis. In 1965 the conference had two districts, ninety-four preaching places, 4,639 members (a few of them in South Carolina), and a campground and central meeting place at Colfax.

Following the Civil War the M. E. Church reentered North Carolina, and in 1867 some of the mountain congregations were received into the Holston Conference (ME) which had been organized in 1865. The Northern Church formed a Virginia and North Carolina Mission Conference in 1867 which was composed of both white and Negro ministers and churches. Two years later the mission conference was divided to form the Virginia and North Carolina Conferences. In 1879 the white ministers and churches were set off from the North Carolina Conference into a conference which became the Blue Ridge Conference. In 1896 the Blue Ridge Conference was divided to form the Atlantic Mission Conference in eastern North Carolina, but in 1912 the two were merged to form the BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE which continued until unification in 1939. The North Carolina Conference continued as a Negro body until unification when it became a conference in the CENTRAL JURISDICTION. Then in 1964 it was merged with the Virginia churches of the Washington Conference (CJ) to become the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. The latter was merged with the overlying conferences of the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION in 1968.

Following the Civil War, many of the M. P. congregations in North Carolina joined "the Methodist Church" (1866-77) which was made up of the northern conferences of the M. P. Church. Shortly before the two branches reunited in 1877 as the Methodist Protestant Church, the "Methodist Church" reported an East North Carolina and a Western North Carolina Conference. There was friction between these two bodies and the North Carolina Conference of the M. P. Church, and the latter conference, while voting for the reunion of the northern and southern branches of Methodist Protestantism in 1877, seemed determined not to receive some of the preachers and churches of the East and Western North Carolina Conferences. As a result, some of the members of the East and Western North Carolina Conferences formed the Deep River Conference in 1878 which continued until 1891 and then disintegrated with most of its congregations going into the Blue Ridge Conference (MEC).

While the M. E. Church succeeded in gathering many Negro members from the M. E. Church, South into its fold immediately following the Civil War, many more were attracted to the Negro Methodist denominations. Soon after the Federal troops occupied the sound region of North Carolina, J. W. Hood began to organize the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH there. The North Carolina Conference of the A.M.E. Zion Church was organized in 1868. Today it is the strongest Negro Methodist church in the state, with seven conferences and LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE at Salisbury. A North Carolina A.M.E. conference was organized at Wilmington in 1868, and that church now has two conferences in the state. By 1873 the C.M.E. CHURCH, fostered by the M. E. Church, South, had a North Carolina Conference. In 1965 it had 9,200 members in the state.

When American Methodists considered union in 1925, the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference (ME) and the North Carolina M. P. Conference almost unanimously favored the move, while the two Southern Methodist conferences failed to ratify it. By 1938, however, when another plan for unification was presented, the vote against it in the two Southern conferences was negligible. In the merger, the boundaries of the two conferences of the M. E. Church, South became the boundaries of the conferences of The Methodist Church in the state. The five North Carolina annual conferences—two MES, two ME, and one MP—brought into The Methodist Church in 1939 a total of 767 charges and 358,265 members.

THE LAKE JUNALUSKA METHODIST ASSEMBLY, INC. near ASHEVILLE, which now belongs to the Southeastern Jurisdiction, is within the bounds of the Western North Carolina Conference. With some 2,500 acres, Lake Junaluska is the largest summer assembly in the church. It has a 250-acre lake, a large number of lodges, and some 500 private homes. The World Methodist Building at Lake Junaluska is headquarters for the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES and HISTORY of The United Methodist Church, and the INTERNATIONAL METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

Seven men have been elected bishop from conferences in North Carolina: JAMES ATKINS (1906), JOHN C. KILGO (1910), ROBERT E. JONES (1920), WILLIAM WALTER PEELE (1938), ROBERT N. BROOKS and PAUL N. GABER (1944), and W. KENNETH GOODSON (1964).

North Carolina Methodism owns and controls, or is affiliated with, eight strong educational institutions: DUKE UNIVERSITY and the DUKE DIVINITY SCHOOL; BENNETT COLLEGE at GREENSBORO; BREVARD JUNIOR COLLEGE at

BREVARD; GREENSBORO COLLEGE which is the second oldest permanent college for women in the United States; HIGH POINT COLLEGE, which was founded by the former M. P. Church; METHODIST COLLEGE at Fayetteville; NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN College at Rocky Mount; and PFEIFFER COLLEGE at Misenheimer. The total enrollment in the eight institutions in 1968 was more than 12,000.

In 1970 North Carolina Methodism had two episcopal areas (Charlotte and Raleigh), two annual conferences, twenty-five districts, 1,209 charges, 1,580 ministers, 494,094 members, and property valued at $271,610,462.

HOMER KEEVER

NORTH CAROLINA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE was started at a session of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES) held at Pittsboro, N. C., in 1855. At that conference a resolution was passed approving the establishment of a book store and a religious newspaper.

A committee was appointed to carry out the proposal, and the first issue was produced at RALEIGH, N. C., in January of 1856 under the editorship of R. T. Heflin. He continued as editor until 1861, when W. E. Pell took over. However, in the same year, the young paper suspended publication on account of the Civil War. It was revived in the next year and continued under great difficulty until March, 1865, when the prostrate economic condition of the state compelled a second shut-down.

The determination to have a Methodist publication in NORTH CAROLINA persisted, and a semi-official journal called the Enterprise, and later the Methodist Enterprise, came into being also at Raleigh in 1865. It was published by L. Branson, a Methodist local preacher, who had the active and able assistance of H. T. Hudson, then pastor of Edenton Street Church in Raleigh.

The next year the North Carolina Conference voted approval of a direct successor to the defunct North Carolina Christian Advocate which was to be called The Episcopal Methodist and to be edited by Hudson.

Within a few months, however, the name Advocate returned to the masthead, with variations thereafter between the name Christian Advocate and Raleigh Christian Advocate. J. B. Bobbitt took over editorial duties in 1868 and continued in this capacity until 1878.

From 1868 until 1894 there was a rapid succession of editors and publishers. Upon formation of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1890 the offices of the paper were moved to GREENSBORO, under sponsorship of both conferences. The original name, North Carolina Christian Advocate, came back into use in 1896, but three years later the North Carolina Conference withdrew support and established the Raleigh Christian Advocate, with T. N. IVEY as editor. Eight years later he left this position to become editor of the church's general organ, the Nashville Christian Advocate.

Both publications, the Raleigh Christian Advocate and the North Carolina Christian Advocate, continued on parallel courses until efforts to merge the two into one publication finally met with success in 1919. The two editors, L. S. Massey of the Raleigh Christian Advocate and H. M. Blair of the North Carolina Christian Advocate, became co-editors, with the latter name being retained for the publication. The next year GILBERT T. ROWE was named editor, only to leave within a year to become BOOK EDITOR in Nashville.

Thereupon A. W. PLYLER of the Western North Carolina Conference assumed the editorship and began a long and fruitful service which extended for over twenty years. His twin brother, M. T. PLYLER, was elected co-editor in 1927. The two of them formed a remarkable journalistic team, which did not terminate until their retirement in 1945.

In 1927 the presently occupied building was erected in Greensboro. During the twenty years thereafter the paper made steady advances in circulation and influence.

Its editorial voice was heard widely over the Church, and it came to be recognized as one of the leading religious journals in the United States. Perhaps the most significant achievement of the remarkable Plyler twins was in resolving the inter-conference problems and the financial stresses which had hampered the paper's progress in past years.

Since 1945, the editorial chair has been filled by a series of able writers and interpreters of church affairs. Henry C. Sprinkle, Jr., served from 1945 to 1949 when he left to become editor of The World Outlook. Thereupon, Cecil W. Robbins took the editorial helm until his resignation in 1955 to become president of LOUISBURG COLLEGE. The next ten years were divided equally between R. P. Marshall and S. J. Starnes, each of whom served with distinction. The present editor, James C. Stokes, assumed the position in June 1966.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate continues as the official publication of the North Carolina Conference and the Western North Carolina Conference of The United Methodist Church and these conferences control its operation through a Methodist Board of Publication, Inc. In addition to publishing the weekly religious journal, the enterprise also does job printing under the trade name The Piedmont Press. The total assets of the corporation at present are valued at close to half a million dollars.

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MP) was organized at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL, near Enfield, N. C., Dec. 19, 1828, with Eli B. Whitaker, a preacher, presiding. It was the first METHODIST PROTESTANT annual conference, even antedating the organization of the M. P. GENERAL CONFERENCE. Because of the conference's priority and because of the location of its organizing session, Whitaker's Chapel was regarded through the years as the historic SHRINE of democratic Methodism in America. The organizing session of the conference was composed of nine preachers, five local preachers, and twelve laymen.

For more than sixty years the M. P. Church in North Carolina was predominantly a rural denomination. All of the earlier churches were in the open country. Attempts to establish congregations in the cities failed until around 1890. By 1896 the conference had organized societies and built churches in nine cities, including GREENSBORO, ASHEBORO, and HIGH POINT.

For the first half century there was sentiment in favor of dividing the conference into eastern and western branches. The division was effected at the session at YADKIN COLLEGE in 1878. The division left the North Carolina Conference with nine charges and 2,500 members, and the new Western North Carolina Conference with twenty-one charges and 8,500 members. At Tabernacle Church, Guilford County, in 1880, the two conferences merged to form again the North Carolina Conference.

The North Carolina Conference was typically southern in its attitude toward slavery. Its delegates to the 1838 General Conference were instructed to say, if the subject of slavery was broached, that the North Carolina Conference did "not consider that a debatable subject."

In 1866 when the northern conferences of the M. P. Church withdrew and formed "the Methodist Church," some M. P. ministers and churches in North Carolina announced that they had suffered for their anti-slavery views and asked for affiliation with the new denomination. The Methodist Church then recognized the small group as the North Carolina Conference. In 1875 this North Carolina Conference divided to form the East North Carolina and the Western North Carolina Conferences which officially came back into the M. P. Church two years later when the Methodist Church merged with it. However, a few ministers and churches of the East North Carolina and Western North Carolina Conferences either felt unwelcome in or were unwilling to return to the M. P. Church, and they proceeded to form the DEEP RIVER CONFERENCE. The Deep River Conference continued until about 1891 when it dissolved and most of its churches entered the Blue Ridge Conference (ME).

As time passed, the North Carolina Conference was the only one in the M. P. Church to maintain its own official paper. It published a paper called the Watchman and Harbinger from 1862 to the end of the Civil War. Then in 1873 it maintained the Central Protestant for eighteen years. From 1894 to 1939 Our Church Record (Methodist Protestant Herald after 1910), a weekly, was published in Greensboro. J. F. McCULLOCH, former president of ADRIAN COLLEGE, Michigan, was the able editor of the paper for forty years. His proclaimed purpose in becoming editor was to educate the people to the need of a M. P. College in North Carolina, and after thirty years he achieved his goal. The paper merged with the North Carolina Christian Advocate at unification in 1939.

The North Carolina Conference gave much attention to education. During the early years it officially approved schools in other states which had M. P. connections. Between 1855 and 1860 the conference projected JAMESTOWN FEMALE COLLEGE, but unfortunately it was destroyed by fire in 1861. YADKIN COLLEGE, ten miles west of Lexington, began as an academy about 1853 and was chartered as a college in 1861. At the time it had about eighty boarding students. When the war began sixty students entered the Confederate Army. After the war the school resumed operations, and in spite of debts and difficulties it carried on until 1924.

In 1921 High Point gave eighty acres of land and $100,000 in money for a M. P. college. ROBERT M. ANDREWS, a member of the conference, led in raising additional funds, and was then chosen as the first president of HIGH POINT COLLEGE which opened in 1924. The college proved to be an asset to the conference. In 1938 it was said that practically every young man entering the conference in recent years had been educated at High Point College. Today High Point College is supported by the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA and NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCES. It has an endowment of more than $2,000,000, a plant valued at about $6,000,000, and over 1,200 students.

Largely through the efforts of the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the North Carolina Conference, the Methodist Protestant Children's Home was opened at Denton, N. C., in 1910, and moved to High Point in 1913. It was the only such institution in the M. P. Church. At unification in 1939 arrangements were made to close the home and transfer its ninety-seven children to the homes of the two North Carolina Conferences of The Methodist Church at Winston-Salem and Raleigh.

WILLIAM H. WILLS, an outstanding minister, served the North Carolina Conference both as secretary and president (several times), and in 1867 was elected president of the M. P. General Conference.

In 1937 the North Carolina Conference reported 224 churches, 80 ministers, 30,604 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $1,775,900. At the time of unification it was one of the largest conferences in the Methodist Protestant connection.

ALBEE GODBOLD

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was created by the 1836 GENERAL CONFERENCE. It was set off from the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE at the meeting of the latter in Petersburg, Va., in January 1837, and was organized at that time with Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH presiding. The appointments of the North Carolina Conference were made separately from those of the Virginia Conference at the Petersburg session. The new conference began with five districts, Raleigh, Newbern, Roanoke, Danville, and Salisbury; forty-four charges, and 15,062 white and 3,666 colored members. In January 1838, the conference met at GREENSBORO, N. C., with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. The territory of the conference was North Carolina east of the Blue Ridge Mountains, except the extreme northeastern counties which continued in the Virginia Conference until 1894, and the southern segment of the state including Wilmington, CHARLOTTE, and Lincolnton, part of which continued in the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE until 1850, and the remainder until 1870.

Though the North Carolina Conference was not organized until forty years after the General Conference created annual conferences with definite geographical boundaries, the first conference of Methodist preachers following the organization of the M. E. Church at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE was conducted by Bishops ASHURY and COKE in April 1785, at the home of MAJOR GREEN HILL near Louisburg within the bounds of what is now the North Carolina Conference. (See NORTH CAROLINA for beginnings of Methodism in the state.) The Hill House is now a national Methodist Historic Shrine. There were Methodist societies near the Virginia line in eastern North Carolina as early as 1774, and there was a North Carolina Circuit by 1776. By the time the North Carolina Conference was formed in 1837 there were nearly 30,000 white and about 12,000 colored members of the M. E. Church in the state.

From its beginning the North Carolina Conference cooperated with the Virginia Conference in supporting the Richmond Christian Advocate and RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE (chartered in 1830). A few years later when GREENSBORO COLLEGE was opened (1846), the two conferences joined in its support. But in time the North Carolina Conference took steps to make itself independent of Virginia. In 1855 the North Carolina Christian Advocate was launched. Then in 1856 when relations between the two conferences had become strained over a bitter quarrel between W. A. SMITH, president of Randolph-Macon College, and CHARLES F. DEEMS, a professor at the University of North Carolina, the North Carolina Conference withdrew support from Randolph-Macon and accepted Normal College (Trinity) near HIGH POINT as its college for men, and the Virginia Conference dropped Greensboro College.

The North Carolina Conference adhered South after the division of 1844, and thereafter it grew steadily. In 1860 it reported 28,822 white and 12,043 colored members. In 1890 the conference was divided to form the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. In the preceding year the North Carolina Conference had reported fourteen districts, 212 charges, and 91,975 members.

Throughout its history education has been a major concern of the North Carolina Conference. In the 1890's reports of the conference board of education urged assessments on the churches to support the current budget of Trinity College which moved to DURHAM in 1892. In 1889 the conference had voted to transfer the college to RALEIGH, but in the end Durham outbid the capital city. JULIAN S. CARR gave sixty acres in Durham for a campus, and WASHINGTON DUKE donated $85,000 in cash. In 1896 Duke contributed an additional $100,000 to the college on condition that it open its doors to women as well as men. A committee of ladies appointed by Trinity College alumni in the conference then drew up a resolution commending Duke for recognizing "womanhood in her influence and possibilities" and honoring "her by proposing to open to her the equal opportunities of advancement in education and distinction with man." In the same year, on recommendation of a group which included JOHN C. KILGO, president of Trinity, the conference adopted a resolution objecting to free tuition at the state university on the grounds that it was taxing the many to educate the few.

Among the schools which had either the support or commendation of the North Carolina Conference before the turn of the century were LITTLETON FEMALE COLLEGE, Wesleyan Female College at Murfreesboro, LOUISBURG FEMALE COLLEGE, and academies at Burlington and Jonesboro.

In 1924 JAMES B. DUKE, son of Washington, gave $40,000,000 to Trinity College with the understanding that it would become DUKE UNIVERSITY, whereupon a new 5,600-acre campus, dominated by a magnificent Gothic style chapel, was developed. Today Duke, with a plant valued at $126,000,000, an annual budget of $70,000,000, an endowment of $60,000,000, a library of 2,000,000 volumes, about 1,000 professors, 8,000 students, and a strong Divinity School that offers graduate as well as seminary degrees, is one of the great universities of the land.

In the 1950's the North Carolina Conference established two new educational institutions within its bounds, METHODIST COLLEGE at Fayetteville and NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Rocky Mount, laying assessments of some $5,000,000 on the churches to launch them. Methodist College now has a plant valued at about $7,000,000, an endowment of about $500,000, and 1,000 students, while the corresponding figures for the other school are $6,000,000, $210,000, and 700 students.

In recent years the North Carolina Conference has apportioned annually some $500,000 to be raised for its college sustaining fund. The money is distributed to Duke Divinity School, and Bennett, Greensboro, High Point, Louisburg, Methodist, and North Carolina Wesleyan Colleges. The conference helps to maintain WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at eighteen educational institutions in the state.

In 1899 the North Carolina Conference established an orphanage at Raleigh. Now called the Methodist Home for Children, it has a plant valued at $2,000,000 and is ministering to more than 200 children per year. The conference maintains a Methodist Retirement Home at Durham with a capacity of about 200.

One member of the conference has been elected bishop, JOHN C. KILGO (1910).

The North Carolina Conference came to unification in 1939 with seven districts, 226 charges, 132,735 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $9,268,655. The conference merged with parts of the BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE (ME) and the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MP) in 1939 to form the North Carolina Conference of The Methodist Church. Some of the ministers and churches of the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (CJ) were received into the North Carolina Conference in 1968 as the former was merged with the overlying conferences of the Southeastern Jurisdiction.

In 1970 the North Carolina Conference reported eleven districts, 522 pastoral charges, 619 ministers, 211,089 members, and property valued at $96,889,398.

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (CJ) was organized at Union Chapel, Alexander County, not far from Statesville, N. C., on Jan. 14, 1869, with Bishop EDWARD F. AMES presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the Virginia and North Carolina Mission Conference which had been organized at Portsmouth, Va., Jan. 3, 1867 with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. The territory of the new conference was the state of NORTH CAROLINA. The conference at the outset included both Negro and white ministers and churches. It began with one district, twelve charges, and 2,859 members. At its first session appointments were made to sixteen charges. In 1879 the white work of the North Carolina Conference was merged with the Asheville District of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE to form the Southern Central Conference (called Blue Ridge Conference beginning in 1881). By 1900 the North Carolina Conference had four districts, Greensboro, Western, Wilmington, and Winston; 68 charges, and 10,289 members.

The North Carolina Conference emphasized education. In 1909 each district superintendent in his report to the conference declared that he had stressed the need of education and the importance of patronizing Methodist schools. They praised BENNETT COLLEGE and urged the conference to support it. The conference also supported GANNON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in Atlanta.

On reentering North Carolina after the Civil War, the M. E. Church started several schools for Negroes (see BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE for white schools), two of which have survived—Allen High School in ASHEVILLE and Bennett College in Greensboro. Bennett College was founded in 1873 by Negro leaders during the time that the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY was giving assistance. The WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the denomination built homes for girls on the campus, and in 1926 the school was reorganized as a college for women. Bennett has become an outstanding institution with full accreditation. Today it has a plant valued at more than $4,000,000, an endowment of $2,000,000, and nearly 700 students.

An interested couple from NEW YORK started a primary school for Negroes in Asheville about 1885. The Woman's Home Missionary Society became interested in it and in time the school was accredited by the state. In 1945 the name was changed to Allen High School. Today it has a modern plant and its enrollment of 130 is drawn from several states and from Africa.

The North Carolina Conference entered the CENTRAL JURISDICTION of The Methodist Church in 1939 with four districts, sixty-three charges, and 13,994 members. At its last session in 1964, the conference reported four districts, 93 charges, 63 ministers, 14,750 members, churches and parsonages valued at $3,989,407, and $634,072 raised for all purposes during the year.

In 1955 the East Tennessee Conference (CJ) requested the North Carolina Conference to consider merging the two bodies, but nothing came of the proposal. In 1964 when the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE (CJ) was being absorbed by the overlying conferences of the Northeastern Jurisdiction, the Virginia churches of that conference were attached to the North Carolina Conference (CJ), and the name of the latter was changed to the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. The territory of the enlarged conference included North Carolina and all of Virginia except the southwestern counties which remained in the East Tennessee Conference (CJ). The North Carolina-Virginia Conference was organized at Greensboro, N. C., Aug. 11, 1964 with Bishop CHARLES F. GOLDEN presiding. The next year the conference reported five districts, 129 charges, 19,025 members, and property valued at $7,137,112.

In 1968 the North Carolina-Virginia Conference was merged with the overlying conferences of the Southeastern Jurisdiction in Virginia and North Carolina. In its last year the North Carolina-Virginia Conference reported four districts, Central, Eastern, Virginia, and Western; 98 charges, 88 ministers, 18,706 members, property valued at $7,637,698, and $670,216 raised for all purposes during the year.

NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Rocky Mount, N. C., is the result of a movement initiated in the North Carolina conferences to build two new senior colleges during the last part of the twentieth century. The proposal of Rocky Mount citizens to raise $2,000,000 and to provide a campus and $50,000 annually for operating expenses to match similar amounts from the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was accepted by the conference in May 1956. The college was chartered on Oct. 25, 1956, and construction of the new campus started in 1959. The college was admitted to membership in the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges in 1966 and accredited by the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church in 1967. Degrees offered are the B.A. and B.S. The governing board has twenty-four trustees recommended by the board, nominated by the conference Board of Education, and confirmed by the conference.

NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE, Naperville, Illinois, U.S.A., began as Plainfield College in Plainfield, Ill., founded in 1861 by the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. The college moved to its present site in Naperville in 1870 when residents of the town raised $25,000 and donated eight acres of land.

On May 17, 1870, the cornerstone of the present Old Main Building was laid, and the following fall 120 students and six faculty members began classes. After moving to Naperville, the school became known as North Western College and continued under that name until 1926, when the present name of North Central was adopted.

In 1967 the campus encompassed fifty-three acres, fifteen buildings, and had an endowment of $3 million and total assets of nearly $9 million.

The college grants the degrees of B.A., B.M., and B.M.E. The course of study is in the liberal arts with majors developed in twenty-two departments. A Mid-Winter Study and Research Term, freeing the month of January from the routine of classroom study, and a core curriculum are special study programs.

North Central College has a governing board of thirty trustees, one-third of whom are elected from annual conferences, three from the alumni association and the remainder at large.

The College and Seminary Library has 100,000 volumes. The present student enrollment is 865 students with sixty-eight faculty members. Its alumni have contributed in all areas of life—in business, industry, education, religion, military, government service, medicine, law, journalism and social services.

NORTH DAKOTA, population 610,648 in 1970, is in the central part of the nation and is bounded by CANADA on the north, MINNESOTA on the east, SOUTH DAKOTA on the south, and MONTANA on the west. It was a part of the LOUISIANA Purchase in 1803. Its 70,665 square miles contain no mountains or forests. Frenchmen from Canada were the first white people in the region. In 1804-05 Lewis and Clark wintered at Fort Madan in what is now North Dakota. American settlers began moving into the area about 1850. At first they had trouble with the Indians, but by 1864 the Red men had been driven to the Bad Lands west of the Missouri River. In 1861 Dakota Territory (including both North and South Dakota) was formed. In 1880 the Great Northern Railway entered the state and in time it was extended to the west coast. Settlers then came in large numbers, and in 1889 North Dakota was admitted to the Union as a state. Ninety per cent of the state is farm land, and wheat is the chief crop. The state now produces oil, and with the development of water power manufacturing has become a part of its economy.

The 1860 GENERAL CONFERENCE, alert to Methodism's opportunity, made Dakota Territory a part of the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE. In the same year the Iowa body sent S. W. INGHAM as missionary into what is now South Dakota. In 1871 the same conference sent James Gurley to the North Pacific Mission which included North Dakota and part of Minnesota. At Fargo in that year Gurley conducted the first Methodist service in North Dakota. The next year John Webb, Gurley's successor on the mission, organized a Methodist society in Fargo, and in 1874 the first Methodist church building was erected at a cost of $1,200, the site for the edifice being donated by the Northern Pacific Railroad. A second Methodist society was organized at Grand Forks in 1873, and by 1876 it had erected a church.

In 1877 the North Dakota work was attached to the Red River District of the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE with Joseph B. Starkey as presiding elder. Starkey made Fargo his headquarters, and under his leadership the work expanded rapidly. In 1884 the North Dakota Mission was formed by dividing the Minnesota Conference, and in 1886 the mission was elevated to the status of an annual conference. In the next thirty years the work grew rapidly. (See NORTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE.)

In 1876 Methodist work among the Germans in North Dakota was begun by the Northwest German Conference. Many of the German missions and churches were short-lived, and in 1924 when the NORTHERN GERMAN CONFERENCE (to which the North Dakota churches then belonged) was merged, there were only two German charges in the state to be received into the North Dakota Conference. Several Norwegian Methodist churches were also organized in North Dakota, the most prominent being what is now Wesley Church in Hillsboro which made the first contribution ($2,000) to the Norwegian Methodist theological seminary, Evanston, Ill. (See NORWEGIAN AND DANISH CONFERENCE.) When the Norwegian and Danish Conference was merged with the overlying English-speaking conferences in 1943, it had five charges in the state which entered the North Dakota Conference.

In 1892 North Dakota Methodism projected Red River Valley University at Wahpeton. In 1906 the school was moved to Grand Forks adjacent to the state university and was called Wesley College. The conference gradually severed connection with the college, but it still elects trustees to the Wesley Center of Religion at the university. Today there is no Methodist college in North Dakota. The conference supports Kenmare Deaconess Hospital at Kenmare, Wesley Camp near Valley City, and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the several state institutions of higher learning.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had ninety-three pastoral charges, 141 ministers, 25,219 members, and property valued at $12,156,312 in North Dakota.

NORTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE was organized at Grand Forks on Oct. 14, 1886 with Bishop WILLIAM L. HARRIS presiding. The conference superseded the North Dakota Mission which had been formed at Fargo on Oct. 2, 1884. The boundaries of the conference included only NORTH DAKOTA. At the beginning the conference had two districts, Fargo and Grand Forks, and there were forty-seven charges and 2,341 members. (See NORTH DAKOTA for an account of the beginning of Methodism in the state.) By 1888 some eighteen new churches had been organized. In the next three decades aid from the Board of Home Missions built many churches. In 1910 the conference had four districts, 150 charges, and 9,535 members. Thereafter the membership grew a little, but the number of districts and pastoral charges decreased. In 1939 there were three districts, seventy-seven charges and 16,065 members.

About 1900 there was a schism in the North Dakota Conference over the doctrine of HOLINESS. J. G. Morrison, leader of the holiness group, finally joined the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE taking with him a few pastors and local preachers. A Laymen's Holiness Association which had been organized also went to the Nazarene Church. By 1940 the Nazarenes had thirty-two churches in the state with a membership of 1,127, many of them former Methodists.

Interested in education from the beginning, the North Dakota Conference projected a college in 1892, but it was short-lived. While there is no Methodist college in the state today, the conference commends DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, at Mitchell, S. D. to its people, and it supports the Wesley Center of Religion at the University of North Dakota in Grand Forks. Also, it maintains a strong WESLEY FOUNDATION program at the university, at North Dakota State University at Fargo, and at other colleges.

In 1920 the conference assumed responsibility for a hospital at Mandan, which in 1926 was named the Methodist Deaconess Hospital. In 1958 the nurses home at the hospital was remodeled and became the North Dakota Methodist Home for the Aged. In 1964 the hospital and home were sold to the Heartview Foundation, and they have now become a center for treatment of alcoholism. A hospital at Kenmare was purchased in 1923, and it is now known as the Kenmare Deaconess Hospital. In 1951 the conference established Wesley Acres Camp on what is called Lake Ashtabula near Valley City.

Long a part of an episcopal area composed of MINNESOTA and the two Dakotas, the Dakota Methodists petitioned the 1952 GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church for an area made up of the two Dakota Conferences, and it was so ordered. The episcopal residence is in Aberdeen, S. D.

In regard to total membership, North Dakota Methodism has fared better than the state population. Between 1930 and 1950 the state population decreased ten percent, but in that time the membership of the North Dakota Conference increased from 14,032 to 15,067. Between 1950 and 1960 the population of the state increased two percent, while the Methodist membership grew to 20,317, an increase of thirty-five percent.

Following merger of the E.U.B. and Methodist Conferences, the North Dakota Conference reported three districts in 1970, ninety-three charges, 141 ministers, 25,219 members, property valued at $12,156,312, and a total amount raised for all purposes of $2,119,994.

Wesley Acres Camp is situated on Bald Hill Creek, about twenty miles northwest of Valley City, N. D. It was started in 1951 on forty acres, an oasis of American elm and other trees in a prairie valley. The camp has facilities for housing and feeding over 200, a large central assembly, small prayer chapel, facilities for groups of forty to fifty in the winterized section, modern plumbing, heated swimming pool. Open the year round, Wesley Acres serves the North Dakota Conference and area for youth camps, school of missions, pastor's school, family camp, ashram site, and retreats.

NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE (MES) was created during the session of the GEORGIA CONFERENCE at Americus, Nov. 28 to Dec. 5, 1866, Bishop HOLLAND N. MC-TYRE presiding. The 1866 GENERAL CONFERENCE authorized the division of Georgia Methodism into two conferences, provided the Georgia Conference could agree on a dividing line. After prolonged debate the brethren voted for a dividing line that ran generally east and west a little north of MACON. The division put nearly two-thirds of the state in the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, and almost exactly two-thirds of the church members in the North Georgia Conference. At the close of the 1866 session of the Georgia Conference, Bishop McTyre read out the appointments to the North Georgia and South Georgia Conferences. The next year North Georgia met in ATLANTA and South Georgia in SAVANNAH. At that time the one reported 38,211 members and the other 19,626. (See GEORGIA for beginnings of Methodism in the state and an account of the Georgia Conference.)

The North Georgia Conference grew rapidly. By 1875 it had 58,520 members and by 1900 some 98,622. Growth was due in part to aggressive missionary work within the bounds of the conference. In 1886 the conference had twenty-four missions, laying assessments on the churches for their support.

In 1871 the Methodist Children's Home was established at Norcross and was later moved to Decatur. The conference cooperated with the South Georgia Conference in supporting the Wesleyan Christian Advocate and WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Macon. The journals show that as the years passed the North Georgia Conference commended or gave support to a number of schools and colleges within its bounds which existed for longer or shorter periods of time. However, its principal institutions of learning were EMORY COLLEGE which was established at Oxford in 1836 and LAGRANGE COLLEGE for women (now coeducational) which began as an academy in 1831.

In 1910 the Conference expressed regret over the misunderstanding between the church and the board of trustees of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and the legal battle being waged for its control. After losing Vanderbilt, the M.E. Church, South voted to establish two universities, one east and one west of the Mississippi. In 1915 Emory College was moved to Atlanta and became the nucleus of EMORY UNIVERSITY, while the conference continued with an Emory (junior) College at Oxford. The CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY was inaugurated in connection with Emory University. Today Emory, with a total endowment in excess of $110,000,000, a plant valued at $60,000,000, a strong medical school, and Crawford W. Long Hospital, is an outstanding university.

Two junior colleges survived and continued to receive support from the North Georgia Conference. YOUNG HARRIS COLLEGE was established in the northern part of the state near the NORTH CAROLINA line in 1882, and REINHARDT COLLEGE began at Waleska in 1883. PAINE COLLEGE, which belongs in part to the C.M.E. CHURCH, was launched at Augusta in 1882 with the help of such Southern Methodist leaders as Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE, ATTICUS C. HAYGOOD, and WARREN A. CANDLER. Paine College has received some assistance from North Georgia Methodists.

The North Georgia Conference came to unification in 1939 with ten districts, 289 charges, 377 ministers, 156,400 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $8,232,995. Merging with parts of the Georgia Conferences of the M.E. and M.P. Churches, it then became the North Georgia Conference of The Methodist Church.

In more recent years the North Georgia Conference has developed, in addition to the educational and other institutions already mentioned, a camp called Clisson and the Wesley Woods Retirement Community in Atlanta. The conference raised $251,000 in 1968 for higher education, using part of it to help maintain nine WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at educational institutions.

In 1970 the North Georgia Conference reported eleven districts, 505 charges, 656 ministers, 216,940 members, property valued at $130,559,033, and $19,988,148 raised for all purposes during the year.

NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE borders on NEPAL and Tibet and comprises much of the section of Uttar Pradesh east and north of the Ganges. The conference covers 32,938 square miles and has a population of over 55,000,000.

Methodist work was begun at BAREILLY, a principal city of the conference, by the Rev. and Mrs. WILLIAM BUTLER in 1856. After the mutiny of 1857, work was started quickly in other nearby centers—in Budaun, Moradabad, Shahjahanpur, and Bijnor. William Butler was assisted by able co-workers, including JAMES L. HUMPHREY, JAMES M. THOBURN, JAMES W. WAUGH, JAMES H. MESSMORE, E. W. PARKER, and CLARA SWAIN. These founded some of the earliest Methodist institutions in INDIA, among them the Parker Intermediate College at Moradabad, and the Messmore Intermediate College at Pauri, as well as the Lodhipur School and orphanage at Shahjahanpur. The Bareilly Theological Seminary is the oldest theological college started by any agency in India.

A missionary conference was organized in 1864, and this became an annual conference in 1874. There are presently 57,884 on the conference roll and forty-five ordained pastors and seventy-three other workers are reported. The conference has fourteen schools with 268 teachers. Its districts are: Bareilly, Badaun, Kumaun, Shahjahanpur. Bareilly, where Methodist work in this region began, now has a population above 254,409. Kumaun, on the southern edge of the Himalayas, is an important summer resort area to which many people flee in May and June when the heat on the plains becomes most intense. During British rule Naini Tal was the summer capital of the United Provinces, now called Uttar Pradesh. The Methodist Church maintained there quality high schools for many years, Wellesley for girls and Philander Smith for boys, but sold them to the government after independence. Almora in the Kumaun District is now the chief Methodist center in the Himalayas with an intermediate college (Ramsey) and a higher secondary school for girls (Adams), a leprosarium, the oldest in India, and with a self-supporting church of about a thousand members, full and preparatory. There are also Methodist Intermediate Colleges in Ranikhet and Dwarahat and Pithoragarh in Bidaun District.

The Budaun District and Shahjahanpur are the other two Districts of the Conference. Shahjahanpur is headquarters of the civil district of that name and a railroad junction 768 miles from CALCUTTA, and 987 from BOMBAY. It was founded during the reign of Shah Jahan, who built the Taj Mahal at Agra, and for whom the city is named.

The Lodhipur Institute, in the suburb by that name, is a school of technology sponsored by the Division of World Missions. It has been subsidized by the Ford Foundation. Sitapur, headquarters of a civil district and a railway junction, has a primary boys boarding school and a girls junior high school.

NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE was the result of the first division of Methodism in the state of INDIANA into two conferences. The northern half of the state had belonged to the missionary district in 1832 when the INDIANA CONFERENCE was organized, but by 1844 it had grown to six districts with a combined membership of 27,563.

Thus the North Indiana Conference was organized at Fort Wayne (where the Maumee Mission had been established only fourteen years before) on Sept. 24, 1844. Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH presided, and Bishop L. L. HAMLINE was present. The new conference consisted of 105 ministers (eighty-nine under direction of eight presiding elders, with four under special appointment and four superannuated) and more than 27,500 members, and was defined on the south boundary by the National Road through INDIANAPOLIS.

With Methodism continuing to grow, another division of the annual conferences was made in 1852. The NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE comprised the northwest quadrant of the state and the new North Indiana Conference consisted of the northeast section. The new boundary of the North Indiana Conference "included all of northeastern Indiana, bounded north by Michigan, east by Ohio, south by the National Road and west by the Michigan Road as far north as South Bend, thence down the St. Joseph River to the Michigan state line, also the town of Logansport, all the towns on the National Road east of Indianapolis, and so much of the city of Indianapolis as lies north of Market Street and east of Meridian Street." The only major boundary change, from 1844 until 1968, occurred in 1868 when Indianapolis and its vicinity became part of the South East Indiana Conference and the Marion County line became part of the southern boundary.

Several men were prominent in early North Indiana history. ALLEN WILEY, though not a member of the conference assisted Bishop Waugh in making appointments at the first session in 1844, and the North Indiana Conference took special note of his death five years later. Joseph Tarkington, S. R. Brenton and S. C. Cooper gave noted service at various tasks and appointments in the early years of the conference. THOMAS BOWMAN first became a member of the annual conference in 1864, several years after he was elected president of INDIANA ASBURY UNIVERSITY, and was a leader of the conference until his election to the episcopacy in 1872.

Though Indiana Asbury University was the major educational concern for the entire state, it had close identification with the North Indiana Conference via the presidency and various faculty members who were members of this annual conference. Other schools were encouraged by the annual conference. Fort Wayne College had great support and encouragement from the conference as it struggled to gain academic status and financial solvency, but it finally transferred its debt and property to Taylor University, an institution founded by the Local Preachers' Association of the M.E. Church. In 1893 the school was rechartered and moved to its present location in Upland. Although Taylor University has never had any official relationship to The Methodist Church, the conference has recognized and commended it from time to time.

A similar enterprise, named Whitewater Female College and Academy, was undertaken at Centerville in 1848. In 1851 it was made co-educational and was supported by the Indiana Conference as well. With a spotted history of educational and financial success, it disappeared from the academic scene by the mid 1860's.

Women in the North Indiana Conference were quick to take advantage of the inception of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY and the later WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY. A year after its organization in 1869, there was a W.F.M.S. in Coshen. It was in 1882, two years after national organization had occurred, that the W.H.M.S. was organized in the Annual Conference. When the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE organized in 1940, the merged women's work consisted of 440 societies and 21,000 charter members. Much of the leadership for the work of the North Central Jurisdiction has come from women of the North Indiana Conference. Three have been presidents of the Jurisdiction—Mrs. Julia Parr Nafziger, Mrs. J. N. Rodeheaver, and Mrs. D. G. Woolpert. By 1968 the conference reported 391 Woman's Societies and sixty-one Wesleyan Service Guilds with a combined membership of 22,688.

Within two months of its creation in Cleveland in 1889, an EPWORTH LEAGUE charter was requested for the Ft. Wayne district, and in two years all districts of the conference had such organizations. Youth work, through the Epworth League and its successor, the METHODIST FELLOWSHIP, has shown a record of increased youth participation throughout its history. Of monumental influence is the Epworth Forest Institute grounds at Lake Webster, begun in 1924, where "thousands, whether youth or sage, have found a station on the way of their eternal pilgrimage." Thousands of youth over the almost half-century of its existence have been influenced by it, and the annual conference has invested time, energy, and repeated financial resources to perfect this contribution to youth ministry. Though open to a variety of programs and opportunities for all ages, it remains a stable setting along the lakeshore where young men and young women (as well as others) may find the challenge of Christian commitment.

North Indiana Methodism has viewed with pride the growth of Parkview Memorial Hospital in Fort Wayne, the Methodist Memorial Home for the Aged at Warren and the Bashor Children's Home at Coshen. Each has had a distinctive ministry to offer. Also, Neighborhood House in Fort Wayne and Goodwill Industries in the same community dealt with Metropolitan concerns and were related to the Annual Conference.

At the time of union in 1968 the North Indiana Conference numbered 372 ministers, 408 charges and 117,047 members, with property valued at $62,962,341.

NORTH IOWA CONFERENCE was organized at CEDAR RAPIDS, June 22, 1949 with Bishop CHARLES W. BRASHARES presiding. It was formed by merging the UPPER IOWA and NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCES. Its territory included approximately the north half of the state. Since the Northwest Iowa Conference appeared in 1872, while the Upper Iowa body was created in 1856, the North Iowa Conference claimed historical continuity from 1856. The new conference began with eight districts—Algona, Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Dubuque, Fort Dodge, Sheldon, Sioux City, and Waterloo. It had 120,368 members in 429 churches.

The North Iowa Conference supported two strong colleges, CORNELL at Mt. Vernon and MORNINGSIDE at Sioux City. It had two hospitals, St. Luke's Methodist at Cedar Rapids and Methodist at Sioux City. The latter coordinated its work with the Lutheran Hospital in Sioux City in 1966 to form the St. Luke's Medical Center, the conference giving approval and support. The conference had three retirement homes, Friendship Haven at Fort Dodge, Methodist Manor at Storm Lake, and Meth-wick Manor at Cedar Rapids.

For some years the North and South Iowa Conferences supported Hillcrest Children's Services at Cedar Rapids and the Iowa Methodist Services to Youth at DES MOINES. In 1968 the two organizations coordinated their services under the direction of one board of directors, the new name to be Hillcrest Services to Children and Youth. The work was to be directed from new headquarters at Dubuque. The conference maintains three camps for youth.

The North Iowa Conference supported jointly with the South Iowa Conference WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at Drake University and the three state universities. The Hawkeye, a monthly publication for Methodists in the Iowa Area, was published jointly by the two conferences. In 1968 the paper had a circulation of 33,000.

In 1968 the North Iowa Conference had 418 ministers, 277 pastoral charges, 152,082 members, and property valued at $61,717,202. In that year the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE voted that in June 1969, the conferences in Iowa should merge into one conference to be known as the Iowa Conference.

NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was organized at Water Valley, Miss., Nov. 30, 1870 with Bishop DAVID S. DOGGETT presiding. It was formed by merging portions of the MEMPHIS, ALABAMA, and MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES. At the beginning the conference had twelve districts, ninety charges, and 21,757 white and fifty-eight colored members.

Organized Methodism first entered North Mississippi in 1819 when the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE appointed EBENEZER HEARN to the Buttahatchie Circuit which extended into Mississippi from ALABAMA. Hearn preached in Columbus, Miss., as early as 1820, and the first Methodist society with about ten members was organized there in 1823 by Wiley Ledbetter. In 1820 the name of the work was changed to the Marion Circuit, and it became an appointment in the Mississippi Conference. In the next ten years the Marion Circuit grew from seventy-two to 469 white plus fifty-two Negro members.

In 1832 the Alabama Conference was carved out of the Mississippi Conference, its territory including Alabama, West FLORIDA, and the eastern tier of counties in Mississippi. In the same year a series of government settlements with the Indians was concluded, and all of northern Mississippi was then opened to settlers. Thereafter Methodist work in the region grew rapidly. In 1840 the GENERAL CONFERENCE created the Memphis Conference which included a large part of north Mississippi. This meant that three annual conferences then had parts of what is now the North Mississippi Conference within their boundaries. In establishing the North Mississippi Conference in 1870, the General Conference was seeking to make conference boundaries conform to state lines in so far as possible. Since 1870 Mississippi has been divided between the North Mississippi and the Mississippi Conferences.

From the beginning the North Mississippi Conference was interested in education and it rendered service to the people of its region in a period when public education was inadequate. The minutes refer to a dozen or more academies and colleges in the early years which were either owned or patronized by the conference. For a time the conference favored the position taken in the EPISCOPAL ADDRESS of 1874 that the denomination seek to establish a whole system of schools. At its first session in 1870 the conference commended several academies as worthy of Methodist patronage and it accepted Verona Female College as a conference institution. In 1879 the conference accepted a school at Grenada which was chartered in 1882 as Grenada Collegiate Institute. After 1890 the conference resolutions and reports on education refer only to the support of institutions of higher learning.

The North Mississippi Conference supported VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY which was established in 1875, the minutes proudly noting that two of its ministers and two of its well known laymen were serving as Vanderbilt trustees. The conference joined the Mississippi Conference in 1888 in projecting a first-rate Methodist college in the state, the plan being realized when MILLSAPS COLLEGE in JACKSON was chartered in 1890. Two North Mississippi Conference preachers who served as presidents of Millsaps have been elevated to the episcopacy—WILLIAM B. MURRAH in 1910 and H. ELLIS FINGER, Jr. in 1964.

In 1875 the North Mississippi Conference had 394 churches; in 1900 there were 525. Between 1880 and 1900 the conference had a membership gain of fifty-five percent, though the population of its area increased only twenty-nine percent during that time. In 1870 there were only fourteen parsonages in the entire conference. A few years later the women in the churches organized the Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society and by 1900 there were 121 parsonages in the conference. From 1875 to 1900, the giving to foreign missions increased from less than $1,500 to over $9,000 per year.

In 1867 a plan to merge the M.P. Church with the M.E. Church, South failed, but the next year twenty-two ministers and 1,300 members of the former church in north Mississippi joined the Memphis Conference of the latter church. Even so Methodist Protestantism survived in the region and at unification in 1939 about eight M.P. churches came into the North Mississippi Conference of The Methodist Church. The North Mississippi Conference brought six districts, 163 charges, and 75,137 members to the merger in 1939.

Today the North Mississippi Conference supports a number of institutions both inside and outside its boundaries, such as the Methodist Hospital in MEMPHIS, the Methodist Home and Hospital in NEW ORLEANS, the Methodist Children's Home in JACKSON, the North Mississippi Methodist Agency for the Retarded, Lake Stephens Methodist Camp near Oxford, and Traceway Manor Home for the aged which was established at Tupelo in 1967. It joins the Mississippi Conference in strong support of Millsaps College and the Mississippi Methodist Advocate which is published in Jackson.

In 1970 the North Mississippi Conference had six districts, Cleveland, Greenwood, New Albany, Sardis, Starkville, and Tupelo. There were 243 ministers, 220 charges, 77,361 members, and property valued at $34,456,337.

NORTH NEBRASKA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Fremont, Neb., Sept. 14, 1881 with Bishop RANDOLPH S. FOSTER presiding. It was formed by dividing the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE. Its territory included northeast NEBRASKA; the Platte River was the southern boundary. Since OMAHA was north of the river, it fell in the North Nebraska Conference. This caused ill feeling because many felt that Omaha as the state's largest city should have remained in the Nebraska Conference. At the outset the new conference had two districts, Omaha and Norfolk, thirty-six charges and 2,065 members.

In 1913 the North Nebraska Conference was absorbed by the Nebraska Conference. At its last session in 1912 the conference reported four districts, Grand Island, Neligh, Norfolk, and Omaha; 127 charges, 169 churches, and 15,987 members.

NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Norwalk on Sept. 30, 1840 with Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE. The territory of the North Ohio Conference at the beginning was north central and northwest OHIO. The conference began with six districts, fifty-four charges, and 24,148 members.

In 1856 the North Ohio Conference was divided, the northwest part of the state then being designated as the DELAWARE CONFERENCE. This reduced the membership of the North Ohio Conference from 29,093 to 14,820. The conference then continued intact until 1912 when it was merged with the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE to form the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE.

In 1853 the North Ohio Conference was supporting OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and Baldwin Institute. It voted that year to accept ownership and control of Ohio Wesleyan Female College, and it agreed to accept Mansfield Female Collegiate Institute, provided the conference would not be required to raise any part of the funds necessary to purchase the premises or to erect buildings. At the conference session that year the members pledged over $1,300 for the Metropolitan Church in Washington, D. C.

In 1873 the North Ohio Conference voted to join the CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE in supporting the "Lakeside Camp meeting grounds" (see LAKESIDE), and elected ten trustees to serve with a like number from the other conference to control the property and direct the activities.

In 1910 the conference journal showed that St. Luke's Hospital had been rendering service in Cleveland for two years, that the Old Ladies' Home at Elyria had had a good year, and that Ohio Methodism wished to establish an orphanage.

In 1911 the North Ohio Conference reported five districts, 168 charges, 40,436 members, and property valued at $2,491,900.

The North Ohio Conference merged with the East Ohio Conference in 1912 to form the North-East Ohio Conference.

NORTH SHIELDS CHAPEL DISPUTE was an important incident in the development of the connectional principle in British Methodism. In 1783 the lease of the old chapel in North Shields, Northumberland, ran out, and the question of a new site led to the formation of two strongly opposed parties. Each group secured a site and proceeded to the erection of a chapel. One was known as the Milbourn Place or Upper Chapel, and the other as the Bank or Lower Chapel. The issue, which was the settlement of both chapels on the Conference Plan, came before the 1787 and subsequent conferences. WESLEY's idea was that both chapels being secured to the Conference should be served, one by the preachers from the Newcastle Circuit, and the other from the Sunderland Circuit. In 1788 Wesley preached in the morning in the Lower Chapel and in the evening in the Upper Chapel. The dispute continued, however, with bitter correspondence turning upon the refusal of the Milbourn Place trustees to settle the building on the Model Deed, or Conference Plan, as it was called. Ultimately, in April, 1789, Wesley wrote to the three preachers of the Newcastle Circuit with which the Upper Chapel was associated, instructing them that failing a satisfactory answer concerning the legal settlement of the chapel, they must cease to recognize it. A letter from Wesley to Edward Coates, the leader of this group, three weeks later, indicates their final refusal and the detachment of the Milbourn Place Chapel and those associated with it from the Conference. The Bank or Lower Chapel was settled in the approved way and continued in association with the Sunderland Circuit.

NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE began as the Trinity Conference (ME) which was carved out of the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1867. The name was changed to the North Texas Conference in 1874. The Trinity Conference was organized Oct. 9, 1867 at Sulphur Springs with Richard Lane presiding in the absence of Bishop HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE, who arrived later. Its boundaries included all of the present conference territory plus the remainder of northeast Texas lying above the Texas and Pacific Railroad from Texarkana to DALLAS. Among the forty-three preachers in 1867 were several who were well known or would become so: J. W. P. MCKENZIE, missionary to the Indians in OKLAHOMA before crossing to Texas; William F. Bates, pioneer in the western area; JOHN H. McLEAN, educator and church statesman; and William H. Hughes, a pioneer in Dallas County. The conference began with 7,495 white and 588 colored members, 128 local preachers, sixty-seven churches valued at $73,850, and fifty-five Sunday schools with 2,080 pupils. When the name was changed to North Texas in 1874, the conference met at Denton, Nov. 4-10, with Bishop McTyre presiding. It reported fifty pastoral charges and 18,229 members.

The North Texas Conference established a number of schools which served well in their day but none have survived. McKenzie College at Clarksville (1848-1868) was in its day one of the best colleges west of the Mississippi River. The Paris Female Institute began in the 1850's and operated for twenty years or more. Central College at Sulphur Springs began in 1883 and operated about ten years. Kidd-Key College at Sherman had its beginning as a high school. An outstanding institution for several decades, it became a casualty of the economic depression in 1935. Wesley College began at Terrell about 1909, was moved to Greenville, and closed in 1934.

Today the North Texas Conference has a share in the ownership of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY (it is owned by the South Central Jurisdiction of the church). Southern Methodist is the greatest church institution of higher learning in the southwest and the only one with the word Methodist in its name. Its PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, named for its benefactors J. J. PERKINS and his wife Lois C. Perkins, is a strong theological seminary with an endowment of more than $9,000,000.

Six members of the North Texas Conference have been elected bishops: JOHN M. MOORE (1918), CHARLES C. SELECMAN and WILLIAM C. MARTIN (1938), W. ANGIE SMITH and PAUL E. MARTIN (1944), and ALSIE H. CARLETON (1968). Five other bishops were members of the North Texas Conference at some time in their career though not at the time they were elevated to the episcopacy: SAMUEL R. HAY (1922), A. FRANK SMITH and PAUL B. KERN (1930), KENNETH W. COPELAND (1960), and LANCE WEBB (1964).

Dallas, the largest city in the North Texas Conference, is one of the strongest Methodist centers in the United States. In 1964 when the two Dallas districts were limited to Greater Dallas, they had a total of 87,188 members. The Highland Park Church in Dallas, with 9,202 members in 1968, is the largest congregation in the denomination if not the largest Methodist church in the world. In Dallas are to be found the offices of The Texas Methodist, a COKEBURY Regional Center, the residence of the bishop of the area, the Methodist Hospital, the Methodist Mission Home, the C. C. Young-Blanton Gardens retirement home, and Southern Methodist University and Perkins School of Theology. Southern Methodist, which opened in 1915, is becoming a great university. Its plant is valued at more than $50,000,000, and it has an endowment of $21,000,000, a library of 1,000,000 volumes, and a total enrollment of 14,000 students.

In 1968 the North Texas Conference contributed $150,000 to the Texas Methodist College Association and $85,000 for WESLEY FOUNDATION work in the state. In 1970 the conference had seven districts, 239 pastoral charges, 382 ministers, 151,632 members, and property valued at $8,187,075. The conference raised for all purposes that year $12,374,597.

NORTHCOTT, HARRY CLIFFORD (1890-), American bishop, was born in Exeter, Ontario, CANADA, Oct. 16, 1890, the son of James Harvey and Emily (Patey) Northcott. In 1919 he received his B.A. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and in 1921, his M.A. from the same institution. In 1952, Northwestern awarded him the S.T.D. He did graduate work at the University of Chicago and, in 1921 received the B.D. degree from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He received D.D. degrees from Garrett in 1941 and from ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1929. In 1953 Illinois Wesleyan awarded him the LL.D. degree.

He was married on June 14, 1917 to Florence M. Engle. They have one child.

He was ordained in the ROCK RIVER ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1918. He was pastor of the Adriel Church (CHICAGO) 1917-19 and, in 1919 served as chaplain in the U.S. Army. Other Chicago pastorates were: Parkside, 1921-23; Euclid Avenue, Oak Park, 1923-28. From 1928 until 1948 he served as pastor of the First Church, Champaign, Ill. This pastorate was concluded in July 1948, when he was elected bishop at the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE and assigned to the WISCONSIN Area.

He has served as a member of the Board of MISSIONS, the Board of EVANGELISM, the Commission on CHAPLAINS, the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation (Executive Committee), and the Commission on DEACONESS WORK (Chairman).

He was a delegate to the 1936, 1944 and 1948 GENERAL CONFERENCES and to the 1940, 1944 and 1948 Jurisdictional Conferences.

Bishop Northcott has served as trustee of Northwestern UNIVERSITY, LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY, Methodist Hospital Madison, Wis., and Bellin Memorial Hospital, Green Bay, Wis.

In 1950 he made a four-month official visitation of Africa and Europe, upon request of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS. He also made an official visitation of Southeast Asia in 1953 and, in 1957 was assigned to visit Latin America.

When the Council of Bishops visited the White House during their April meeting of 1959, Bishop Northcott received an especially warm greeting from President Eisenhower, who reminded him of the fact that he and Mrs. Northcott had been schoolmates during their school days in Abilene, Kan. Mrs. Northcott was then Florence M. Engle.

Among Bishop Northcott's writings was an article entitled: "If My Daughter Should Want to Marry a Catholic" which was printed in 1945 in the Christian Advocate, in Together, and, later, in pamphlet form. Fifty thousand reprints of this article were sold out very shortly after they were off the press.

In 1959 Bishop Northcott announced that he would retire in 1960 because of ill health. He presently resides in Evanston, Ill., and usually answers the roll call at the stated meetings of the Council of Bishops.

NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE was organized at Epworth Memorial Church, Cleveland, Sept. 17, 1912 with Bishop WILLIAM F. ANDERSON presiding. It was formed by merging the NORTH OHIO and EAST OHIO CONFERENCES. Comprising a little more than one-third of the state's area, it was at the time geographically the largest annual conference in OHIO, and incidentally the largest numerically in the M. E. Church. The conference began with twelve districts, 426 charges, 131,062 members, and property valued at $8,092,500.

When the North-East Ohio Conference was formed it had two colleges—BALDWIN-WALLACE and MT. UNION—and several service institutions within its bounds, while at the same time it was committed to assist in the support of others in the state. Baldwin-Wallace College, founded at Berea in 1845, now has a plant valued at more than $17,000,000, an endowment exceeding $4,000,000, and some 2,600 students. Mt. Union College, founded at Alliance in 1846, has an endowment of about $3,350,000, a plant valued at some $10,000,000, and about 1,300 students. The conference in 1914 pledged "earnest support and prayers" for AMERICAN UNIVERSITY which opened that year in WASHINGTON, D. C., and it commended the work of BOSTON, DREW, and GARRETT seminaries. The conference supports the WESLEY FOUNDATIONS in the state.

At the beginning the North-East Ohio Conference had the St. Luke's Hospital in Cleveland and the Methodist Home at Elyria which was then called the Elyria Old Ladies' Home. The conference has since established or acquired Cope Methodist Home at Sebring, Healthaven Nursing Home near Akron, and the Berea Methodist Children's Home.

The North-East Ohio Conference came to unification in 1939 with eight districts, 412 charges, 202,998 members, and property valued at $20,475,784. At that time it was merged with thirty-one charges representing about 9,000 members of the OHIO CONFERENCE (MP) to form the North-East Ohio Conference of The Methodist Church.

In 1964 the North-East Ohio Conference was designated as an episcopal area with the bishop's residence in Canton. FRANCIS E. KEARNS was named as the presiding bishop.

In 1968 the North-East Ohio Conference reported eight districts, 543 pastoral charges, 641 ministers, 273,959 members, property valued at $138,870,434, and $18,220,-224 raised for all purposes during the year. When Methodist-E.U.B. merger was fully effected in Ohio in 1970, the name of the conference became East Ohio Annual Conference.

NORTHERN GERMAN CONFERENCE was organized at Sleepy Eye, Minn., Sept. 27, 1858 with Bishop JOHN F. HURST presiding. It superseded the North German Conference which began in 1886.

American Methodism's ministry to German immigrants in their own language began in 1835 when WILLIAM NAST was appointed by the OHIO CONFERENCE as a missionary to the German-speaking people within its bounds. By 1860 nine conferences had a total of eighteen German districts. The 1864 GENERAL CONFERENCE authorized the organization of German-speaking annual conferences and immediately established three—Central German, Northwestern German, and Southwestern German. The first included OHIO, INDIANA, western PENNSYLVANIA, WEST VIRGINIA, KENTUCKY, and TENNESSEE. The second took in northern ILLINOIS, MINNESOTA, WISCONSIN, and part of IOWA, and the third covered central and southern ILLINOIS, KANSAS, MISSOURI, and part of IOWA.

The Northwestern German Conference held its first session in Galena, Ill., Sept. 7-10, 1864 with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. It began with five districts, sixty-three charges, and 5,495 members, including probationers. In 1868 the name was changed to Northwest German Conference, and it continued as such until it was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences in 1923.

The North German Conference, whose territory included Minnesota, NORTH DAKOTA, and MONTANA, was carved out of the North German Conference in 1886. The name was changed to Northern German Conference in 1888, as indicated above, and it so continued until 1924 when it was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences.

When organized in 1886 the North German Conference had three districts, MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL, and South Minnesota. There were forty-three charges, and 3,758 members including probationers. When designated as the Northern German Conference in 1888 there were 4,693 members. As the years passed, some ministers and churches transferred to the English-speaking conferences. In 1924, its last year, the Northern German Conference had only one district, Minneapolis, about twenty-five itinerants, thirty-one charges, 4,115 members, and property valued at $408,000.

NORTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE dates from 1840 when the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church was separated from the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. At that time the Rock River Conference included IOWA, WISCONSIN, and MINNESOTA. Iowa was separated in 1844; Wisconsin and Minnesota in 1848. In 1856 the Peoria Conference (later CENTRAL ILLINOIS) was taken from it. It presently covers the northern third of the state of Illinois.

JESSE WALKER was the first Methodist preacher in northern ILLINOIS. In 1823 he began work as a missionary to the Pottawatomie Indians north of Peoria. The first appointment to the region was in 1828, when John Dew was assigned to the Galena Mission.

THE UNITED BRETHREN also organized a Rock River Conference in 1853. In 1867, it united with the Central Illinois Conference to form the Northern Illinois Conference. The EVANGELICAL CHURCH had work in northeastern Illinois from 1834. The conference was organized in 1845. In 1946 the Northern Illinois Conference of the E.U.B. Church was formed by the merger of these two conferences.

Significant in the advancement of Methodism in northern Illinois was the growth of CHICAGO to become one of the largest metropolitan areas in the United States. The primacy of this area for the growth of Methodism is seen in the location of significant national, regional and conference institutions in the metropolis. In 1852 an office of the BOOK CONCERN (ME) was opened and publication of the Northwestern Christian Advocate began the following year. Also in the 1850's NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and Garrett Biblical Institute (now GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY) were founded in EVANSTON. At Naperville the Evangelical Church founded NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE (originally Plainfield College) in 1861 and EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (originally Union Biblical Institute) in 1875. The Chicago Training School was opened under the leadership of LUCY RIDER MEYER in 1885 for the training of women in foreign and home mission work. From the work at the school, Mrs. Meyer developed some forty institutions serving Chicago Methodism, including Wesley Memorial Hospital (of which she was the first resident M.D.), the Chicago Deaconess Home, and the Chicago Methodist Old People's Home. In 1934 Chicago Training School affiliated with Garrett Biblical Institute.

Besides the above, Northern Illinois is served by a number of other institutions: GOODWILL INDUSTRIES, Lake Bluff Chicago Homes for Children, The Methodist Home (Evanston), Rosecrance Memorial Home for Boys (Rockford), Kendall College (Evanston), Bethany Home and Hospital (Chicago), Newberry Center (Chicago), and Foster Street Home (Chicago). The Methodist Building in Evanston houses offices of several GENERAL CONFERENCE agencies, and the Publishing House maintains a book depository in Park Ridge. The Christian Advocate and Together editorial offices are also located at Park Ridge.

Mergers in 1932, 1939, 1942, and 1943 created the Rock River Conference of The Methodist Church. Making up the new conference were parts of the CENTRAL NORTHWEST CONFERENCE (Swedish), the NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE, the CHICAGO GERMAN CONFERENCE, the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church, and the Rock River Conference of the M.E. Church. In 1969 the Rock River Conference of The Methodist Church united with the Northern Illinois Conference of the E.U.B. Church to form the Northern Illinois Conference of The United Methodist Church.

The Conference publishes a newspaper, the Rock River Methodist. In 1970 Northern Illinois reported 201,833 members in 393 pastoral charges being served by 688 ministers.

NORTHERN MINNESOTA CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE at its session in Duluth, Oct. 3-9, 1894. The first session of the new conference was held Oct. 2-6, 1895 in MINNEAPOLIS with Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER presiding. The boundaries were so drawn as to include Minneapolis in the Northern Conference and leave ST. PAUL in the Minnesota Conference. The new conference began with four districts, Duluth, Minneapolis, St. Cloud, and Willmar. There were 136 preachers, 131 charges, and 10,912 members. The division left the Minnesota Conference with the southern one-third of the state and some 13,000 members.

The Northern Minnesota Conference grew steadily and in 1925 it reported about 32,000 members. The Asbury Hospital, started in 1892 in Minneapolis, was supported by the Northern Minnesota Conference. The institution was the outgrowth of the Methodist DEACONESS movement in Minnesota and the generosity of one Mrs. S. H. Knight. Mrs. Knight's purpose was to establish a hospital to which a deaconess could bring the sick and needy for care. Beginning with thirty-four beds, the hospital experienced difficulties and changes as time passed, but it continues and is still supported by Minnesota Methodism. Through the generosity of another woman, Mrs. Thomas B. Walker, the Walker Methodist Home for the aged was established in Minneapolis in 1875. It was supported by the Northern Minnesota Conference, and it continues as an institution of Minnesota Methodism. The conference gave strong support to HAMLINE UNIVERSITY in St. Paul. As early as 1921 the two Minnesota conferences established a WESLEY FOUNDATION at the University of Minnesota.

A commission to study the possible merger of the two Minnesota conferences was set up in 1941. After prolonged deliberation the merger was effected in 1948 and there was again a state-wide Minnesota Conference. The Northern Minnesota Conference brought 47,481 members to the merger. In its last year the conference had four districts—Duluth, Fergus Falls, Litchfield, and Minneapolis, 143 charges, and property valued at $6,653,034.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE was authorized by the 1964 Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE at the time NEW JERSEY was designated as an episcopal area. The Jurisdictional Conference recommended that the NEWARK and NEW JERSEY CONFERENCES change their names to Northern New Jersey and SOUTHERN NEW JERSEY. Both conferences concurred, effective in 1965. The new name was adopted by the Newark Conference in session at Madison, N. J., on June 17, 1965 with Bishop PRINCE A. TAYLOR presiding. At the time the conference had four districts, 267 charges, 322 preachers, 92,253 members, and property valued at $61,596,893.

The 1856 GENERAL CONFERENCE had created the Newark Conference by then dividing the New Jersey Conference. The new conference embraced northern New Jersey and parts of NEW YORK and northeastern PENNSYLVANIA. The inclusion of the adjacent areas of New York and Pennsylvania in the Newark Conference reflected the preaching stations in those states which were cultivated by Bishop ASBURY and other traveling preachers as part of the New Jersey itinerary.

In April 1856, when the New Jersey Conference requested the General Conference to divide it into two conferences, it asked that the two bodies be permitted to meet together in 1857. Permission was granted. But no sooner had the preachers convened at Trenton in April, 1857 than the question arose as to whether the gathering was "the New Jersey Conference" or "the New Jersey and-Newark Conferences" meeting in joint session. Bishop LEVI SCOTT, the presiding officer, ruled that it was the

New Jersey Conference until the close of the session, at which time he read out one list of appointments for the Newark Conference and another for the New Jersey Conference. Thus the Newark Conference dates from April 17, 1857.

The first separate session of the Newark Conference was held at Morristown, N. J., March 31 to April 5, 1858 with Bishop E. R. AMES presiding. At that time the conference reported four districts, 119 charges, 132 preachers, and 16,373 members. The records show that there were substantial increases during that first year in church membership, Sunday school enrolment, and finances. Thus in its initial year the Newark Conference set a trend of growth that was to continue for many years.

In its 1858 session the Newark Conference voted that "in view of its geographical position" it would not sustain "the formal position of a patronizing conference" for DICKINSON COLLEGE. At the same time the conference pledged support to the PENNINGTON SCHOOL in the New Jersey Conference. CENTENARY COLLEGE for Women was established at Hackettstown in 1867. Today Centenary is a strong Methodist junior college with a plant valued at $8,000,000, an endowment of $250,000, and some 660 students. Before 1900 the Newark Conference accepted MORRISTOWN COLLEGE, a Negro school in Tennessee, as a part of its benevolent responsibility and the conference continues to give it some support. The conference cooperates with the Southern New Jersey Conference in WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at Princeton and Rutgers and in campus ministries at many of the state institutions of higher learning.

The Newark Conference came to unification in 1939 with 284 charges and 69,357 members. At that time a part of the Eastern Conference (MP) was merged with it. In 1940 the conference reported 70,914 members.

Through the years the Newark Conference developed many leaders (see NEW JERSEY), and it was in the forefront in promoting lay representation, adequate support for ministers, church extension, advances in denominational administration, foreign missions, an adequate ministry in the cities, education, and solutions to ethnic and racial issues.

In 1907, 1932, and 1957 the fiftieth, seventy-fifth, and one hundredth sessions of the Newark Conference were held at MORRISTOWN, N. J., the scene of the first session. The conference centennial commission, headed by the writer of this article, prepared a special program for 1957 in which four bishops participated.

From 1857 to 1965 the boundaries of the Newark Conference were not changed, but on Jan. 12, 1965, by order of the Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference, the twelve churches (some 3,800 members) on Staten Island were transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. This transfer of churches terminated a close association between STATEN ISLAND and New Jersey Methodism which dated back to 1771 when Francis Asbury preached in New Jersey and on Staten Island and developed his first circuit in America. The transfer of the twelve churches was formally observed in a service at Trinity Church, Staten Island, in which the bishops of the New Jersey and New York Areas participated.

The Northern New Jersey Conference helps to maintain a number of service agencies and institutions. GOODWILL INDUSTRIES serves 125 people daily. The Aldersgate Camp reaches many young people. The conference gives support to the METHODIST HOSPITAL in BROOKLYN, the oldest Methodist related hospital in America. The conference joins the Southern New Jersey Conference in maintaining Methodist Homes in New Jersey with branches in OCEAN GROVE, OCEAN CITY, Branchville, and Collingswood.

In 1964 and 1965 the conference received six ministers and some churches from the DELAWARE CONFERENCE as that body merged with the overlying conferences of the Northeastern Jurisdiction.

At its 1968 session the Northern New Jersey Conference projected a four-year Total Mission Crusade for urban renewal, world-wide reconciliation, and support of Camp Aldersgate. Asked for $1,155,000, the churches of the conference pledged $1,240,000.

In 1970 the Northern New Jersey Conference reported four districts, 227 charges, 332 ministers, 88,022 members, property valued at $79,760,680, and $8,465,216 raised for all puposes during the year.

NORTHERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE was organized at Utica, April 16, 1873 with Bishop JESSE T. PECK presiding. The 1872 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the conference by merging the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE with a part of the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE. The conference began with eight districts, 179 charges, 237 preachers, and 24,963 members.

Originally what is now the Northern New York Conference was a part of the Genesee District of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. It descended through the GENESEE CONFERENCE (formed in 1810), the ONEIDA CONFERENCE (formed in 1829), and the Black River Conference (formed in 1836).

The church at Sauquoit, N. Y., established in 1788, is regarded as the oldest continuing congregation in the conference. From its beginning the Northern New York Conference demonstrated interest in evangelism, missions, higher education, church publication, and established two schools which continued for some years: Ives Seminary and Antwerp Liberal Institute; and it gave support to Cazenovia Seminary, SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, and AMERICAN UNIVERSITY. In more recent years the conference has supported BETHUNE-COOKMAN COLLEGE in FLORIDA, and has helped to establish the Ledden Chair in Christian Education at Syracuse. It has joined other conferences and denominations in an ecumenical approach to campus ministries at state institutions of higher learning.

The Northern New York Conference joins in supporting the Methodist Home for Children (Gateway) at Williamsville; the Folts Home (Aged) at Herkimer; and the Charlton School for Girls at Burnt Hills. Camp Aldersgate, in the foothills of the Adirondack Mountains is the site of a varied camping program serving all ages and interests from May until October each year. Conference offices are in the Methodist Center in Watertown, established in 1960.

The Black River and Northern New York Conferences have furnished leaders in the larger church. Bishops who were born in the region or served in the conference are: Jesse T. Peck, LINUS PARKER, WILLIAM X. NINDE, and

FREDERICK D. LEETE. Peck led in founding Syracuse University in 1870. JOHN DEMPSTER, who served as a missionary to BUENOS AIRES and was influential in the founding of both the BOSTON SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, served as pastor in Watertown, New York.

The Northern New York Conference came to unification in 1939 with four districts, 267 charges, 35,729 members, and property valued at $4,841,874. At that time it received a few ministers and churches from the Onondaga Conference of the M.P. Church.

In 1970 the Northern New York Conference reported three districts, 136 charges, 152 ministers, 47,051 members, property valued at $24,494,712, and $2,738,417 raised for all purposes during the year.

NORTHERN SWEDISH CONFERENCE was organized at Calumet, Mich., Sept. 6, 1900 with Bishop CHARLES C. McCABE presiding. It superseded the Northern Swedish Mission Conference.

Until the middle of the nineteenth century there were only a few Swedes in the North Central states, but thereafter they came in rapidly increasing numbers. Swedish Methodist work in that region was linked to earlier beginnings on the Atlantic seaboard. A Swede by the name of Peter Bergner came to America as mate on a Swedish ship in 1822. An accident hospitalized him in New York, and while there he was converted. Interested in the spiritual welfare of his fellow-countrymen who as sailors came by the thousands to this country every year, he appealed to the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church for help. In time OLAF G. HEDSTROM, a preacher of Swedish descent in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, assisted Bergner in organizing work among the Swedes. In 1845 a group of Swedes in New York incorporated under the name of "The First North River Bethel Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church." In 1846 a brother of Hedstrom organized a Swedish Methodist Church in Victoria, Ill.

In 1859 the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE organized a SCANDINAVIAN Mission District with ten appointments. The next year the mission district reported 385 members, including probationers. In 1861 it was designated as the Scandinavian District. In 1872 the Scandinavian District was divided to form the Swedish District and the Norwegian District. In 1877 the Swedish churches in the Minnesota Conference became a part of the newly organized Northwest Swedish Conference, the first Swedish conference to be organized by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The 1880 Discipline says that the Northwest Swedish Conference was to include all Swedish churches in the west and northwest along with those in the ERIE CONFERENCE in New York. By 1893 the Northwest Swedish Conference had churches in twelve states from New York to Minnesota, and it reported nearly 10,000 members, including probationers. The conference had more churches in Illinois than in any other one state.

The Northern Swedish Mission Conference, mentioned above, was carved out of the Northwest Swedish Conference. The Mission Conference held its first session in MINNEAPOLIS, Sept. 6-10, 1894. Its territory was Minnesota, MICHIGAN, and WISCONSIN. It had more churches in Minnesota than in either of the other two states. The Mission Conference began with three districts, forty-two charges, and 2,607 members, including probationers. When raised to the status of a full conference in 1900, it still had only three districts, forty-five charges, and 2,749 members.

In 1927 the Northern Swedish Conference merged with the Central Swedish and Western Swedish Conferences to form the CENTRAL NORTHWEST CONFERENCE. The latter continued as a Swedish Conference until 1942 when its ministers and churches were received into the English-speaking conferences in which they happened to be located. At its last session in 1927, the Northern Swedish Conference reported two districts, fifty-one charges, 2,729 members, and property valued at $380,900.

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE, E.U.B., came into being because of the persistence of members of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH in eastern Canada. Early in the nineteenth century, a number of Evangelical families moved from the state of PENNSYLVANIA to Ontario, CANADA. In 1816, JOHN DREIBACH preached among them but was unable to establish an organized work. Later, in 1839, two missions were formed, one at Waterloo and one at Black Creek. During the same year a CAMP MEETING, at which BISHOP JOHN SEYBERT preached, resulted in the organization of two other congregations, one at Berlin and the other in the surrounding neighborhood. Other advances followed; and in 1863, the work in Ontario was formed into a separate annual conference known as the CANADA CONFERENCE.

In 1876, the Canada Conference sent a special delegation to the west under the leadership of Superintendent Peter Alles to investigate the possibility of missionary work. Their report was discouraging. The delegation saw no opportunity for church work in an area that was swampy and sparsely settled. However, the west did open and among the early settlers were members from Evangelical churches in the United States and Ontario. At first, the DAKOTA CONFERENCE responded to the appeal of these people and sent missionaries to Western Canada, but due to pressing needs at home, the conference soon withdrew this assistance.

In 1899 the Canada Conference, after much investigation, deliberation and prayer, took up this work. W. E. Beese was assigned as the first missionary to the west with appointment to both Winnipeg and Grenfell. He preached his first sermon in the J. J. Niebergall home fifteen miles north of Grenfell. In 1900, A. W. Sauer was appointed to Rosthern, Saskatchewan; and in 1901, C. G. Kaatz was sent to Didsbury, Alberta. In 1908, L. H. Wagner became the first resident superintendent of the work in Western Canada.

MEMORIAL CHURCH, KAEO, NORTHLAND, NEW ZEALAND

NORTHLAND, New Zealand, Kaeo Memorial Church, was erected and opened in 1923, near the site of the original pioneer Maori mission station of Wesleydale. The laying of the foundation stone of the building formed part of the centenary celebrations the previous year. It stands as a memorial to the pioneer missionaries and their wives, and to the first Maori ministers of the mission, their names being inscribed on a handsome roll of honor. RITA F. SNOWDEN, the famous Methodist writer, says:

In our Memorial Church, there stands a chaste baptismal font—fashioned, we think, to represent more closely than a plaque could do, the spirit and interest of these women [i.e., the missionary wives]. On a silver strip affixed are these words: "Their richest gifts they offered gladly." (The Ladies of Wesleydale, London: Epworth Press, 1957, pp. 5-6.)

In 1926 he was appointed tutor at EDGEHILL COLLEGE at Belfast for theological training, and in 1943 he became principal. For many years from 1923 he was chiefly responsible for the editorial policy of the Irish Christian Advocate. Publications include books on

After twenty-eight years of missionary work in the Canadian West, upon petition of the Canada Conference, the GENERAL CONFERENCE granted permission to organize the Northwest Canada Conference of The Evangelical Church. This organization took place in June 1927, at Didsbury, Alberta; and in 1928 the Dominion Government granted a charter to the new conference. W. W. Krueger was appointed superintendent by the General Board of Missions, in which capacity he served for twenty years.

At the time of organization the membership of the conference was 1,433. By 1968 this membership had grown to over 3,600. There were fifty-three organized congregations, thirty-seven ministers under appointment as pastors, and four under appointment to the Hillcrest Christian College. There were fifty-two churches in the conference, valued at $1,249,000. Additional property owned by the conference included the Hillcrest Christian College, valued at $375,000, and three camp grounds with assets of $75,000. Nearly 1,500 miles separated the eastern and western boundaries of this conference.

In The United Methodist Church the Northwest Canada Conference was granted permission to operate under the procedures of the COMMISSION ON THE STRUCTURE OF METHODISM OVERSEAS.

NORTHWEST CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at Milton, Ore., Aug. 29, 1918 with Bishop H. M. DuBOISE presiding. It was formed by merging the Columbia, East Columbia, and Montana Conferences. (See OREGON and MONTANA for accounts of these conferences.) Its territory embraced Oregon, WASHINGTON, IDAHO, and Montana. The conference began with three districts, Portland, inland, and Montana, and it had forty-five charges and 4,916 members. In the twenty-one years prior to Methodist unification the Northwest Conference did not flourish. In 1939 it reported two districts, Portland and Spokane, and there were thirty-four charges and 3,647 members.

NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE covered less than one-fourth of the state of INDIANA, but it was blessed with a diversification marked by metropolitan and rural areas, industrialization and agriculture. Prompted in its creation by the growth of Methodism in northern Indiana from 1844 until 1852, it was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1852 upon request of the existing NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE. Meeting in Terre Haute, the new conference encompassed forty-eight circuits (consisting of fifty-nine churches) with 11,488 members, and there were sixty-five ministers. The conference included all the Methodist work west of the Michigan Road from INDIANAPOLIS north to the St. Joseph River at SOUTH BEND (with the exception of Logansport), thence north to the MICHIGAN state line. On the south it included the northwest portion of Indianapolis (west of Meridian Street and north of Market Street) and followed the National Road west from the capitol to the ILLINOIS state line. The states of Illinois and Michigan supplied the other two boundary lines. The conferences maintained these boundaries until unification with the North Indiana and the Indiana North (EUB) conferences in 1968.

The venerable JAMES ARMSTRONG had worked in the area of northwestern Indiana as early as 1825 along with his assistant, Hackaliah Vredenburg, and continued until his death to organize new congregations in the area. John Daniel, John Marsee and John L. Smith were early leaders of the conference—all three carrying presiding elder responsibilities into the new conference from the older one. Joseph C. Reed, Hilary A. Gobin, and Aaron Wood soon assumed memorable leadership for the smallest of the Indiana conferences.

With INDIANA ASBURY UNIVERSITY located within the bounds of the conference, the new Northwest Indiana Conference had added incentive in its educational work. At its first session the conference elected trustees and visitors to the Greencastle school and representatives to inspect other Methodist educational efforts in the state, but Indiana Asbury remained its favorite and imminent project. Repeatedly, the home conference of the Methodist University (renamed DEPAUW UNIVERSITY in 1884) responded to its need. To augment the educational work at Greencastle, the Conference cooperated with the local congregation in 1926 in the building of a new Methodist church, the Gobin Memorial Church, adjacent to the campus.

Recognizing the growth of state colleges and universities, the Northwest Conference created one of the early WESLEY FOUNDATION units in the United States at Purdue University in 1917. Its pioneering work helped set the tempo for Methodist campus ministry everywhere. It has been a leader in innovative ministry and responsible stewardship to the campus for fifty years.

Early in the Conference's history, private academies were developed and maintained (with varying degrees of success) until public school education became stabilized in this rapidly growing area of the state. A few became "feeder-lines" to the Methodist University at Greencastle, though most were short-lived. The Monnett School for Girls at Rensselaer was the last—struggling for survival against the twin floods of expanding public welfare departments and depleted support from the annual conference. By the end of the depression in 1934, the school had closed.

The churches of the Northwest Indiana Conference were fruits of early missions, and only their material means (never their Methodist spirit) limited the conference's missionary response. Three members of the conference in 1852 declared themselves ready to enter the mission field. Both home and foreign missions commanded their response. The missionary zeal transformed the shift of the conference from a primarily rural setting to a highly industrialized one, with all of its accompanying problems, to a challenge rather than a burden. This was to express itself in increased involvement in community affairs.

Epworth Hospital in South Bend was founded under the benevolent guidance of Methodist women and maintained a quasi-official relationship with the conference for several years. The conference cooperated with the other Indiana conferences in establishing the Methodist Hospital at Indianapolis, and after 1919 took exclusive control of the hospital in Gary. Likewise, an orphanage was begun at Greencastle in the early 1920's and moved to Lebanon in 1924 because of better facilities. The Indiana Methodist Children's Home at Lebanon has an illustrious history of almost one-half century of service. A residency for older people was established in Frankfort (Wesley Manor), and as union of the conferences approached in 1968 the home absorbed the assets and liabilities of an independent home in Greencastle and renamed it Asbury Towers.

The missionary zeal was to find worthy supporters among the women of the conference. During the organizational period of 1884-85, 49 auxiliaries of the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY were formed with 1,153 women enlisted. A decade earlier the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY was firmly entrenched and by 1877 was donating one-fourth of all the missionary giving of the conference. After the union of the women's groups in 1941, a tremendous increase in missionary giving was realized and women's work made another surge forward.

The youth were quick to rally to the old EPWORTH LEAGUE. By 1893 there were a total of 4,912 youth enlisted in ninety-one youth groups in the conference. The Battle Ground Campground began development in 1874 and was the scene of many successful CAMP MEETINGS. It was also to become the scene of Junior and Senior Youth training conferences. A wilderness camp was developed in the early 1960's at Pine Creek.

With the union of The Methodist and E.U.B. Churches, the Northwest Indiana Conference was absorbed into the new NORTH INDIANA and SOUTH INDIANA CONFERENCES. The Northwest Indiana Conference brought 253 ministers, 267 charges, 96,238 members, and property valued at $44,445,219 to the union.

NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized Sept. 18, 1872 at Fort Dodge, Iowa with Bishop EDWARD G. ANDREWS presiding. It was formed by dividing the DES MOINES CONFERENCE, and its territory included the northwest quarter of Iowa and Dakota Territory. At the beginning it had three districts, Fort Dodge, Sioux City, and Algona; twenty-three preachers, nine churches, and 3,392 members.

In 1875 the conference petitioned the GENERAL CONFERENCE to organize the Dakota territory into a separate annual conference, but nothing was done about that until 1880.

Soon after its organization the conference gave support to Algona Seminary, but the school failed about 1880. The conference supported CORNELL COLLEGE until 1894 when it projected MORNINGSIDES COLLEGE at Sioux City by buying for some $25,000 the buildings of the University of the Northwest. It gave excellent patronage and support to Morningside, and today it is a strong Methodist college.

The Northwest Iowa Conference continued until 1948 when it merged with the Upper Iowa Conference to form the North Iowa Conference. In its last year the conference reported 200 ministers, 205 churches, and 54,884 members.

NORTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE (ME) was organized March 9, 1882 at Abilene with Bishop H. W. WARREN presiding. It was formed by dividing the KANSAS CONFERENCE, and its boundaries included all that "part of the state of Kansas north of the south line of township sixteen and west of the sixth principal meridian, yet so as to include the Solomon City Circuit." This meant that the boundaries included approximately the west two-thirds of the north half of the state. When organized the conference had three districts—Beloit, Kirwin, and Salina. In 1883 the conference reported seventy-four charges and 5,991 members.

At the outset the Northwest Kansas Conference pledged support to BAKER UNIVERSITY at Baldwin, but at the same time it felt the need of a college within its own bounds. As a result of that sentiment, KANSAS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY was opened at Salina in the fall of 1886. Through the years the school experienced many difficulties, but it survived. In 1968 it had in round numbers an endowment of $1,000,000, a plant valued at $6,000,000, and an enrolment of 900.

During its history the conference established three hospitals—Boothray Memorial at Goodland, Asbury at Salina, and Hays Protestant at Hays. It joined other conferences in the state in supporting Methodist institutions.

In 1939 the Northwest Kansas Conference merged with the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE to form the CENTRAL CONFERENCE. The Northwest Conference brought to the merger 128 charges and 26,144 members.

NORTHWEST NEBRASKA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Kearney, Neb., during a session of the WEST NEBRASKA CONFERENCE, Sept. 28-Oct. 3, 1892, with Bishop H. W. WARREN presiding. It was formed by dividing the West Nebraska Conference. The conference was located in northwest Nebraska and it included less than one-fourth of the state. It had one district, Chadron, some twenty-six charges, and 1,417 members at the beginning.

Northwest Nebraska continued as a separate conference through 1924 and was then absorbed by the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE. At its last session in 1924 the conference reported one district, United, forty-three charges, and 9,258 members.

NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at Waxahachie, Sept. 26, 1866, with Bishop ENOCH M. MARVIN presiding. The conference was formed by merging the northern parts of the TEXAS and the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCES. At the beginning the Northwest Texas Conference included all the territory in the present CENTRAL TEXAS and Northwest Texas Conferences. (The Central Texas Conference was set off from the Northwest Texas Conference in 1910.) When organized the Northwest Texas Conference had four districts, thirty-two charges, and 3,890 white and 526 colored members.

Though the Northwest Texas Conference had thirty-two charges in 1866, none of them was within the bounds of the present Northwest Texas Conference. Moreover, not any of the counties in the present Northwest Texas Conference were organized before 1870. In 1876 the Texas Legislature created fifty-four counties in northwest Texas, but even so it was ten to fifteen years before many of them had enough population to organize a county government. However, once a county was organized, one or more Methodist churches soon appeared within its bounds.

Probably the first Methodist sermon in the present Northwest Texas Conference territory was delivered a little before 1870 by one Milton Jones at Fort Griffin, a United States military post established in 1867. Fort Griffin was listed in the conference appointments in 1875.

Around 1880, the Texas and Pacific and the Fort Worth and Denver Railroads came into northwest Texas and immigration soon followed. Also, Methodist activity soon greatly accelerated. Methodism felt strong enough to start Belle Plain College in the Abilene District in 1881, but it closed after seven years, probably because of unprecedented drought in the region. By 1900 the conference had nearly 67,000 members, fully five-sixths of them in the area that was to become the Central Texas Conference. By 1910 when the division into two conferences took place, there were nearly 116,000 members in the conference, two-thirds of them in the region being set off as the Central Texas Conference.

On Nov. 9, 1910 the Northwest Texas Conference, having given one-third of its territory and two-thirds of its membership to the newly created Central Texas Conference, met at Clarendon with Bishop JAMES ATKINS presiding. The conference started its new era with six districts, 148 charges, 179 preachers, and 39,009 members. The Central Texas Conference met a week later at Waxahachie with the same bishop in the chair.

The Northwest Texas Conference had a net increase in membership between 1910 and 1920 of only 2,718, but in the next decade the net advance was 18,237 members, representing a growth of about twenty-eight percent. The conference came to unification in 1939 with nine districts, 217 charges, 73,182 members, and property valued at $4,523,987. It raised for all purposes that year $836,080.

When limited to its present boundaries in 1910, the Northwest Texas Conference had three junior colleges: Clarendon College at Clarendon, Stamford College at Stamford, and Seth Ward College at Plainview. Between 1916 and 1918 both Seth Ward and Stamford closed because of disastrous fires. Clarendon College closed in 1927. A movement led by J. W. Hunt, last president of Stamford, brought about the establishment of McMURRY COLLEGE at Abilene in 1923. With good administrative leadership and support from the conference, the college has grown. Today it has an endowment of more than $2,500,000, a plant valued at $7,000,000 and an enrollment of more than 2,000.

Since unification the Northwest Texas Conference has increased in membership about forty-five percent. It supports the Methodist Hospital at Lubbock, two retirement nursing homes (King's Manor at Hereford and Sears Memorial Methodist Center at Abilene), two youth camps, and several WESLEY FOUNDATIONS. It joins the other Texas Conferences in support of the Methodist Children's Home at Waco, The Texas Methodist at DALLAS, and some other causes. The conference raised $201,428 for higher education in 1968, and it projected a fiftieth anniversary campaign for $3,500,000 for McMurry College.

In 1968 the Northwest Texas Conference reported eight districts, 237 charges, 338 ministers, 106,515 members, and property valued at $49,981,691. It raised for all purposes that year $8,241,712.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Evanston, Illinois, was established in 1851. The city in which it is located perpetuates the name of its principal founder, JOHN EVANS. The city also has streets named for Bishops FOSTER and MATTHEW SIMPSON and for early university presidents, Noyes and Himman. Orrington Lunt and John Evans located the university immediately north of CHICAGO on the shores of Lake Michigan. Evans himself carried through the purchase of the original 379 acres for $25,000.

The founders, reflecting Methodist antipathy to intoxicating liquors, placed an amendment in the charter forbidding their sale within four miles of the university. The university's charter contains a tax-exemption clause that grants freedom from taxation in perpetuity. This was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1879.

Though today a nondenominational, coeducational school, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, as its catalog states, "is historically a Methodist-related institution." Its first five presidents were clergymen, graduates of Methodist schools. The sixth president, HENRY WADE ROGERS, was a layman, and with the exception of a one-year interval the presidents since 1890 have been laymen. Three of the early presidents of Northwestern were elected bishops. The short terms of clergyman presidents and their tendency to give preference to ecclesiastical offices may account for the shift to laymen.

The close orientation of Northwestern University to The Methodist Church in the last half of the nineteenth century is reflected in the concern of President Cummings to get young Methodists to attend college. In 1884, he noted that there was only one Methodist student to every 1,000 members in the nation. The Congregationalists had one to every 413 members.

Northwestern University was founded with the vision of a Methodist university fed by a network of Methodist colleges. In addition, it was deeply concerned for the religious needs of students in its professional schools. President Edmund J. James believed that a student of medicine should not be less a Christian than a student in liberal arts.

The schools are the College of Arts and Sciences, Business, Dentistry, Education, Music, Graduate, Technological Institute, Journalism, Law, Medicine, Speech, Evening Divisions. The university has a cooperative academic arrangement with GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. Northwestern also has a Phi Beta Kappa chapter. The governing board has fifty-nine trustees eight of whom are elected from ROCK RIVER, CENTRAL ILLINOIS, MICHIGAN, and DETROIT ANNUAL CONFERENCES of The United Methodist Church.

NORWAY is the northernmost part of the continent of Europe; and Hammerfest, the northernmost town in the world, is in the very north of Norway. It is a country of mountains, fjords, and deep valleys. There are many islands along the west coast, and there are also a number of large and small rivers and lakes. The shape of the country is long and narrow; the distance from the southernmost point to the northernmost point is 1,100 miles. It covers an area of 125,064 square miles. The Spitsbergen group of islands is a Norwegian possession. According to the latest population figures (1970) the population is 3,867,400. OSLO, the capital, has about 500,000 inhabitants.

The most important economic activities are shipping, agriculture, forestry, fisheries, industry, and tourism. Norway has the fourth largest merchant navy in the world. Some Norwegians have become famous far beyond the frontiers of their own country, e.g. the polar explorers Fridtjof Nansen and Roald Amundsen; in the world of letters, Henrik Ibsen and Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson; and the novelists Knut Hamsun and Sigrid Undset, both of whom were awarded the Nobel Prize for literature; the sculptor Gustav Vigeland; the painters Edvard Munch and Henrik Sørensen; the composer Edvard Grieg. Trygve Lie, the first Secretary General of the United Nations, was also a Norwegian.

O. P. PETERSEN

The Founder. The Methodist Church in Norway grew out of a spiritual revival movement. The one chosen to realize this revival was a Norwegian seaman, Ole Peter Petersen (1822-1901), and the story of Norwegian Methodism during its formative years is really the story of this one man. He was born at Fredrickstad on April 28, 1822. His father, who was a ship's carpenter, lost his life at sea when young Ole was only four years old. When Ole was six, his mother died also. He was confirmed at the age of fourteen. In the church register, the entry against his name says: "Very good knowledge, exemplary conduct."

Ole was a quiet and thoughtful boy. His thoughts were often concerned with God and God's word. His wish was to become a minister of the church, but he abandoned that idea and became a seaman, as his father had been before him, sailing along the coast of America for many years. When in New York, he frequently used to visit the BETHEL SHIP MISSION. This had been started by the American Methodist Episcopal Church, largely for the benefit of seamen from Norway, SWEDEN, and DENMARK.

At a meeting of a small group, the pastor asked him: "Is your soul saved?" Petersen answered very solemnly: "I apologize for having taken the liberty of coming to this meeting. I am not fit to be here, I am only a poor sinner in search of God if He will have mercy on me." The pastor talked with him about God, and the young seaman went his way.

One night, Petersen, who was on watch, paced the deck thinking about God. And it was then that he clearly heard the words, "Rejoice, my son." And his soul was filled with indescribable bliss.

METHODIST CHURCH, STAVANGER, NORWAY

The Beginnings of Methodism in Norway—First Hundred Years. Ole Peter Petersen sailed along the coast of America for several years. In a letter to his fiancée, Anne Marie Amundsen, in Fredrickstad, his native town, he described what the Lord had done for him. The letter was of such a nature that she allowed her own family to read it. After that it was passed from house to house until it was almost in shreds. All who read it were deeply moved by the contents and by the profound seriousness that characterized it. The outcome was that Petersen's fiancée wrote to him on behalf of all those who had read the letter, and urgently asked him to come home to guide them onto the road to God which he himself had found.

Petersen had not been considering such an early return home, but the request made him restless, so he decided to go and to bear witness of what God had done for him. On June 30, 1849, he arrived at Fredrikstad and saw his fiancée. Her aunt wanted to celebrate Petersen's homecoming with a glass of wine, but he replied: "I have not come back to be with you for such occasions, but to tell you what the Lord has done for my salvation." This set the tone for his stay in Norway. It was the beginning of a revival movement of great consequence. People began beseeching him to hold public meetings, but he replied: "I am not a minister of the church, nor do I know if the law of the land permits me to hold public meetings." But the revival movement continued.

One day he visited the minister of the Norwegian Lutheran state church to ask if he was permitted to hold public meetings if people asked him to do so. At first the minister answered noncommittally, and said that, after all, people could go to the services in the state church. But having talked with Petersen for a while, the minister said that there was freedom of religion in Norway, adding fortunately: "You are fully within your rights to follow God's word and your own conscience."

So Petersen started to hold public meetings. He had not intended to stay in Norway for long, and made preparations for returning to America with a view to sailing on coastal vessels again. But the newly converted asked him so urgently to stay on at home that he did not dare to refuse. In addition to his work at Fredrikstad, he had also visited many of the surrounding districts.

On one occasion, Petersen went to see a well-known layman within the Norwegian State Church. When they parted, this man said to Petersen: "May God bless you. I could wish that you would stay on here among us. We need men like you in Norway."

Early in the winter of 1849, he married Annie Marie Amundsen, and on April 24, 1850, he and his bride sailed for America. Before leaving for Norway in 1849, he had joined the Bethel Ship Mission. Some time after his return to America he was asked to take up the appointment of assistant with the Bethel Ship Mission. His work was to be the visiting of lodging houses, hospitals, and of Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish families. On June 10, 1851, he received authorization as LOCAL PREACHER.

In the autumn of 1851 he was asked to go to IOWA in order to work among the Norwegian pioneers there. He did so, and as a result became one of the founders of the NORWEGIAN-DANISH ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Episcopal Church of America.

Simultaneously he pursued intensive studies for the ministry; and on July 1, 1853, he was ordained DEACON and ELDER by Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH. Concerning him the bishop said: "He is one of the most humble, self-sacrificing, faithful, and self-denying men I have ever known. He is gentle, loving, zealous, pure, conscientious."

Those who had been converted to God in 1849-50 during Petersen's visit to Norway sent several letters to the church in America asking for Petersen to return home to Norway again. And eventually the M.E. Church in America, of which he was now a minister, decided that he should go to Norway.

On Dec. 3, 1853, he arrived in Oslo, and immediately continued to his native town of Fredrikstad, where he started the activities which were to lead to the foundation of the Methodist Church in Norway. The revival movement began to flourish again.

After the first Methodist congregation in Norway had been organized at SARPSBORG on Sept. 11, 1856, by Ole Peter Petersen, he continued his activities by visiting many other places. Another congregation was organized by CHRISTIAN WILLERUP at Halden, then called Fredrikshald, on November 3 of the same year, and activity continued to expand steadily.

In 1859, and at his own request, Petersen was appointed to a position in America. For three years he was the leader of the work on Bethel Ship, and in 1863 he was appointed superintendent of the Norwegian Mission District in the WEST WISCONSIN ANNUAL CONFERENCE. During that time he worked tenaciously for the church, taking up work among the many Norwegians and Danes who had settled in CHICAGO. Chicago itself was of course beyond his district, but he nevertheless felt that it was up to him to take the initiative. And in June, 1868, the first Norwegian-Danish Methodist congregation was founded in Chicago.

After serving six years as district superintendent in WISCONSIN, Petersen received a pressing request to return to Norway to take up the position of superintendent of the work of the church in Norway. He accepted, on condition that the appointment should be for two years only. Those two years were years of progress—several new congregations were founded, and activities expanded to many new places. Under Petersen's leadership the preachers came together for an annual meeting in 1870, where one of the decisions was to publish a catechism, a hymnbook, and a church monthly magazine. On April 28, 1871, he preached his valedictory sermon in Oslo prior to going back to America, where he had been appointed to the Norwegian-Danish church in Chicago.

In 1874 he was given an appointment in BROOKLYN, where he organized a Norwegian-Danish Methodist congregation. The Scandinavian Mission to Seamen in New York, including the Bethel Ship, was incorporated within the field of activities of the new congregation.

In 1878 Petersen became superintendent of the Milwaukee Norwegian District and subsequently of the Chicago Norwegian District. During his later years he officiated as pastor at Racine; Maplewood Avenue, Chicago; and MINNEAPOLIS.

As late as 1901, Ole Petersen, who by then had reached the age of seventy-nine, accepted an appointment in Brooklyn. He threw himself into the work with his customary energy, and founded yet another Norwegian-Danish congregation. He died in Brooklyn on Dec. 20, 1901, and was buried in Milwaukee, where his wife had found her last place of rest almost twenty years earlier.

Petersen was a man of utterly consistent character, willing and ready at all times to give advice, guidance, and consolation. He had an unshakeable sense of justice, which was a prominent feature of his character. He loved children and young people, and was filled with a fiery and untiring energy. He was a keen and discerning theologian. He wrote a number of books, articles for magazines, periodicals, and pamphlets. His most important work is Betraktninger over Bibelens hovedlærdommer. His hymns and chorales and translations are used in church to this day. They express a humble adoration of God, and a deeply felt desire to lead a life of sanctity for him.

Ole Petersen has been honored in his native town of Fredrikstad with a bust in one of the public parks, and by naming a street in the center of the town after him.

Development of Norwegian Methodism. As soon as the Methodist Church in Norway had become organized, new Methodist congregations were founded, one after the other. Sunday schools and youth work were started. In fact, work with Sunday schools had already begun in February, 1855, that is to say before the Church had become organized. Youth work was organized in 1889. Also choirs, brass bands (with choirs), women's societies, etc., were founded, and foreign and home mission work was started.

By and by, the number of preachers increased, and preachers' meetings were held at suitable intervals, until a regular Norwegian Annual Conference (now the Norway Conference) was organized in Oslo in 1876, under the leadership of Bishop E. C. ANDREWS.

In 1953, a member of the Methodist Church in Norway, ODD HAGEN, was elected Bishop of Northern Europe; and in 1964 a Norwegian missionary, HARRY P. ANDREAS-SEN, was elected Bishop of ANGOLA (Africa). In 1961, the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE was held in Oslo. In 1966 the Norwegian bishop, Odd Hagen, was elected president of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

The development of the work done by the Methodist Church in Norway resulted in the foundation of several institutions.

Publishing. As early as 1856—the year in which the Methodist Church in Norway was founded—the first book was published. It was on church discipline. On May 21, 1867, a preachers' meeting took place, at which eight preachers were present. One of the subjects for discussion was the setting up of a company for the dissemination of Christian literature. That was the beginning of the publishing house, still in existence, of the Methodist church in Norway: Norsk Forlagsselskap. The first magazine to be published was a Sunday school magazine, which started in 1871. The present title of this magazine is Barnevennen. On Jan. 28, 1872, the first issue of the official church paper came out, which is now published under the name of Kristelig Tidende. The publications by Norsk Forlagsselskap include textbooks, scientific works, historical works, collections of sermons, books of chorales, fiction, and literature for edification, etc.

Social work began with a children's home, which was opened in Oslo in 1892. In 1922 a further children's home was opened in Oslo, and a children's home for northern Norway was opened at Finnsnes in 1923. An old-people's home was opened at Vadsö in northern Norway in 1924, another one in Oslo in 1925, and a third one in Bergen in 1954.

A home for young men was opened at Fredrikstad in 1960. Altogether these homes have places for forty-four children, twelve young men, and ninety old people.

Hospitals and deaconess work were started in Oslo in 1897, and continued in Bergen in 1904, and in Skien in 1939. These hospitals are called "Betanien" (Bethany houses), and at the Betanien hospitals there are now a total number of 358 beds. The institutions have 531 deaconesses, who serve in hospitals run by the Church, and also in state and local authority hospitals.

A theological school was started on May 27, 1873, in Oslo. In 1924 the Methodist Churches in Scandinavia (Sweden, Denmark, FINLAND, Norway) came together to establish the UNION SCANDINAVIAN THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL, and a piece of property was acquired for that purpose at Gothenburg, Sweden. It has had a great influence throughout all Scandinavia.

A Bible school was established in Oslo in 1941. This provides Bible courses and local courses for the congregations, and also arranges for instruction by correspondence.

Missionary work was properly organized at the Annual Conference in 1907, Southern RHODESIA being chosen as the first field for Norway missions. The Methodist Women's Society was established in 1931. The local congregations, the Youth Fellowship, and the Methodist Women's Society in Norway all now work together, and maintain missionaries at the following places: INDIA, HONG KONG, MALAYA, Rhodesia, CONGO, Angola, LIBERIA, ALGERIA and TUNISIA, a present total of thirty-three missionaries.

Present (1967) statistics of Norwegian Methodism: Number of churches, 89; other places of worship, 90; ministers, 85; missionaries, 33; local preachers, 107; number of Methodists in Norway, 22,000; number of children attending Sunday school, 6,900; youth work, 5,500.

NORWEGIAN AND DANISH CONFERENCE in the United States was organized at Cambridge, Wis., Sept. 10, 1885 with Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN presiding. It superseded the Northwest Norwegian Conference which was organized at Racine, Wis. in September 1880.

The responsibility of the Norwegian and Danish Conference was all of the Norwegian and Danish work between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains, though the conference minutes show that practically all of its charges were in seven states—ILLINOIS, IOWA, MICHIGAN, MINNESOTA, WISCONSIN, and the DAKOTAS.

This conference is not to be confused with the Norwegian and Danish work in the Pacific northwest which began as the Northwest Norwegian-Danish Mission in 1888, became the WESTERN NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE in 1896, and continued as such until unification in 1939.

Norwegians and Danes began emigrating to America in appreciable numbers in the 1840's and 1850's. In 1856 the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE formed a Norwegian Mission District with eight circuits located in the states of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa. In 1859 the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE organized a Scandinavian Mission District. In 1872 both conferences separated their work into Swedish and Norwegian Districts. The 1880 GENERAL CONFERENCE authorized the formation of a Norwegian Annual Conference, and that fall, as indicated above, the Northwest Norwegian Conference was organized. The conference began with four districts, Chicago, Milwaukee, Minnesota, and Iowa. There were thirty-one charges and 2,640 members. In 1885 when the name of the conference was changed there were forty-five charges and 3,380 members.

The Norwegians and Danes proposed the establishment of a school as early as 1866, and in 1870 a Norwegian-Danish seminary opened in Evanston, Ill. However, it was 1886 before classes were conducted regularly. The institution continued until 1934 when it merged with a Swedish school which in 1950 became KENDALL COLLEGE, an accredited Methodist junior college. The conference established the Elim Old People's Home in MINNEAPOLIS in 1914; the home and its assets were valued at $54,000 at the time of merger in 1943.

The Norwegian and Danish Conference was the last of all the language conferences in Methodism to be absorbed by the English-speaking conferences. The conference disbanded May 30, 1943. At the time its boundaries included all of the United States east of the Rocky Mountains. In its last year the Norwegian and Danish Conference had two districts—Chicago and Minneapolis—and it reported forty-eight charges, 4,737 members, and property valued at $710,088.

NORWEGIAN METHODISM IN THE U.S.A. In 1851 Ole P. Petersen (see NORWAY), a native Norwegian, was sent by the M. E. Church as preacher to the Norwegian settlers in northeastern IOWA. As a result of his work in that district the first Methodist congregation among Norwegians in the United States was established at Washington Prairie, Winneshiek County, Iowa, in April, 1852. Methodist activity among Norwegian immigrants spread to more and more places. In 1856 it was decided that all Norwegian missions in WISCONSIN, Iowa, and MINNESOTA were to be united into one district, the Norwegian Mission District. From the register of appointments for 1857 it appears that mission work was done at the following places: Cambridge, Racine, Hart Prairie, Primrose, Viroqua, and Richland, Wis.; Upper Iowa, Winneshiek County; St. Paul and Chisago Lake, Minn.

In 1863 the Danish brethren in Wisconsin were incorporated into the Norwegian District.

In 1870 the Norwegian-Danish District made an agreement with NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Evanston, Ill., for the organization of a department for Norwegian and Danish students. A class was started the same year. On July 3, 1875, the Norwegian and Danish Educational Society of the M. E. Church was incorporated.

In 1879 the MINNESOTA ANNUAL CONFERENCE was held at Winona, Oct. 1-6, under the chairmanship of Bishop JESSE T. PECK. This Annual Conference passed a resolution, or memorial, addressed to the coming GENERAL CONFERENCE; the closing paragraph reads as follows:

Although the relationship between the Norwegian and the American brethren at this Conference has for many years been as harmonious and brotherly as could be desired, we are nevertheless of the opinion that work amongst the Norwegians will be furthered to the best advantage if the Norwegians were to establish their own separate Annual Conference; and we would therefore humbly request this General Conference which is about to take place to consider the suitability of establishing such a separate organization.

Pursuant to this in 1880 the Norwegian and Danish preachers in the United States all met together in an Annual Conference of their own for the first time. At that date the connection with American Methodism had been in existence for twenty-nine years. This Annual Conference took place at Racine, Wis., Sept. 9-13, under the chairmanship of Bishop W. L. HARRIS. THE NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE had then 2,266 members, with a further 274 on probation, and there were forty-three churches.

At the annual Conference of 1883, at Racine, Wis., it was decided to establish a Norwegian-Danish School of Theology, and the session the following year decided that this school was to be at Evanston, Ill. In 1890 the foundation for publishing activities was laid in the Norwegian-Danish Publishing Society. This enterprise was merged with the Methodist BOOK CONCERN in 1914.

On Dec. 23, 1896, the Norwegian and Danish Methodist Preachers' Aid Society was established, and on Aug. 20, 1914, a home for elderly members was opened in Chicago. This bore the name of "Elim Home."

The Norwegian-Danish congregations thereafter steadily continued their work. But in consequence of the steady decrease in the number of immigrants coming from NORWAY and DENMARK, and the fact that the early immigrants and their descendants had become Americanized, the number of Norwegian-Danish congregations grew smaller, until they were eventually all merged into American Methodism, according to a decision adopted by the Uniting Conference in 1939. The last Norwegian-Danish Conference convened in Trinity Church, Racine, Wis., on May 26, 1943, under the chairmanship of Bishop E. L. WALDORF.

NORWICH, Norfolk, England, has always been an important agricultural and manufacturing center in East Anglia. In the eighteenth century it was, as it is now, a city of churches and a stronghold of nonconformity. It was the third city in the country, and therefore it was natural that JOHN WESLEY's visits should be frequent. On his first visit, in July 1754, he was accompanied by his brother CHARLES, their host being Captain (later Colonel) Gallatin, in whose house the first recognized Methodist service was held. As John was far from well, Charles was the preacher; and it was he who a few days later took a seven-years' lease on an old brew house, on the site of a former bell foundry near the castle, in which building, known as the Foundery, the first regular society of eighteen members was formed. Services were held there for about seven years, and the society seems to have had a fairly steady existence, apart from some violent persecution by the Hell-Fire Club, composed of papists, Non-jurors, Jacobites and others.

In 1758 Wesley negotiated a seven-years' lease on the "Tabernacle," a fine meetinghouse designed by the famous Norwich architect Thomas Ivory and opened in 1753 by GEORGE WHITEFIELD for the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGTON'S connection. Here it was that the notorious Calvinistic Methodist preacher James Wheatley officiated. After his expulsion from Wesleyan Methodism in 1749 for immorality, he had established himself in Norwich, though also persecuted by the Hell-Fire Club, until misconduct again led to his disappearance. It is not surprising that at the Tabernacle Wesley found a congregation whose instability (many were Antinomians or Sandemanians) nearly drove him to despair, evoking such comments as: "I told them they were the most ignorant, self-conceited, self-willed, fickle, intractable, disorderly, disjointed Society in the three kingdoms" (Journal, iv, 351, Sept. 9, 1759); or "I have had more trouble with this Society than with half the Societies in England put together" (Journal, v, 36, Oct. 11, 1763). This state of things was reflected in the membership, which shrank from about 330 to 170 when the Tabernacle was vacated at the expiration of the lease.

In 1766 the society rented from the General Baptists a chapel in St. James' Parish and continued to worship there until 1769, when the members realized their longcherished ambition to have a building of their own. The stigma caused by Wheatley's behavior had made it difficult for them to purchase a plot of ground, but eventually a site was procured in Cherry Lane, and the new chapel, to which Wesley contributed £270, was opened by him in October 1769. Here the Norwich Wesleys worshiped for forty-two years; the cause prospered, the membership increasing from 160 to 250, the congregation rising to 500. This was partly due to preachers like GEORGE SHADFORD, JOSEPH PILMORE, RICHARD WHATCOAT (the American Methodist pioneer), and ADAM CLARKE, who were all stationed in Norwich in this period. John Wesley's last sermon in Norwich was preached in Cherry Lane in 1790, when he was eighty-seven. He wrote: "But the house would in no wise hold the congregation. How wonderfully is the tide turned. I am become an honourable man at Norwich."

By 1809 the problem of increasing numbers made a new place of worship necessary. A convenient site was found in nearby Calvert Street, and in June 1811 a capacious chapel was opened by THOMAS COKE. This building is still used for Methodist worship. A second chapel was soon needed, and in October 1824, St. Peter's Chapel, in Lady-Lane, was opened by ROBERT NEWTON, then president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. For some years it was said that no less than two thousand people attended Methodist services every Sunday; a third chapel, "New City," was opened in 1839, seating six hundred, in a populous district near St. Peter's. As a result, however, of the disastrous events of 1849 the Norwich Circuit was torn asunder. The excommunicated rebels, the WESLEYAN REFORMERS, made the Calvert Street Chapel their headquarters, taking over New City as well. Among their leaders were W. H. Cozens-Hardy, Robert Daws, and John Clarke, who left their mark on the public and religious life of Norwich.

The PRIMITIVE METHODIST connection had entered Norwich as far back as 1821; outstanding among them were ROBERT KEY and the woman traveling preacher ELIZABETH BULTITUDE. The Primitive Methodists divided the city among themselves, and in 1932 there were three separate circuits in Norwich.

From 1868 the WESLEYAN REFORM UNION, set up in 1859 by the Reformers who would not enter the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in the union of 1857, has had a strong branch in the city.

Each section of Norwich Methodism for long had powerful Sunday schools. After the Union of 1932 there was a steady movement toward consolidation of Methodism in the city; the Primitive Methodist circuits disappeared as separate entities, and in 1966 there were only two circuits, the Calvert Street and St. Peter's Circuits, with sixteen and eighteen societies respectively. Norwich was a good example of the crippling effect which the mid-nineteenth century divisions had on the progress of Methodism; a new start has been made, however, since 1945.

NORWOOD, FREDERICK ABBOTT (1914-), American minister, educator, and historian, was born in San Diego, Calif., on July 11, 1914, the son of Frederick A. and Florence (Abbott) Norwood. He received the B.A. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN in 1936; the B.D. from Yale in 1939; and a Ph.D. there in 1941. His wife, whom he married on June 14, 1943, was Florence Louise Corbett, and their children are Mary Beth and Pamela Zoe. Dr. Norwood joined the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1941, was ordained a deacon in 1943, and came into full connection in 1944. He served for a time as a minister in OHIO, 1942-46, and then became the professor of history at BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE, Berea, Ohio, 1946-52. He took the chair of church history at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in Evanston, Ill., in 1952, and continues in that position.

He has been a member of the General Commission for the Methodist BICENTENNIAL, a Guggenheim Fellow, American Association of Theological Schools Fellow, and is the author of The Reformation Refugees as an Economic Force, 1942; The Development of Modern Christianity, 1956; History of the North Indiana Conference, 1917-1956, 1957; Church Membership in the Methodist Tradition, 1958; Great Moments in Church History, 1962, and Strangers and Exiles, a history of Religious Refugees, 2 vols. 1969. He was a member of the Editorial Board of The History of American Methodism and of Methodist History. He contributed the general article Methodism to the Encyclopaedia Britannica and numerous articles to professional journals. He is upon the editorial board and supervisory committee of the Encyclopedia of World Methodism.

NOTSON, GARY THOMPSON (1865-1956), American M.E. minister and hospital administrator, was born near Lamoni, Decatur County, Iowa on Sept. 19, 1865. Educated in the public schools, he was active in the printing business until 1891 when he entered the ministry in the DES MOINES ANNUAL CONFERENCE. In 1893 he transferred to the DAKOTA ANNUAL CONFERENCE where he served churches at Flandreau, Sioux Falls, Elk Point, Centerville, Pierre and Alexandria until 1910. In that year he was appointed district superintendent of the Huron District, a position which he held until 1914.

Notson was active in the Church Federation of Dakota, the SOUTH DAKOTA Historical Society and as a trustee of DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. His achievements were recognized in 1913 when Dakota Wesleyan conferred upon him an honorary D.D. In 1914 he became executive secretary for the newly organized Methodist State Hospital, Mitchell, S.D., and completed two financial campaigns for $100,000 and $80,000 so that the hospital was dedicated on Feb. 10, 1918. He continued in this position until 1920 when he transferred to the NORTHWEST IOWA ANNUAL CONFERENCE as superintendent of the Methodist Hospital, Sioux City. Here he raised some $500,000 for the work and remained in the post until 1938 when he accepted a retired relationship. In 1939 he returned to South Dakota as director of the Sanatorium and Hospital, a city institution in Chamberlain. He died on Dec. 2, 1956 in Sioux City, Iowa.

NOTTINGHAM, England. One of England's smaller industrial towns, situated in the Midlands, Nottingham grew rapidly as a result of the eighteenth-century industrial expansion. The earliest record of Methodist activity there centers round a Mr. Howe, who preached at Nottingham Cross and later at the house of Matthew Bagshaw in Crossland Yard, Narrow Marsh. The house had to be modified by removing the ceiling from the living room and allowing the men to sit upstairs and the ladies down, with the preacher perched on a chair on a table in the middle of the downstairs room.

JOHN WESLEY came himself to Nottingham in 1741, and though most accounts of that visit record his favorable impression of the countryside, few recall his observation made of the early Methodists in Nottingham: "I could not but observe . . . that when I began to pray there appeared to be a general surprise, none once offering to kneel down, and those who stood, choosing the most easy indolent posture which they conveniently could." However, Methodism grew considerably in the next twenty years and heard many of the well-known preachers, including JOHN NELSON and THOMAS COKE. In July, 1757, John Wesley remarked that what was needed most was a larger house. In 1764 the Octagon, or Tabernacle, was opened at a cost of £124. Nottingham at that time was under the Methodist direction of DERBY. In 1776 a separate Nottingham circuit was established. In 1777 there were 700 members; 1787, 800; 1791, 1,000; 1797, 1,400.

In 1783 the Tabernacle was sold to the General Baptists, and a new church at Hockley was opened. Linked to the opening of this church, which was to become the center of much controversy, is the name of a famous preacher in Nottingham, Thomas Tatham. Meanwhile, in 1796, ALEXANDER KILHAM was expelled from the Wesleyan connection for his publications regarding ecclesiastical polity. In 1797 the members of the Hockley church voted by 320 to 280 to follow him, and the trustees being in the majority group refused to receive preachers designated by the old connection. In a lengthy discussion between the friends of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION and the friends of the old, the main object of the action taken by the trustees of the Hockley Church was to force the itinerant preachers to admit the People into the yearly Assembly. In spite of the threat of litigation, the Methodist New Connexion retained the use of Hockley Chapel, and the Wesleyan Methodists were obliged to meet temporarily at Beck Barn, and in 1799 to open a new church at Halifax place (thanks to Thomas Tatham). The two Methodist groups indulged in a great deal of wordy polemic through the next generation, but they thrived on it. In 1804 the new church at Halifax Place had to be enlarged; in 1816 the New Connexion built a new church in Parliament Street, and in 1818 Hockley was returned to the Wesleyans. In 1826 Parliament Street had to be enlarged, and in 1839 Wesley Chapel, Broad Street, was built. The controversial church at Hockley was then sold to the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, who had entered Nottingham in 1815.

SARAH KIRKLAND, a famous woman evangelist, had first come to Nottingham to conduct open-air services in the forest. CAMP MEETINGS were held in Nottingham Forest (also known for its associations with Robin Hood), being led in by HUGH BOURNE and in 1818 by WILLIAM CLOWES. Room for the Primitive Methodists was found at the Old Factory, Broad Marsh (a room above a disused smithy); and there preparatory meetings were held before the Primitive Methodist Church was constituted formally in Nottingham in 1819. Nottingham remained a center of Primitive evangelism, William Clowes being sent from Hull to work there. In 1823 Canaan Street

Chapel was opened to seat nine hundred persons, built in what one commentator called the "barnic style." In 1839 they bought Hockley and created the second Nottingham circuit; Nottingham's third and fourth were created in 1877 (Forest Road), and 1889 (Mayfield Road), respectively, and by the time of METHODIST UNION in 1932 there were six Primitive Methodist circuits in and around the city.

In 1907, the Methodist New Connexion in Nottingham found added strength in union with the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, which was fairly strong in the area. Perhaps the most important fact in their Nottingham history, however, was their loss, in the mid-nineteenth century, of the services of a young minister called WILLIAM BOOTH, who, either from inability to come to terms with the administration of the church, or through fear of being expelled from the connection as had been his former minister and friend, SAMUEL DUNN, resigned, and later became famous as General Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army.

By 1932 both the Wesleyans and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH had four circuits in Nottingham, making fourteen in all with the Primitive Methodists. There were many small chapels that had been sponsored by businessmen for their employees; and though in 1935 the number of circuits was reduced to six, there still remained a problem of redundancy. None of the chapels existing today is of great age, and those with the longest history have been rebuilt since they were founded. Many have known a period of success when the seating was not adequate, and observers in the nineteenth century noted other inadequacies—for example, the ventilation: "What streams of condensed vapour, unable to escape into the common sewer of the open firmament, have been seen running down the chapel walls." The desire for greater comfort as the churches became more middle class—and in one case for "more commodious family pews"—led to the frequent modification and sometimes the demolition and reconstruction of the buildings. In 1902 the Wesleyan Methodists, moved by the FORWARD MOVEMENT, bought the Albert Hall to set up a Central Mission. Unfortunately, the building caught fire just after the purchase, and the project was almost dropped. However, money was found to restore the building and the hall finally opened in 1909.

Of all the churches in Nottingham the Albert Hall is now the best known. In 1956 a further improvement was the opening of Methodist International House to care especially for overseas students. The Methodist CONFERENCE was held in Nottingham in 1945 and 1957. The famous Faith and Order Conference—"Unity begins at Home"—which set before all the British churches the target of unification by 1980, was held at Nottingham in 1964.

NOYES, HENRY SANBORN (1822-1872), American scholar and University president, was born in Landaff, N. H., Dec. 24, 1822. While preparing for college at Newbury Seminary, Newbury, Vt., he served as assistant instructor in mathematics and Latin in 1845 and 1846. He graduated from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., in 1848, at which time he also was instructor at Springfield Wesleyan Seminary, Springfield, Vt. He returned to Newbury in 1850 to teach mathematics, Greek and German. In 1854 he became principal of Newbury Seminary and continued teaching Greek and moral philosophy. Henry Noyes and Harriet Verback, a student in the Seminary, were married Feb. 16, 1849. Mrs. Noyes subsequently became preceptress during her husband's administration.

Noyes was elected professor of mathematics at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, EVANSTON, Ill., in June 1854, but did not move to Evanston until June 1855. Noyes became the president of the University and held the post as manager, promoter and central figure of that institution for ten years. He died May 24, 1872.

As a scholar Henry Noyes was at home in several languages. He could recite long passages from Homer from memory, and it is said that at one time, while in Evanston, he heard a mathematics class in Greek. It was his custom to award diplomas to the graduating classes in Latin.

ELDON H. MARTIN

NUELSEN, JOHN LOUIS (1867-1946), bishop, scholar and ecumenist, was the son of an American Methodist minister, Heinrich NuelSEN, who had emigrated from GERMANY in 1842 and served in Europe as a pastor from 1851-89. John Louis was born in ZURICH, SWITZERLAND, on Jan. 19, 1867. He shared in the itinerancy of the family and went to high school and junior college (Gymnasium) in Karlsruhe and Bremen, Germany. On the return to America, John NuelSEN started his studies at DREW UNIVERSITY, where he obtained his B.D. degree. After further academic training in the States, he pursued his study of theology at the German Universities of Berlin and Halle. There followed a period of ministerial work at Sedalia, Miss., after which he taught classical languages at the Methodist College in SAINT PAUL, Minn. Then for five years he taught exegetical theology at CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Warrenton, Miss. In 1899 he became theological professor at the Nast Theological Seminary in Berea, Ohio, where he taught both in German and in English for nine years, using both languages in his writings. Between 1896 and 1908 he published five books in German, and two in English—significantly one on Luther, and one, in 1908, on Some Recent Phases of German Theology.

By this time he had become widely known also through his addresses at SUNDAY SCHOOL and youth conventions and his Bible studies at CAMP MEETINGS. This may partially explain, why, at the age of forty-one, he was in 1908 elected bishop, being given episcopal supervision of the Omaha Area.

He proved to be an excellent administrator and parliamentarian. In 1912 he was sent to Europe to succeed Bishop WILLIAM BURT. With his office in Zurich he supervised the whole of Methodism in Europe and North Africa from that point. Two years later, World War I broke out and made work very difficult for him. He always regarded nationalism as a very real danger to Christianity. Even when he no longer had access to certain countries, he planned ahead what should be done after the war. It was then that his name became "known from Paris to Moscow, from Rome to Stockholm." His relief work, particularly for the children of the European countries, proved a magnificent contribution. This as well as his scholarly interpretation of the two continents each to the other, and his ecumenical spirit were the reasons why the University of Berlin conferred upon him the honorary degree of a theological doctor, through the hands of its famous dean and New Testament scholar, Professor Adolf Deissmann. This was a singular thing to happen to a Methodist and was the beginning of ecumenical acceptance. After the reorganization of Continental Methodism, NuelSEN became the bishop of the CENTRAL EUROPEAN CENTRAL CONFERENCE, which first met in 1925.

John NuelSEN was called a "Bridge builder" between Germany and America and a true ecumenist. In addition to his heavy load of administration and the traveling it demanded it is surprising how many books he published from 1920 onward. To a significant extent he wrote of Methodism and its role as a free church. But historical research engrossed him more and more. He edited and to a great degree himself wrote a fine volume in German on the history of Methodism (2 editions). Also valuable are his contributions on JOHN WESLEY and the German hymns; and on JOHN WILLIAM FLETCHER (1929). His book on the ORDINATION in Methodism (1935), suggested as a subject by J. W. E. SOMMER, became influential in molding German and European thought on the theology of ordination, and the concept of one ordination only. It is due to him and J. W. E. Sommer that the Germany Central Conference knows only one ordination (since 1948). As an ecumenist NuelSEN contributed largely to overcome state church prejudice against what had been called "sectarian" Methodism. As an excellent theologian, an aristocratic leader of people and a tireless pastor of pastors he possessed profile and gained admiration and affection. He retired in May, 1939, after the Uniting Conference held in Kansas City. Four years after he retired he died in Bethesda Hospital, CINCINNATI, Ohio.

NUREMBERG, Germany, is one of the old historic cities of Europe. The circuits established there are in the South Germany Annual Conference. British Wesleyan and the Episcopal Methodism of the United States both started work about the same time in Nuremberg. In 1875 the Wesleyan ministers, Beutenmueller from Munich, and Boettcher from Kirchberg/Jagst, visited Nuremberg to give religious addresses. On Jan. 1, 1877, J. J. Sommer took over the Wesleyan mission, and a month and a half later founded a local church with seven members.

The M.E. Church (U.S.A.), after the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1876, sent J. Zipperer to Nuremberg in order to find out whether the city was suitable for missionary enterprise. On Nov. 2, 1876, J. Kaufmann took over; and in February 1877, a church was founded and four people were received as members. At the Annual Conference of 1877, eighteen probationary members were reported. This evangelistic work radiated to many small towns and villages, but owing to state church opposition, only a few congregations were gathered.

The Wesleyan Church dedicated St. Paul's Chapel on Feb. 9, 1890, the first Methodist church building in Bavaria. It was within the bounds of this circuit that J. G. Ekert in 1889 founded the deaconess mother-house, Martha-Maria. The Zion's Church of the Episcopal Methodist branch was dedicated in 1893. Both churches and the deaconess mother-house were destroyed during the Second World War on Jan. 2, 1945. The deaconess mother-house was rebuilt as Bavaria's most modern hospital (350 beds) from 1950-1969.

A new Zion's Church was dedicated on Nov. 5, 1950; a new St. Paul's Church on Jan. 31, 1954. The EVANGELISCHE GEMEINSCHAFT (EUG) also founded a congregation in Nuremberg. Members were looked after by the minister of Aalen from 1931 to 1948, and after 1948 by the minister of Munich. In February 1951, a congregation was founded by R. Kohlenbrenner and in 1956 a sanctuary was built at Humboldtstrasse. The congregation grew up to 100 members counting adherents. In connection with the union resulting in the United Methodist Church, this group became part of St. Paul's congregation. Both circuits are missionary minded, and at present have a total constituency of over 1,600.

Martha-Maria Deaconess Hospital (Mutter-haus Diakonie) at Nuremberg, is a well-equipped and well-staffed hospital and nursing home, situated on spacious grounds a little way out of the city. It has an excellent nursing corps and has quarters in its impressive main building for retired deaconesses as well as for those who give their lives in active service for their ministry of health and healing. Martha-Maria enjoys a deserved prestige both in its own community and all over Germany wherever its work has come to be known.

NUTTALL, EZRA (1850-1915), South African Wesleyan missionary was born in England on Nov. 4, 1850. His family was Anglican and a brother, Enos, became Archbishop of the West Indies. Ezra Nuttall entered the ministry in 1871 and came to SOUTH AFRICA in 1875. He established a teachers' training and industrial institution for Africans at Edendale near Pietermaritzburg in Natal (which later became known by his name) and served in white circuits in Durban, Cape Town and East London. He was chairman in succession of the Natal, Cape of Good Hope and Queenstown districts, secretary of the South African Conference from 1901 to 1903, president of the Conference in 1895 and 1904, and was elected to be president of the Conference in 1916, the centenary year of South African Methodism, but died before assuming office on November 23, 1915. He was a powerful preacher, an able administrator and faithful friend of the African and Coloured peoples of South Africa.

OAK RIDGE INSTITUTE, Oak Ridge, N. C., though not a denominational school, was for many years closely associated and identified with the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church. From 1884 until 1915 it was owned and operated by Professors John Allen Holt and Martin Hicks Holt, brothers who were prominent Methodist Protestants. Most of the families in the Oak Ridge community were members of the Methodist Protestant faith and in 1889 a M.P. church was built on the grounds of the school.

The Institute was established in 1852 and prior to the War Between the States its course of study was largely oriented around the preparation of students for advanced classes at the University of North Carolina. In 1879 John Allen Holt was joined by Martin Hicks Holt, and not long afterward the trustees leased the school to the two brothers. In 1884 the Hols bought the school and in the same year a chapel and Literary Society Halls were built. In 1892 Holt Hall, with classrooms, a library, gymnasium, YMCA room and museum, was built. Benbow Hall for boarding students was built in 1905.

In 1889 there were 253 students of both sexes from several states and in 1908 there were nearly 300 students from many states and several foreign countries. The school was considered to be one of the best preparatory schools in the South and in 1898 was referred to as "the largest and best equipped Fitting School in the South." It trained hundreds of teachers for the public schools during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and there was a standing offer of free tuition to ministerial students of the M.P. denomination.

On Jan. 17, 1914, the Oak Ridge Chapel and many of the main buildings were burned. Following the deaths of Professor Martin Hicks Holt on Nov. 26, 1914, and Professor John Allen Holt on June 15, 1915, the alumni of Oak Ridge Institute rebuilt the school with each donor receiving a share or more of stock in a private corporation. The present-day institution, known as "Oak Ridge Military Institute," is governed by a board of trustees and its assets are operated through a nonprofit Oak Ridge Foundation.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., population 358,486, was established in 1852, as a major port and transportation center at the east end of the SAN FRANCISCO Bay Bridge. Contiguous cities are Berkeley and Richmond to the north, Alameda, San Leandro and Hayward to the south. The first Methodist services were held in 1856 and the first Methodist church was organized in 1862 by C. E. Rich.

California College, established by Congregationalists and Presbyterians, became the University of California in 1868 under Oliver Fitzgerald, Methodist minister and state superintendent of public instruction. The East Oakland Church originated out of First Church in 1874 but was reunited in 1959 as First Church and became "one church with two locations" (913 members).

Southern Methodism came in fairly early and had one church. The fifteen Methodist churches extant in 1970 (5,034 members) include Chinese, Korean, Japanese, Filipino and two Negro congregations. Taylor Memorial (Negro) is largest in membership (1,342), Down's Memorial (Negro) is third in size (660). Neither was ever in the Central Jurisdiction. Former Portuguese, German and Norwegian-Danish congregations became the base for Good Shepherd, Montclair and Lake Park churches. Fred Finch Children's Home, seventy-five years old, is now serving disturbed teenagers. Two retirement homes are operated: Beulah and the new Lake Park. In 1863 the A.M.E. CHURCH purchased a former site of First Church. The Negro population was quite small until World War II but is now large and growing. There are two A.M.E., one C.M.E., one A.M.E. Zion churches. Forty percent of the city's population is composed of minority groups. There are no Free Methodists or Weslevans at present.

Fred Finch Children's Home is a child care agency of the CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church.

Captain and Mrs. Duncan Finch, active members of First Church, Oakland, gave the acreage on which it is built, known as the Brooklyn Fruit Ranch, in memory of their son, Fred. On Sept. 10, 1891, the California Conference and Lay Association of the M.E. Church officially received the gift and authorized the establishing of the Fred Finch Orphanage.

This agency of the Church has a distinctive record of changing services to keep pace with each transitional need of society. In 1936 the name was properly changed to the Fred Finch Children's Home. In 1961 the agency established a residential, psychiatric treatment facility for the emotionally disturbed adolescent, with consultation and therapy to the families of youth in residence.

OBERLIN, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. Neidig Memorial Church is the oldest congregation of the former E.U.B. Church east of the Susquehanna, and one of the oldest in the entire denomination.

It is not exactly known when the people who were to be referred to as Neidig's Leute (Neidig's People) first gathered together in one another's homes for worship. Presumably this was about 1790, when JOHN NEIDIG, SR., was chosen by lot to be a preacher among the Mennonites. They erected their first house of worship in 1793, as documents prepared by Neidig himself record both the cost of the building and the subscriptions secured to pay for the building. However, the record of the transaction which secured their land from John Roop for five shillings was not filed in the Recorder's Office of Dauphin County until Aug. 4, 1803.

The building erected in 1793 was constructed of stone and measured about thirty by forty feet. The interior was plain and contained only a table along one wall, and chairs for the members of the congregation. It is said that as the building was going up, a cynical bystander remarked that "a house about the size of a corn crib would accommodate them for all time to come." It really appeared that this cynical remark might be fulfilled for as late as 1852 the Quarterly Conference minutes listed only twenty-four members in the class, in spite of the fact that a larger frame building had been erected in 1850 to replace the original building. However, by 1887 the situation had changed. What had once been open country was now a small town, and a new and larger building was erected in 1887. This has been added to on several occasions since then. The most recent addition is the education unit and children's chapel constructed in 1961. In 1970 Neidig Church had a membership of 381.

O'BRYAN, WILLIAM (1778-1868). British founder of BIBLE CHRISTIANS was born Feb. 6, 1778, at Gunwen, Luxulian, Cornwall. He became a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER in 1802. His preaching was attended by extraordinary outpourings of spiritual power, and he established many causes. In 1814 he relinquished his business to devote himself entirely to preaching, and evangelized much of North Devon and Cornwall. Twice expelled from Methodism for excessive zeal, in October 1815, he formed an independent society thus founding the Bible Christian connection. In time, however, his authoritarian rule as president of the Conference aroused resistance, though he continued to be loved and revered. Leaving the connection, he went to America in 1831 and served in NEW YORK and CANADA. He paid six visits to England, the last in 1861, when he preached in many Bible Christian chapels. He died Jan. 8, 1868, and was buried in Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCALA, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church probably originated in the work of John L. Jerry, who was sent in 1827 to serve St. Augustine and Alachua Mission. This was the official beginning of Methodist work in north central FLORIDA. The southern point of this circuit "250 miles around" was Fort King, which had been established in 1825 as an Indian agency, and became in 1827 a military post.

A post office was established in Marion County in 1845, and was designated Ocala in 1847. The Camp King Mission was set up by the GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1844, in the Newnansville District. The Board of Managers of the Missionary Society of the FLORIDA CONFERENCE reported on April 4, 1845: "Camp King Mission: This mission was under the pastoral care of Rev. E. L. T. Blake; has 74 white and 18 colored members, and promises much good."

The Ocala Circuit and Marion Mission were placed in the newly created TAMPA District in 1852. In 1867 the Ocala District was organized, and maintained for two years. In 1880, during the second year of the pastorate of H. E. Partridge, the Ocala church became a station appointment, with forty-nine members. This was increased to seventy-nine at the close of 1881.

The first church building was erected in 1850 to be replaced by a rather large church edifice in 1890. This served until the present sanctuary was erected in 1952, under the pastorate of George A. Foster. The Mabel Rich Educational Building was added in 1967, while Bruce F. Gannaway served as pastor.

First Church has grown to a membership of 2,308 with property valued at almost $1,000,000. It is credited with advance gifts of close to $25,000, including full support of a missionary couple.

OCEAN CITY, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., a resort town in Cape May County, was founded on Sept. 10, 1879, by a group of Methodists interested in establishing "a Christian Seaside Resort." On Oct. 20, 1879, the Ocean City Association was incorporated. The following year the Ocean City Tabernacle Association, a permanent organization which is still active, was established to preserve the "ideals of the founders."

In the same year, 1880, the present First Church, Ocean City, first called St. Peter's M.E. Church, was organized.

Church services were held from 1880 to 1883 in a hall, and later in the local school building. The cornerstone of the original frame church building was laid on Aug. 20, 1880. This building was replaced in 1908 by a stone structure which is still in use. Since 1956 a new educational building has been erected and the sanctuary greatly enlarged and renovated.

Through the years of Ocean City's history there has been a sincere attempt to retain the Christian atmosphere which characterized the original founding of the city. Moderate Sunday closing laws have been consistently maintained, though not without struggle and effort. The sale of alcoholic beverages has never been permitted within the city limits. Special religious services flourish during the summer season. Both the Ocean City Tabernacle Association and First Methodist Church sponsor services in Boardwalk Theatres on Sunday evening. The Tabernacle Association also holds two Sunday morning services in its own building and sponsors a week-long "CAMP MEETING."

Since 1942 the NEW JERSEY ANNUAL CONFERENCE has held its annual sessions in Ocean City. In 1944 Ocean City was the site of the Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

OCEAN GROVE, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., was founded in 1869 and obtained a charter from the NEW JERSEY legislature as the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association of The M.E. Church. That charter empowered the original twenty-six trustees and their successors (thirteen ministers and thirteen laymen) to acquire land, build, and establish a "convenient and permanent" Christian seaside resort and camp meeting.

From early June until after Labor Day, the Ocean Grove program embraces youth meetings, Bible classes, preaching missions, Sunday school classes, religious and cultural movies, concerts, organ recitals, religious drama, and twice every Sunday worship services in the great auditorium. The season is climaxed by what has become famous as the Ocean Grove camp meeting—a ten day evangelic program, concluding Labor Day Sunday.

Many religious conferences hold their annual sessions here. One thing for which Ocean Grove is particularly well known is the Sunday rules. These include a rule barring traffic and all automobiles must be off the streets before midnight Saturday and until midnight Sunday so that on the Sabbath the twenty miles of Ocean Grove streets are devoid of cars. The calm and quiet are almost unimaginable! Most persons park their cars in the perimeter parking lots.

The title to all property within the limits of Ocean Grove remains with the Association. It does not sell property outright, but it does lease home lots to individuals under 99-year renewable contracts. These leases cannot be assigned except to persons vouched for as to good moral character and in sympathy with Ocean Grove's purposes. As a result, Ocean Grove reserves its lands for its chartered purposes—Christian experience.

ODA, KANEO (1902-1965), first bishop of the JAPAN FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was converted to Christianity while in high school. At the age of seventeen he felt called to the ministry. He graduated from Osaka Seminary, studied in SEATTLE PACIFIC COLLEGE, and completed work for his doctorate at San Francisco Theological Seminary.

Appointed a missionary to CHINA by the Japan Free Methodist Church in 1939, he established a thriving congregation in Peking. Repatriated in 1946, he was elected superintendent of the Japan Conference.

Conference superintendent and bishop, professor and college president, evangelist, able interpreter and translator, Oda made a valuable contribution to the Free Methodist Church and the Christian movement in Japan. He was one of the first to propose a world-wide organization of Free Methodist churches. He served on the planning committees and was the first vice-president of the Free Methodist World Fellowship which was organized Jan. 12, 1962. He died in Osaka, Japan, Feb. 28, 1965.

ODESSA, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church has grown to become one of the greatest churches among the plains cities of western TEXAS. In September of 1900, a group of Methodists began holding services in a little Baptist church building in Odessa. The First Methodist Church was formally organized in January of 1901, with thirty-eight charter members, during the pastorate of T. L. Lallance. For a time services were held in the Ector County Courthouse, and then the members returned to the Baptist church building, where services were held until the first Methodist building was erected on its present site in 1908. A new brick structure was erected in 1938, and an educational building added in 1948. In 1949 a new sanctuary was built at a cost of $150,000, and educational facilities expanded in 1962.

On Nov. 12, 1965, the entire church plant was completely destroyed by fire. The congregation banded together to meet the challenge of the days of hardship caused by the fire, have completed what they feel to be one of the most beautiful and serviceable churches in the southwest. The church listed 2,390 members in 1970.

OESCHGER, OLIN EMERSON (1906-), church administrator and General Secretary of the BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES of The Methodist Church, was born on April 19, 1906, in Bay Port, Mich. He was educated at NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE (A.B., 1927); University of Michigan (M.A., 1928); ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (L.H.D., 1958). He married Marie M. Finkbeiner in 1932, and they have one daughter. He was for a time in the business office of the University of Michigan Hospital at Ann Arbor, Mich. Then he became the administrative assistant and personnel director of the Board of Hospitals and Homes of The Methodist Church from 1945-56, when he was elected General Secretary of that Board. He served on many important committees of his church and was chairman of the Joint Committee on Hospitals and Homes of The Methodist Church, and of the E.U.B. Church; on the Committee of Aging of the National Social Welfare Assembly; on the Association of Church Social Workers (former treasurer); American Hospital Association, and American Protestant Hospital Association.

As General Secretary Dr. Oeschger was responsible for administering the work of this coordinating, standardizing and consultative agency for more than 280 affiliated hospitals and homes located in forty-one states. He retired on March 31, 1969.

OFFICIAL BOARD. This was the name of the administrative agency in each local church in the later years of American Methodism. It was composed of the stewards, trustees, and other church officials, and met apart from the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE and at more regular times—usually monthly. It was really the executive arm of the Quarterly Conference, and that Conference was counted on to approve actions of the Board that might need overall authority, since the members of the official board largely comprised the Quarterly Conference also.

In time, the Quarterly Conference was allowed to delegate some of its elective power to the Official Board, and in the latter days of The Methodist Church, the various commissions of the Church created by the Quarterly Conference were directed to report to the Official Board.

The name Official Board was done away in the Discipline of 1968—the term Administrative Board being adopted by The United Methodist Church. But the term "official board" is still freely used. Methodist bodies other than The United Methodist Church continue to use the name Official Board for the same type of local church agency.

OFFICIAL FORMS AND RECORDS, COMMITTEE ON, an office created within The Methodist Church in 1940 in order to correlate and produce a uniform system of records for reporting church statistics. Since 1952 it has been a committee of the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE. The membership has varied from five to the present eleven and includes a bishop, six Council members, an Annual Conference secretary, treasurer and statistician, and a district superintendent, with additional consultants. The initial work of the committee was correlating the different systems of records and forms of the churches forming The Methodist Church. The Committee meets annually, with an extended meeting at the beginning of each quadrennium to make major changes which may be necessary in report forms for the quadrennium.

The Committee cooperates with the General Agencies of the church in determining the contents of various reports, but final determination of the reports is the responsibility of the committee. This is true of all official reports except those in use in the local church school and by the Woman's Division. Official forms and records include quarterly conference reports, pastors' reports to the Annual Conference, local church financial and membership records and other forms helpful to pastors and bishops. The METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE prints all official forms and records.

OGDEN, BENJAMIN (1764-1834), American pioneer preacher of KENTUCKY and the Cumberland Valley, was born in NEW JERSEY, April, 1764. At an early age he was a soldier in the Revolutionary War. He embraced religion in 1784, the year the M.E. Church was organized. In 1786 he was one of the first two preachers appointed to Kentucky (both the same year). In 1787 he formed the Cumberland Circuit in the wilderness, the first preacher appointed there. At the end of the year he reported sixty-three members. The early Cumberland Circuit included NASHVILLE and all the forts and settlements on the north side of the Cumberland River, in the area between what later was Gallatin on the east and Clarksville on the west; it included some preaching points in adjoining sections of Kentucky.

In 1788 Ogden married Nancy Puckett of Mercer County, Ky., and went to VIRGINIA. He returned to the West in 1790 and continued to live there. For a while he withdrew from the Methodists.

However, he was again licensed to preach, re-admitted to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, and appointed in 1816 to Henderson Circuit. In 1817 he was again found in the traveling connection, but he soon sank a second time under the pressure of ill health but again reappeared in active service in 1824. For three years he did effective work on the Tennessee Mission, the Christian, and the Yellow Banks Circuits. In 1827 he took his place upon the superannuated list where he remained until his death.

Benjamin Ogden died, a member of the conference, at the residence of his son near Princeton, N. J., Nov. 20, 1834. Dying in peace after a life of suffering, he was buried near Princeton.

A plain, strong, effective preacher, Ogden did much to establish the Kentucky Conference. He engaged in missionary labors, and endured great hardship in preaching the gospel throughout the Mississippi Valley and to some of the Indian tribes.

The Kentucky Historical Society on Sept. 14, 1969, erected a highway marker to Benjamin Ogden. Harry R. Short, historian of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church, provided a brochure to be used on that occasion. The marker is as follows:

OGLESBY, JOSEPH (1782-1852), American pioneer preacher, was born in Virginia. He was admitted to the WESTERN CONFERENCE on trial in 1803 and was appointed with John Sale that year to the Miami Circuit in OHIO. In 1804 he was assigned to ILLINOIS Circuit. While on this circuit, he crossed into MISSOURI and preached in the Murphy Settlement, now Farmington, Mo. He "reconnoitred the Missouri country to the extremity of the settlements and had the pleasure of seeing the mighty hunter, Daniel Boone."

In 1806 the Whitewater Valley was organized into a circuit called the Whitewater Circuit. Oglesby was appointed to that newly formed circuit in the Ohio District.

Located in 1809 on account of his poor health, Oglesby, a man of superior talent, reentered the conference in 1811 and located again in 1815. Readmitted to the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1832, he was appointed presiding elder of the Bloomington District in 1834, serving for two years. Very popular among the early inhabitants, Joseph Oglesby traveled extensively through Indiana, Illinois and Missouri. An able administrator, acute thinker and effective preacher, he died in 1852.

OGLETHORPE, JAMES EDWARD (1696-1785), British philanthropist, prison reformer, and founder and first governor (1732-33) of the colony of GEORGIA in North America, approached JOHN WESLEY in 1735 to go as Anglican minister to the new colony. Wesley went as a missionary for the Society for Propagation of the Gospel, while CHARLES WESLEY accompanied him as Secretary for Indian Affairs and personal secretary to Oglethorpe. During their stay in Georgia (1736-37) the Wesleys became personally unpopular with the colonists and their relationship with Oglethorpe was often strained.

OHIO is a north central state which is bounded on the north by MICHIGAN and Lake Erie, on the east by PENNSYLVANIA and WEST VIRGINIA, on the south by WEST VIRGINIA and KENTUCKY, and on the west by INDIANA. Its area is 41,222 square miles and its population is 10,542,000 (1970). Ohio is the nation's third greatest industrial state, with countless industries which manufacture products that touch almost every American household. It leads in the production of tires, machine tools, business machines, glassware, and other items. It produces much steel, lime, coal, and coke. Also, Ohio is one of the wealthier agricultural states; its farm products are valued at more than $1,200,000,000 per year. The state has 100 institutions of higher learning, including four Methodist schools. Admitted to the Union in 1803, Ohio was the first state to be carved out of the Northwest Territory which was formed by Congress in 1787.

The first large scale settlement in Ohio was developed prior to 1785 in what was then Indian territory. Located near Martins Ferry, the village was declared illegal by the national government and the people were ordered to vacate the place. The settlers refused to leave; their situation was relieved when the Northwest Territory was formed.

The first Methodist sermon in Ohio was delivered by George Callahan in September, 1787. Callahan was one of the preachers on the Ohio Circuit located in VIRGINIA (now West Virginia) between WHEELING and PITTSBURGH. By invitation he preached in a log blockhouse at a place then called Carpenter's Station in Jefferson County, Ohio. Backwoodsmen armed with rifles, tomahawks, and scalping knives stood guard against a possible Indian attack while Callahan preached. Callahan promised to return. In 1793, Francis Clark, a local Methodist preacher who had served in Kentucky, preached to a few people at Fort Washington where CINCINNATI now stands.

The first Methodist society in Ohio was organized by Francis McCormick at Milford near what is now Cincinnati in 1797 or early 1798. Beginning with ten members, by fall the society grew to thirty-two; later it included the famous PHILIP GATCH and several of his family. McCormick held services in different places and soon organized two more classes. He appealed to the Kentucky preachers for help, but they had no ministers to spare. In 1798 Bishop ASBURY appointed JOHN KOBLER as presiding elder in Kentucky with instructions to go and form a circuit in Ohio. Kobler labored nine months and established a circuit up the two Miami Rivers toward DAYTON. In 1799 Lewis Hunt was appointed to the Miami Circuit, but his health failed and he was succeeded by Henry Smith whose name appears in the General Minutes as the first appointment in Ohio. Smith formed the Scioto Circuit some 400 miles in extent, and in 1800 he led in erecting the first Methodist church building in Ohio, a structure twenty-four feet square, located on Scioto Brush Creek in Adams County. The building was used for 20 years. The renowned PETER CARTWRIGHT was appointed to the Scioto Circuit in 1805, and to the Marietta Circuit in 1806. Appointed to a charge in Kentucky in 1807, he did not serve in Ohio again.

The Deerfield church in the Western Reserve, organized in 1801, is probably the oldest continuing Methodist congregation in Ohio. It was organized by Henry Shewell, a blind local preacher.

From the time Methodism began in Ohio down to 1812, the work in the eastern part of the state was attached to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, while that in the west was included in the WESTERN CONFERENCE. The 1812 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the OHIO CONFERENCE to include Ohio and eastern Kentucky. The first session of the Ohio Conference was held in October of that year at Chillicothe with Bishops ASBURY and MCKENDREE in charge. The conference began with sixty-one preachers and 23,644 members.

In 1816 the Salt River District of the Ohio Conference went to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE. In 1820 the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE was formed. When the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE was created in 1824 it included the part of Ohio east of the Muskingum and Tuscarawas Rivers. In 1836 the Ohio Conference was divided to form the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE, the latter including a part of northern Ohio as well as Michigan. In that same year extreme northeastern Ohio was taken from the Pittsburgh Conference and placed in the newly created ERIE CONFERENCE. In 1840 the Michigan Conference was divided to form the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE.

In 1852 the Ohio Conference was again divided to form the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE which included southwest Ohio and such work as the M.E. Church then had in Kentucky. In 1856 the North Ohio Conference was divided to form the Delaware Conference, the territory of the new body being northwest Ohio. After four years the name of the Delaware Conference was changed to the CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE.

The next change in boundaries came in 1876 when the Ohio parts of the Erie and Pittsburgh Conferences were detached and merged to form the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE. In 1912 the East Ohio and North Ohio Conferences merged to form the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE. In 1913 the Central Ohio and the Cincinnati Conferences merged to form the West Ohio Conference. Then in 1928 the West Ohio Conference was absorbed by the Ohio Conference. The Ohio and North-East Ohio Conferences continued in The Methodist Church in 1939.

In 1940 the two Ohio conferences became an episcopal area with the bishop's residence at COLUMBUS. Then in 1964 the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE designated each Ohio conference as an episcopal area, calling them the Ohio East and Ohio West Areas, with the episcopal residences in CANTON and Columbus. In 1964 the Ohio Conferences received some ministers and churches from the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE (CJ) as that body (excepting its Kentucky work) was absorbed by the overlying conferences of the North Central Jurisdiction.

The organization of the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church in 1819 grew out of missionary endeavor in Ohio. In 1816 JOHN STEWART, a free Negro from Virginia, felt impelled to go and preach to the Indians. Through an interpreter he preached to the WYANDOT INDIANS in Upper Sandusky. His work was so successful that it aroused interest in missions and led to the organization of the Missionary Society. The little church which the Wyandot Indians left when they were moved west in the 1840's is now a national Methodist historic SHRINE.

The work of the M.E. Church among the Germans began in Ohio. In January, 1835 WILLIAM NAST, the "Father of German Methodism," was converted in a revival meeting in Danville, Ohio. At the meeting of the Ohio Conference in August of that year Nast was appointed a missionary to the Germans. The German work soon spread to other states, and in 1864 the General Conference authorized a system of German-speaking annual conferences which continued for about sixty years.

Ohio Methodism was in the forefront in establishing institutions of higher learning. Before the rise of public high schools, the church operated academies as well as colleges. Prior to 1884 the M.E. Church in Ohio owned and controlled eleven academies and was related to nine others. In 1968 Ohio Methodism had four colleges, three of them over 100 years old. OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY was founded at Delaware in 1842, and BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE began at Berea in 1845. MOUNT UNION COLLEGE at Alliance opened in 1846. OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY was established at Ada in 1871. The Ohio conferences now maintain WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at six state supported schools. The 1956 General Conference authorized the building of two new theological seminaries, and the METHODIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL IN OHIO opened at Delaware in the fall of 1960. Ohio Methodists contributed more than $4,000,000 to help launch the institution. Then in 1965 the Ohio churches gave $7,000,000 more for the four Methodist colleges and the six Wesley Foundations in the state.

The Western Edition of the Christian Advocate was published in Cincinnati from 1834 to 1940. Beginning with THOMAS A. MORRIS in 1836, several of its editors were elected bishops.

Ohio Methodism owns, operates, or is related to a number of service institutions. There are seven homes for the aged: Bethesda Home, Wesley Home on College Hill, and Wesley Hall in Cincinnati; Crestview at Sylvania; Elyria Methodist Home; Wesley Glen at Columbus; Cope Methodist Home at Sebring; and Healthaven Nursing Home near Akron. The conferences are related to six hospitals: Bethesda and the Christ Hospital in Cincinnati, Flower Hospital at Toledo, Lake Park Hospital at Sylvania, Riverside Hospital at Columbus, and St. Luke's Hospital at Cleveland. Two homes for children are maintained: Berea Methodist Children's Home, and the Methodist Home for Children in Worthington.

The Mill Men's Hostel in Steubenville is an unconventional means of evangelism. The hostel serves both labor and management at the entrance to a large steel company. Steelworkers come in to read, chat, or seek counseling from the minister-director.

Ohio Methodism supports LAKESIDE on Lake Erie, one of the largest summer assembly grounds in the church. Dating back to an old time camp meeting in 1842, Lakeside continues its tradition of combining religion, education, culture, and recreation in its program.

Ohio Methodism has furnished leadership for the larger church. Sixteen members of the Ohio conferences have been elected bishop: Thomas A. Morris (1836), LEONIDAS L. HAMLINE (1844), EDWARD THOMSON (1864), STEPHEN M. MERRILL and WILLIAM L. HARRIS (1874), JOHN M. WALDEN (1884), ISAAC W. JOYCE (1888), WILLIAM F. McDOWELL (1904), WILBUR P. THIRKIELD (1912), HERBERT WELCH (1916), E. L. WALDORF (1920), WILBUR E. HAMMAKER (1936), SCHUYLER E. GARTH (1944), HAZEN G. WERNER (1948), F. GERALD ENGLISH (1952), and LANCE WEBB (1964). Nineteen other men who were born in Ohio have been elevated to the episcopacy while serving as members of conferences in other states or on the mission field: MATTHEW SIMPSON, EDWARD R. AMES, RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, JAMES M. THOBURN, EARL CRANSTON, CHARLES C. McCABE, DAVID H. MOORE, MERRIMAN C. HARRIS, NAPHTALI LUCCOCK, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, ADNA W. LEONARD, FRANKLIN E. C. HAMILTON, LAURESS J. BIRNEY, RALPH A. WARD, BRUCE R. BAXTER, CHARLES W. BRASHARES, HOBART B. AMSTUTZ, LLOYD C. WICKE, and RALPH T. ALTON.

Ohio Methodism produced such able leaders as RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER, missionary executive, and ERNEST FREMONT TITTLE and RALPH W. SOCKMAN, outstanding preachers.

Several important Methodist movements originated in Ohio. The FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY was organized in Cincinnati in 1866, the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY in the same city in 1880, and the EPWORTH LEAGUE in Cleveland in 1889.

METHODIST PROTESTANTISM was relatively strong in Ohio. The OHIO CONFERENCE was organized Oct. 15, 1829 at Cincinnati with ASA SHINN as president. Appointments were made to twenty-two charges at the first session. At the outset the conference comprised the entire west in its territory and it was thus the nucleus of a number of M.P. conferences. In 1833 the Ohio Conference reported 10,348 members, and at that time it was divided to form the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE which included Ohio east of the Scioto and Sandusky Rivers. In 1842 the Ohio part of the Pittsburgh Conference (MP) was designated as the Muskingum Conference which continued until 1918 when it was absorbed by the Ohio Conference (MP). The Ohio Conference came to unification in 1939 with seventy-four charges, eighty-six ministers, 21,464 members, and property valued at $1,130,350.

Beginning in 1876 when the Ohio parts of the Pittsburgh and Erie Conferences were merged to form the East Ohio Conference, all of Ohio Methodism except the churches in the Lexington Conference was then embraced in five annual conferences wholly within the state. That year the five conferences reported 157,317 members. The five conferences were reduced to three in 1912 and to two in 1928, and they came to unification in 1939 with 454,665 members and property valued at $42,441,285.

In 1968 the two Ohio conferences reported nineteen districts, 1,247 charges, 1,561 ministers, 619,116 members, property valued at $294,930,229, and a total of $42,960,776 raised for all purposes during the year.

By authority of the 1968 North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, the two Methodist and four E.U.B. annual conferences in Ohio voted to merge into two conferences to be known as the East Ohio and West Ohio Conferences. In 1970 the Ohio Conferences of The United Methodist Church reported 737,643 members, 1,703 charges, 2,310 ministers, and property valued at $409,746,225.

OHIO CONFERENCE (ME), was organized Oct. 1, 1812, at Chillicothe with Bishops ASBURY and MCKENDREE in charge. Incidentally it was at this session that the presiding elders were first asked to assist the bishops in making the appointments, thus constituting what today is called the bishop's CABINET. The conference was formed by dividing the WESTERN CONFERENCE. According to the Discipline, when created the Ohio Conference included the "Ohio, Muskingum, Miami, Kentucky and Salt River Districts." Those districts covered OHIO, eastern KENTUCKY eastern INDIANA, and a part of present day WEST VIRGINIA. The conference began with sixty-one preachers and 23,644 members. (See OHIO for beginnings of Methodism and for the creation of other conferences in the state.)

The Ohio Conference has continued to the present day, but through the years its boundaries have changed a number of times. It gave up territory to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1816, to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1820, to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1824, to the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE in 1836, and to the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE in 1852. After 1852 there was no major change in its boundaries until 1928 when it absorbed the WEST OHIO CONFERENCE. The membership of the Ohio Conference after each of the territorial alterations mentioned above was: 1816, 22,278; 1820, 34,178; 1824, 28,505; 1836, 47,874; 1852, 30,943; and 1928, 229,650.

From the beginning the Ohio Conference was interested in education. In 1822 it joined the Kentucky Conference in projecting AUGUSTA COLLEGE, Augusta, Ky., on the Ohio River. The school flourished for twenty-two years. As time passed a number of academies were launched, some under the control of the conferences and some conducted in the interest of the church under private ownership. In 1968 the Ohio Conference had two strong institutions of higher learning: OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Delaware, founded in 1842, which has an endowment of $20,000,000, a plant valued at $8,000,000, and over 2,500 students; and OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY at Ada, founded in 1871, which has some 2,400 students, a plant valued at $12,000,000 and an endowment of over $3,000,000. Six WESLEY FOUNDATIONS in the state are supported jointly by the two annual conferences.

The Methodist Home for Children was established in Worthington in 1911. The Bethesda Home, first Methodist home for the aged in Ohio, was established in CINCINNATI in 1899 with the cooperation of all the conferences in the state. Other Methodist homes for the aged within the bounds of the conference are: Crestview at Sylvania; Methodist Home on College Hill, and Wesley Hall in Cincinnati; and Wesley Glen at Columbus. The Ohio Conference is related to Bethesda and the Christ Hospitals in Cincinnati, Flower Hospital at Toledo, and Riverside Hospital at Columbus.

The Ohio Conference came to unification in 1939 with eleven districts, 539 charges, 251,667 members, and property valued at $21,965,501. At that time it merged with forty-three charges (about 12,000 members) of the OHIO CONFERENCE (MP) to form the Ohio Conference of The Methodist Church. In 1964 when the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE (CJ) was merged with the overlying conferences of the NORTH CENTRAL JURISDICTION, the Ohio Conference received the work of that conference which was within its bounds.

In 1964 the Ohio Conference was designated as an episcopal area with the bishop's residence at Columbus. F. GERALD ENSLEY was named as the resident bishop.

In 1968 the Ohio Conference reported eleven districts, 702 charges, 920 ministers, 345,157 members, property valued at $156,059,795, and $24,740,552 raised for all purposes during the year. At the time it was the second largest conference in the connection. In 1970 when Methodist-E.U.B. merger was fully effected, the name of the conference became the West Ohio Annual Conference.

OHIO CONFERENCE (EUB). Among the progressive measures of the ninth conference session of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in the historic year of 1816, was the appointment of Adam Henney and Frederick Shower to form circuits in the new state of OHIO. Shower abandoned his field but Henney established Canton Circuit, embracing eight or ten counties and a round of 400 miles. Meanwhile the church fathers in PENNSYLVANIA held the first session of a GENERAL CONFERENCE and adopted a permanent church name, Die Evangelische Gemeinschaft (Evangelical Association). Henney gave the first report of the work in Ohio in 1817: eight converts, thirty-three accessions, and a membership of fifty-five.

At this time Ohio was called "The Far Western Country." However, for eleven years (1816-27), thirty preachers made one or more long tedious trips on horseback over the Allegheny Mountains, traveling an average of approximately 800 miles to Ohio and return for the annual conference sessions.

In 1823, the western field was separated from Salem District of the Mother Conference and named the Ohio District. In 1826, it was constituted the Western Conference, and this conference saw a remarkable expansion from 1822 to 1839. From four circuits and five preachers on one district, it grew to thirty-nine men, twenty fields, and four districts; and its membership increased from 523 to 3,653. Operations by 1839 had extended over western Pennsylvania, Ohio, southern MICHIGAN, INDIANA, northern ILLINOIS, and into WISCONSIN.

The General Conference of 1839 reformed the two conferences into the East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, and Ohio.

Editor W. W. ORWIC, commenting on the remarkable extension of the Ohio Conference bounds in these years, with five districts reaching into five states, declared, "This conference is now the largest in the Evangelical Association, both in the number of members and ministers, and the bounds of its territory." A change came in 1844, when the Ohio Conference session at Red Haw, Ohio, organized the Illinois Conference out of the Indiana and Illinois Districts.

Out of territory in western Pennsylvania developed by the Ohio men, the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE was organized in 1851. The mission work in Michigan, carried on for nineteen years, was organized into the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE at the 1864 session of the Ohio Conference.

After the Ohio Conference changed to the use of English, the German congregations in the region of Lake Erie, still being replenished by new immigrants from Germany, were formed into a conference in 1876, called the Erie Conference. Many strong churches were developed by this conference but by 1923 they also had become English and were reunited with the Ohio Conference.

The Ohio United Conference (UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH) was organized in 1892 by a group which had withdrawn from the Evangelical Association. After thirty years of growth and effective service a happy reunion was effected with the Ohio Conference in 1924.

In 1951, after 135 years of notable history, the Ohio Conference, with 126 ministers and 160 churches, was dissolved and a membership of over 26,000 was transferred to three former UNITED BRETHREN conferences: OHIO East, OHIO SOUTHEAST, and OHIO SANDUSKY CONFERENCES of the E.U.B. Church.

OHIO CONFERENCE (MP) was organized at CINCINNATI on Oct. 15, 1829 with ASA SHINN as president. The conference included most of the territory west of the Allegheny Mountains. The majority of the ministers who attended had been local preachers in the M.E. Church. At its first session the conference ordained two deacons and twelve elders, and it stationed twenty-two men. Most of the preachers were appointed to localities with the hope that they would be able to form circuits, because at the time only a few circuits and stations of the M.E. Church had cast their lot with the new denomination. In 1830 the conference reported 3,791 members. In the next three years between fifteen and twenty preachers were added to the itineracy, and in 1833 the conference reported 10,348 members.

In 1833 the Ohio Conference was divided to form the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, the Sandusky and Scioto Rivers to be the dividing line. In 1836 and 1839 the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, and the INDIANA CONFERENCE, respectively, were set off from the Ohio Conference. Then in 1842 the Ohio part of the Pittsburgh Conference, save the extreme northeastern segment of the state, was designated as the Muskingum Conference. The Muskingum Conference was organized in September, 1843.

METHODIST PROTESTANTISM became relatively strong in Ohio, and the fourth (1846) and sixth (1854) GENERAL CONFERENCES of the denomination met in Cincinnati and Steubenville, respectively. Other General Conferences convened in the state in later years. In 1846 the Ohio Conference had 4,509 members and the Muskingum Conference 7,244. In 1896 the statistics were 14,586 for Muskingum and 6,099 for the Ohio Conference. In 1918 the Muskingum and Ohio Conferences united as the Ohio Conference. In the preceding year the Ohio Conference reported 34 charges, 34 preachers, and 7,875 members to 54 charges, 58 preachers, and 15,706 members for the Muskingum Conference.

Beginning in 1850, Ohio Methodist Protestants made several unsuccessful efforts to establish a school. Finally in 1900 the Muskingum Conference launched West Lafayette College which continued for sixteen years, and then by order of the General Conference the school was merged with ADRIAN COLLEGE in MICHIGAN.

The Ohio Conference came to unification in 1939 with 74 charges, 86 ministers, 21,464 members, and property valued at $1,130,350. As the merger was effected, forty-three of the charges fell within the OHIO CONFERENCE and thirty-one in the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

ALBEEA GODBOLD

OHIO EAST CONFERENCE (EUB) came into existence in 1951; but it traces its beginning back to June 2, 1817, when the first of its predecessor conferences was organized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the CHURCH of the BRETHREN in CHRIST in session at Mt. Pleasant, Pa. The MUSKINGUM CONFERENCE, as the new conference was called, embraced all of the territory lying east and north of the Muskingum River as well as several counties in western Pennsylvania. The first session was held at Joseph Naftzgar's in Harrison County, Ohio, on June 1, 1818. Bishops CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER and ANDREW ZELLER presided; six ministers and three visitors attended. From this beginning, the conference grew in strength until 1853 when it was divided and the ERIE CONFERENCE was formed.

On Sept. 7, 1886, the Western Reserve Conference, which had been split away from the Erie Conference in 1861 and had its eastern boundary established at the Pennsylvania line in 1877, and the Muskingum Conference were reunited at Massillon, Ohio, to form the East Ohio Conference.

At the outset the East Ohio Conference had 8,000 members, 139 organized churches, and eighty-nine ministers. The forty charges in the Conference were divided into three districts, each under the supervision of a presiding elder. When the East Ohio Conference closed its record (1951), there were sixty-four charges, 100 organized churches, and 21,322 members.

Following the denominational merger in 1946, the state of Ohio was divided into four conferences. On Sept. 7, 1951, at Canton Ohio, Bishop FRED L. DENNIS presided at the uniting session that dissolved the East Ohio (UB) and the Ohio (Evangelical) and officially created the Ohio East Conference. Bounded on the north by Lake Erie, on the east by the Pennsylvania State Line, on the south by the OHIO SOUTHEAST CONFERENCE, the territory falling within the boundaries of the Ohio East Conference comprised about one-fourth of the geographical area of the state of Ohio.

The Ohio East Conference was divided into two districts, north and south, each under the supervision of a conference superintendent. Its 37,495 members worshiped in 142 churches and the conference was served by 123 active elders and seven probationers (1967). The total value of local church property amounted to $22,187,820 while the average per member contribution for all purposes was $92.47 (1967).

In 1969, the conference joined with the Northeast Ohio of the former Methodist Church and a number of congregations from the Ohio Southeast and Ohio Sandusky Conferences to form the East Ohio Conference.

OHIO GERMAN CONFERENCE (UB) was organized at Germantown, Ohio, Oct. 20, 1853, with Bishop DAVID EDWARDS presiding, and concluded its work on Sept. 28, 1930 in the session held at Zanesville, Ohio. Entirely German in its beginning, the church had become predominantly English by 1930. In the mid-nineteenth century, the need for a separate German Conference was keenly felt. The UNITED BRETHREN GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1853 authorized the formation of the Ohio Conference. This conference was given the responsibility of organizing German churches wherever such work was feasible. Mission churches were therefore established in OHIO, INDIANA, ILLINOIS, KENTUCKY, and NEBRASKA. The Women's Missionary Association of this conference was organized in 1868, antedating the national women's organization by several years. The OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH in BALTIMORE, Md., was for many years an affiliate member of this conference. Numerous denominational leaders of the nineteenth century were members of the Ohio German Conference: William Mittendorf, Ezekiel Light, Edward Lorenz, G. Fritz, A. Schmidt, and Caspar Striech.

With the advent of World War I, the German language ceased to be popular and many of the formerly strong German churches became English-speaking and affiliated with the English conference in whose boundary they were located.

During the last twelve years of its history this conference was ably guided by E. F. Wegner as superintendent. At the conclusion of the work of this conference the remaining churches affiliated with the Illinois, Indiana, Miami, and East Ohio Conferences of the United Brethren in Christ.

OHIO MIAMI CONFERENCE (EUB) was the successor to the Miami Conference of the CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN IN CHRIST. The change of name followed the union of the Evangelical and United Brethren denominations in 1946. The churches of the Ohio Conference of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH were transferred to the four United Brethren Conferences and the name Ohio was added to each former United Brethren Conference name.

The Ohio Miami conference covered all or parts of the following counties: Darke, Preble, Butler, Hamilton, Clermont, Brown, Highland, Warren, Montgomery, Miami, Champaign, Clarke, Greene and Clinton Counties. Harrison in Indiana, Newport in Kentucky, and Wrightsville and Liberty Chapel in Adams County were also in the Ohio Miami Conference, but outside the above boundaries. The OHIO SANDUSKY CONFERENCE bordered Ohio Miami on the north and the OHIO SOUTHEAST on the east.

United Brethren work began in Ohio with the coming of German-speaking preachers from PENNSYLVANIA and MARYLAND in 1804 and 1805. The first English-speaking preacher, John McNamar, arrived in 1813. The first church was organized in 1806 at Germantown. The Miami Conference was formed in 1810, when CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER met with fifteen preachers at Michael Kreider's in Ross County. Among those present were ANDREW ZELLER and Daniel Troyer, who became prominent leaders in the new movement.

In the first years the conference included most of Ohio and INDIANA. At successive GENERAL CONFERENCES, the area was reduced with the formation of other conferences. However, little change was made after 1830.

As the use of the German language became less common in the Miami Conference, German-speaking churches in Ohio and Indiana organized the OHIO GERMAN CONFERENCE at Germantown in 1853 with Bishop DAVID EDWARDS presiding. This conference continued until 1930, when it was dissolved. Each of its congregations joined with the conference in which territory it was located.

The conference has had periods of rapid growth, while in some years it has recorded losses. At the end of 1967, it had 111 organized churches and 35,286 members. Elders numbered 123. Of these, 93 were under appointment. The value of church and parsonage properties was $17,463,240. The total paid for all purposes was $2,766,303.

The City of DAYTON, near the geographical center of the conference, has been the location of several denominational institutions. The denominational headquarters have been located here. The former U.B. Building was for some time the largest office building in the city. Here also was located The OTTERBEIN PRESS, the only publishing house of the United Brethren Church. Its only seminary has been continuously in Dayton, since its organization in 1871. The name of this school was changed from Bonebrake Theological Seminary to UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY when it merged with the Evangelical School of Theology from Reading, Pa., in 1954. The Otterbein Home, formerly a home for children and the aged and now only caring for older people, is located in the former Shaker property near Lebanon, Ohio.

The denominational Woman's Missionary Association of the United Brethren in Christ was organized in the Summit Street Church of the Miami Conference in 1872. Earlier than this, The Sisters Missionary Society was organized in the Ohio German Conference. The first three missionaries sent to a foreign country by the United Brethren in Christ were members of the Miami Conference: W. J. SHUEY, D. C. KUNLER, and D. K. FLICKINGER, all of whom went to SIERRA LEONE in West Africa in 1855.

When the camping movement became prominent, the conference purchased the property of the former Miami Military Institute in Germantown in 1945.

The area of the Ohio Miami Conference has been in a section of the state which became rapidly urbanized. Within the conference area, six cities of more than 42,000 population in 1960 accounted for a total population of 1,016,536. This change from rural to urban has been a problem for which the churches were slow to find a solution. In 1970 the conference united with the Ohio, Ohio Sandusky and part of the Ohio Southeast Conferences to form the West Ohio Conference of The United Methodist Church.

OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY, Ada, Ohio, is an undergraduate university with colleges of liberal arts, engineering, law, and pharmacy. Throughout its history this institution has emphasized professional education including teacher training along with liberal arts. Established in 1871 as Northeastern Ohio Normal, it was purchased by the CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1898. Its present name was assumed in 1914. Theodore Presser, who founded the Presser Foundation, which has assisted in erecting "Presser Halls" for the instruction of music on many college campuses in the United States, began his work as a music teacher in Ohio Northern University in 1871.

Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., B.S. in Education, B.S. in Pharmacy, B.S. in Civil Engineering, B.S. in Mechanical Engineering, B.S. in Electrical Engineering, LL.B., J.D. (Doctor of Jurisprudence). The governing board has forty-two members, half of whom are elected by the two Methodist annual conferences in Ohio.

OHIO SANDUSKY CONFERENCE (EUB) was composed of territory in the northwest quarter of the state of OHIO. Its boundaries were Lake Erie on the north, Sidney, Ohio on the south, the INDIANA state line on the west and the western limits of Mansfield, Ohio on the east.

The Ohio Sandusky Conference was one of the largest conferences of THE EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, having 176 elders and 172 charges in 1967. The value of local church property and the annual conference holdings, which included Camp St. Marys, near St. Marys, Ohio, and Camp Sebrose, near Oak Harbor, Ohio, was in excess of 20 million dollars (1968). The conference membership was 42,720, and the average giving per member for missions and benevolences was $16.00. The total giving for all purposes was $87.00 per member.

The Sandusky Conference of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST had its beginning when Jacob Baulus moved from MARYLAND in 1822 and settled in the lower Sandusky area near the present city of Fremont, Ohio. He immediately began to evangelize the area and formed several classes. In 1829 Baulus reported to the Muskingum Conference for the Sandusky Circuit. In 1831 the Scioto Conference formed the Marion Circuit which extended into the Sandusky area, while the Miami Conference was developing the Maumee mission which was located in the area south of Lake Erie. It may be said that the eventual territory of the Sandusky Conference included some of the Muskingum, Scioto, and Miami Conferences.

The first session of the Sandusky Conference was held on May 12, 1834, in Seneca County, Ohio. At first the field of labor extended into Indiana and MICHIGAN, but by 1845 Sandusky had lost the Indiana territory with the formation of the St. Joseph Conference. In 1853, the Maumee work attained the status of a conference and continued under this name until the year 1857, when it became known as the Auglaize Conference. The year of 1853 also saw the rise of another conference, the Michigan, which later became the North Ohio Conference. Both the North Ohio and the Auglaize Conferences affected the course and growth of the Sandusky Conference, when in 1861 the Maumee district in Ohio was removed. This territory was regained for Sandusky forty years later when North Ohio and Auglaize Conferences were dissolved. The Sandusky Conference maintained rather stable territorial boundaries and growth for the next fifty years.

In 1951, following the merger of THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the United Brethren in Christ, the Sandusky Conference of the former United Brethren Church merged with the western district churches of the Ohio Conference of the former Evangelical Church. The Ohio Sandusky Conference of The Evangelical United Brethren Church was formed.

The Flat Rock Children's Home was located within the bounds of the Ohio Sandusky Conference, but it received its support from additional conferences of the denomination. The Home was established in 1866 at Flat Rock, Ohio, to care for Civil War orphans. Since its founding, more than two thousand children of elementary school age have been cared for.

In 1969 the conference joined with five other conferences of The United Methodist Church in Ohio to form the West Ohio and East Ohio Conferences.

OHIO SOUTHEAST CONFERENCE (EUB). The first conference in OHIO of the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST was the Miami Conference, formed in 1810. Although it was state-wide in scope, most of the churches were located in the southern section of the state. As settlers came into the northeastern sector, the Muskingum Conference was created in 1818. Then in 1825 Scioto Conference was formed from the southeastern portion of the state, receiving its congregations from the Miami Conference. Expansion of the Scioto Conference was steady so that in 1873 there were 8,036 members.

In 1878 THE GENERAL CONFERENCE established a Central Ohio Conference, taking most of its members from the Scioto Conference. A large portion of this conference was re-united with the Scioto Conference in 1901, when the Southeast Ohio Conference was formed with 13,534 members. By the time of union with THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH the conference had grown to a membership of 23,975 persons.

In 1951 the only former Evangelical conference in Ohio, known as the Ohio Conference, was divided so that its churches went into each of the former United Brethren conferences in the state. The name of the conference formed by the churches in the southeastern portion of Ohio was Ohio Southeast Conference.

Following the formation of The United Methodist Church, conference unions took place in 1970. Two conferences, East Ohio and West Ohio, were formed from the six conferences of the two former denominations. Most of the 27,523 members of the former Ohio Southeast Conference were received into the new West Ohio Conference.

OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Delaware, Ohio, was founded by Methodist pioneers in 1841 and was granted its charter in 1842. In 1877, Ohio Wesleyan became coeducational when the Ohio Wesleyan Female College, an independent institution established in Delaware in 1853, merged with the university.

Ohio Wesleyan has educated many of Methodism's foremost leaders, including twenty-two bishops. In the early part of this century the university ranked so high in the training of missionaries that JOHN R. MOTT once said that Ohio Wesleyan was second only to Oxford in the number of missionaries sent into foreign fields. Today the tradition of Christian responsibility and service established by the missionaries of earlier years is continued by large numbers of students preparing for service careers and by hundreds of alumni holding service-oriented positions at home and abroad.

The university's curriculum emphasizes liberal arts and sciences and preprofessional courses. Its chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was chartered in 1907. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.M. (Music), B.F.A. (Fine Arts), and the M.A. The governing board has forty-two members: twenty elected by two Ohio annual conferences, nine by alumni, ten at large; bishops of the Ohio areas and the president, ex officio.

O'KELLY, JAMES (1757-1826), American preacher, was born in IRELAND but emigrated to America in 1778. He began his ministerial work during the Revolution which was then raging and in that same year, 1778, was admitted into the traveling connection. The CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE voted him orders, and he was ordained ELDER at the organization of the M. E. Church (1784) at that time. For several years he was presiding elder of the South VIRGINIA District, and was a member of the ill-fated COUNCIL which ASBURY tried to set up in place of frequent GENERAL CONFERENCES, but which withered away almost immediately.

He was early a champion of those who opposed the authority of the bishop, and while some judged that there was a personal antipathy against Asbury on his part, others saw him as a champion of the independent spirit of the American preachers. In the 1792 General Conference, O'Kelly offered a motion which became historic and about whose intent Methodists have never ceased to divide. His motion stated, "After the bishop appoints the preachers at conference to their several circuits, if any one thinks himself injured by the appointment, he shall have liberty to appeal to the conference and state his objections; and if the conference approve his objections, the bishop shall appoint him to another circuit." (History of American Methodism, Vol. 1, p. 436).

Upon the defeat of the motion, O'Kelly resigned from the Church with a few of the brethren joining him, even WILLIAM MCKENDREE himself who was destined after Asbury to become the greatest champion of the strong episcopacy.

For his part, Asbury endeavored to treat O'Kelly kindly, and as he knew that he was advancing in years, proposed that O'Kelly should receive forty pounds; but meanwhile O'Kelly withdrew and organized a Church giving it the name of the REPUBLICAN METHODIST CHURCH, the name being suggested by the prevalence of Republican sentiments in Virginia. In this Church all the preachers according to their order were to stand on an equal footing, there were to be no degrees in the ministry, and greater freedom was promised to the people than they enjoyed in the M. E. Church.

The influence of O'Kelly became rather strong in the border counties of Virginia and NORTH CAROLINA, and the Minutes show from 1792 to 1798 a loss of about 8,000 persons, some of which can be attributed to O'Kelly's agitation. O'Kelly gave forth a pamphlet explaining his reasons for protesting against the M. E. Church. NICHOLAS SNETHEN, whom Asbury called his "silver trumpet," answered O'Kelly, though Snetthen himself was destined to become a METHODIST PROTESTANT leader a few years later.

The controversy raged quite heatedly and James O'Kelly himself ordained such preachers as came to him, but it is said he was greatly disappointed in the number of those who did join his ranks. In 1801 he changed the name of the church to the Christian Church, and divisions and subdivisions followed until it gradually dwindled away. However, the writer of these lines heard Bishop COLLINS DENNY say as late as 1934 that he was surprised to find that there were still some Republican Methodist Churches belonging to the O'Kellyites here and there in isolated portions of Virginia. (Eventually the remnants of O'Kelly's Church merged with the Congregationalists in the Congregational Christian Church.)

James O'Kelly seems to have been one of those strong opinionated men who do not fit into an organization where someone else must definitely lead, and they must as definitely follow. He died in North Carolina, Oct. 16, 1826.

OKINAWA is the central and most important island of the Ryukyu archipelago, which extends 400 miles southward from Kyushu island (JAPAN) to include the Yaegama group close to the northeast point of Taiwan. Naha is the capital. The Ryukyus, often called Loo Choo, form a chain of reefs and islets separating the Pacific Ocean from the East China Sea. The land area is 921 square miles, of which Okinawa holds 500. The Ryukyu population is 833,000, of which nearly 800,000 live on Okinawa. Resettlement from that overpopulated island is being carried out in the Amami group to the northeast, and in the Miyako and Yaegama groups to the southwest.

For long centuries Okinawa and the other islands paid occasional tribute to Chinese overlords. Commander Matthew Perry's fleet wintered at Okinawa while awaiting Japan's reply to his demands for commercial and political relations with the United States. At the time of the Sino-Japanese War, Japan annexed the archipelago. American forces captured Okinawa in the final phase of World War II. By virtue of the Treaty of San Francisco in September 1951, the United States assumed authority over the archipelago, under trusteeship of temporary character regularized by the United Nations, although Japanese "residual sovereignty" is recognized in the Treaty.

The M. E. Church entered the Loo Choo islands (Ryukyus) in 1904, under the leadership of Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Schwartz. A vigorous circuit was developed, frequently visited by the missionaries stationed at Nagasaki, Japan. When the United Church of Christ in Japan was organized in 1941, before the outbreak of World War II, Methodist work in Okinawa became a part of Japanese Methodism.

In 1946, following World War II, the Okinawa-Ryukyu church became the United Church of Christ of Okinawa (Okinawa Kirisuto Kyodan).

Evangelistic work centers in the churches in Naha-Shuri, Ishikawa (close to the U.S. Naval and Marine base), Taira (north) and Ishigaki (southern Yaeyama group). From these centers, educational, agricultural and medical work moves out, particularly into areas of resettlement. The Okinawa Christian Institute, junior-college level, interdenominational, located close to University of the Ryukyus, erected new buildings and equipment to train indigenous leadership for the church; the enrollment approached 100. Membership of the Okinawa Kyodan is over 1,500, of which the Methodists are the largest group. There are twenty-five organized churches with numerous other preaching places, under the direction of twenty ordained pastors and other workers in training. The Division of World Missions of The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.) provides seven married missionary couples, and PHILIPPINE Island Methodism supports a woman missionary.

OKLAHOMA, population 2,498,378 in 1970, is in the southwest section of the U.S.A. Acquired in the LOUISIANA Purchase of 1803, the United States set the territory apart in 1834 for the Indian tribes that were being moved from east of the Mississippi River. In 1889 the central section of the territory was purchased from the Indians for white settlement and 20,000 whites immediately rushed in to establish homes. In 1960 there were still 65,000 Indians in the state. Oklahoma was admitted to the Union in 1907.

The first Methodist and the first Protestant sermon in what is now Oklahoma was delivered by WILLIAM STEVENSON, a member of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE, at Pecan Point in 1818 while he was establishing Methodism in southwest ARKANSAS. Pecan Point became a charge in the Missouri Conference.

The main thrust of Methodism in what is now Oklahoma grew out of missionary work among the Indians. Ministry to the Indians was started by southern conferences of the M. E. Church before the tribes were moved west by the government in the decade 1829-39. As a result of the missionary endeavor there were several thousand Methodist converts among the Indians before they were moved west. Some missionaries accompanied the Indians en route west while some went ahead to be ready to minister to them when they arrived, Alexander Talley from the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE being one of the latter. In 1831 the Mississippi Conference appointed Talley as superintendent of the Choctaw Mission, and about the same time the MISSOURI and TENNESSEE CONFERENCES also sent missionaries into Indian Territory. In 1836 when the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE was organized, it had a district in Indian Territory which took over the Indian mission work from the other conferences. By 1844 the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE had twelve white preachers, three Indian preachers, twenty-one local Indian preachers, and over 3,000 members in Indian Territory.

The 1844 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE. The next year the conference adhered South, and it continued as the Indian Mission Conference until 1906 when it was superseded by the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE (MES).

After the Indian Mission Conference adhered South in 1845, the M. E. Church had no work in Oklahoma until the Wyandotte Indians moved to Indian Territory. The OHIO CONFERENCE established a mission among the Wyandottes in 1819. In 1843 the Wyandottes moved from OHIO to KANSAS and from there to Indian Territory in 1871. Gradually the evangelizing work of the M. E. Church spread in Indian Territory, and in 1880 the denomination established the Indian Mission. The mission became the Indian Mission Conference in 1889, and three years later it was designated as the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE.

The METHODIST PROTESTANTS established an Indian Mission in what is now Oklahoma in 1887. In 1896 they formed the Chickasaw Mission Conference on two Indian Reservations, and the same year they organized the Oklahoma Mission Conference in Oklahoma Territory by dividing the Fort Smith Mission. In 1900 they set up the Southwest Oklahoma Mission among the Indians, and four years later they formed the Choctaw Indian Conference. In 1908 all of these M. P. missions and conferences were either absorbed or superseded by the denomination's Oklahoma Conference which itself merged in 1916 to make the Fort Smith-Oklahoma Conference. The latter conference continued until 1939.

With the coming of white settlers into Oklahoma, the three major branches of Methodism organized churches and conferences for them which were soon stronger than the Indian churches and missions or mission conferences. In 1906 the M. E. Church, South therefore changed the name of its Indian Mission Conference to the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE. The white work grew rapidly, and in 1911 the Oklahoma Conference was divided to form the East Oklahoma and West Oklahoma Conferences. Then in 1919 the Indian work was separated from the white to form the Indian Mission (MES) which continued in The Methodist Church in 1939. In 1930 the East and West Oklahoma Conferences of the Southern Church merged to form the Oklahoma Conference which continued until 1939.

By 1892 the Indian Mission Conference of the M. E. Church included many white ministers and churches, and its name was changed to the Oklahoma Conference which continued until unification in 1939. In 1904 the denomination separated the Indian work from the Oklahoma Conference and designated it as the Indian Territory Mission, changing the name to the East Oklahoma Mission two years later. In 1911 the mission was absorbed by the Oklahoma Conference.

In 1902 the M. E. Church organized the Okaneb Conference, a body that included all of the denomination's Negro work in Oklahoma, MISSOURI, KANSAS, and NEBRASKA, changing the name one year later to the Lincoln Conference. In 1928 this conference was merged, part of it going with the Little Rock Conference to form the SOUTHWEST CONFERENCE, and the remainder going with the Central Missouri Conference to form the CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE, all of them being Negro conferences.

At unification in 1939 the East and West Oklahoma

Conferences of the M. E. Church, South had a total of 91,795 members, the Oklahoma Conference of the M. E. Church had 58,704, and the Oklahoma part of the M. P. Fort Smith-Oklahoma Conference had 2,000, making a total of 152,499. The work of the three conferences was merged to form the East and West Oklahoma Conferences of The Methodist Church. In 1954 the East and West Conferences were combined to form the Oklahoma Conference.

In 1939 the Indian Mission of the M. E. Church, South and the Southwest Conference of the M. E. Church continued in The Methodist Church, the one in the South Central Jurisdiction and the other in the Central Jurisdiction. The Indian Mission became the Oklahoma Indian Mission Conference in 1959.

In 1970 the Oklahoma Indian Mission Conference, the Oklahoma Conference, and the Oklahoma District of the Southwest Conference reported a total of 534 pastoral charges, 575 ministers, 274,474 members, and property valued at $100,000,000.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. (population 363,225), is the capital of the state and its largest city. Methodism began in Oklahoma City the very week the city began. When on April 22, 1889, the territory was thrown open to white settlement and Oklahoma City became a city of several thousand overnight, Methodist services were held in a tent the very next Sunday. A Sunday school was organized and the church at once began her work.

Today there are seventy Methodist churches in the area, and growing at the rate of one new church each year. St. Luke's Church is one of the show places of the city. OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY enrolls four thousand students. The city is the episcopal residence of the bishop, who presently administers the work of Methodism over the entire state including the Indian Mission Conference. The South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1968 was held in Oklahoma City, and Bishop ALSIE CARLETON, elected at that conference, was consecrated in St. Luke's.

Deaconess Hospital (Free Methodist), organized in 1900 in Guthrie, Okla., moved to its present location in 1910. A general hospital service is maintained. The unwed mother program known as "Home of Redeeming Love" has served more than 8,000 girl patients. The main hospital building has recently been greatly enlarged. Several auxiliary buildings are located on the twenty-acre campus. It is an accredited institution of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH.

St. Luke's Methodist Church was born with the "Oklahoma Run" which opened this former Indian Territory for white settlers officially April 22, 1889. By nightfall on this turbulent Monday, an estimated 10,000 settlers (more modest reports say 3,000) had converged on the City's site and set about putting homes and businesses on the premises to which they had staked claims.

Varying accounts from the several churches which claim descent from the first Sunday of the City's birth indicate the likelihood that several religious services were held on the first Sunday, April 28, 1889. The one to which St. Luke's attaches her ancestry, was held under a white flag on what became Third Street, between present North Broadway and North Robinson Streets, by a Methodist preacher, James Murry. St. Luke's has a portion of this historic flag under glass in her church halls.

ST. LUKE'S CHURCH, OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA

The church which formed on this original site continued to meet at this spot, known locally as "Tabernacle (M. E., South) Church."

In June, Bishop EUGENE HENDRIX authorized the transfer of I. L. BURROWS from the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE to become pastor of the First M. E. Church, South, in Oklahoma City, and promised $750 from the General Board of MISSIONS to purchase the three lots on which the church had been meeting. Despite the City's rapid growth, competition of other churches and commercial enterprise were strong in the new community. Fifty people were related to the congregation at this time. Stalwart Christian people were among the membership that saw the church through successive stages of growth: enclosure of the tabernacle before winter of 1889; a brick sanctuary added in 1903; a change of name to St. Luke's M. E. Church, South, in 1904; the purchase of lots for a new building at Eighth and North Robinson in 1905; the erection of a $90,000 building at the new site, completed in 1908; addition of a $75,000 Sunday School building (cir. 1923); purchase of lots for a new structure at Fifteenth and North Robinson in 1946; erection of the first unit for the new building in 1951; completion of the new sanctuary in March of 1957; periodic purchase and development of off-street parking lots, 1950-62, quarter million dollar expansion of facilities in 1961, providing new offices, classrooms, nursery, library, bride's room, and reception room.

Overcoming the severe struggles of the early years, including the panic of 1893, the growth and influence of St. Luke's have experienced a steady rise. Located close to the center of the originally compact City and challenging strong leadership from the community since its beginning, St. Luke's has become an increasingly important part of the City's life. Her membership (1970) stood at 7,292; her staff of thirty-three continues to grow and her budget for the coming year is $525,000.

From the earliest days, St. Luke's has been served by a very high calibre of ministerial leadership. The noted P. R. Knickerbocker became pastor (1906-1910). He was followed by E. C. McVoy; ROBERT E. GOODRICH; Frank Barrett; and FORNEY HUTCHINSON (1918-32).

Dr. Hutchinson's pastorate, with his warm, outgoing spirit, his constant pastoral ministry, his interest in the life of the entire community brought this thriving, growing church to flower. After more than thirty-five years, his stamp of Christian love is still upon the character of St. Luke's and the memory of the City.

There followed Dr. Hutchinson, other distinguished pastors: PAUL W. QUILLIAN (1932-36); CLOVIS CHAPPELL (1936-41); W. B. Selah (1941-45); William H. Wallace, Jr. (1945-51); W. McFERRIN STOWE (1951-64) (now bishop); and J. Chess Lovern, the present pastor, who followed Bishop Stowe in 1964.

Village Church, located in suburban Oklahoma City, was organized in 1951 and has grown to a membership of 2,750 (1970). The Oklahoma City District Board of Missions and Wesley Church were the original sponsors of the new church. The first meetings were conducted in Wiley Post Airport. With window curtains made of parachutes, airplanes coming and going, a pilot's room for a nursery, and the balcony for a place of worship, the young congregation began holding Sunday school and worship services. Richard Gibbens was appointed the first pastor. It is interesting to note that he had grown up in the sponsoring Wesley Church.

The sanctuary is contemporary in design with large wooden arches supporting the ceiling, and will seat 650 people. It was completed in 1963, twelve years from the date of the first ground breaking for the first unit.

Village Church has had a phenomenal growth in membership. In order to meet the needs of the congregation, two Sunday school sessions are conducted each Sunday and two worship services are conducted.

Wesley Church, a stately English Gothic sanctuary, today stands in the exact population center of the metropolitan city. In October 1910, F. A. Colwell was appointed by Bishop WILLIAM A. QUAYLE to the task of organizing a church in the far northwest section of Oklahoma City.

A hastily constructed tabernacle was built at Military and 32nd Streets and when Bishop Quayle preached the first sermon on Christmas Day, 1910, the furnishings consisted of a floor of sawdust, some donated chairs, and a square piano. In the spring of 1911 the tabernacle was moved to the corner of 25th and Douglas, the site of the present building. Wesley closed its first conference year with 136 members.

The present sanctuary was dedicated May 20, 1928, the membership then being 771. Depression years brought a crisis to Wesley, but church members managed interest payments on a towering mortgage by proceeds from doughnut sales. Church women spent long hours turning out thousands of doughnuts.

Wesley is located near the Methodist Oklahoma City University and is called the University Church. One of its pastors went from the church to the presidency of the University, and one of the University's presidents came to Wesley as minister. Since its beginning twenty ministers have served it, and the membership today is 3,282.

OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, was established as Epworth University in 1904 at Oklahoma City by the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South. It was moved to Guthrie, Okla. in 1911, and the name was changed to Oklahoma Methodist University. The college was moved back to Oklahoma City in 1919, and the name was altered first to Oklahoma City College and then, in 1924, to Oklahoma City University. The educational program includes arts and sciences, music, business, and law.

Its large growth and expansion came after 1940. In 1960 a program for creating a regional center of excellence was begun with the consultative assistance of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. A $2,000,000 grant from the Ford Foundation was made to the university in 1962, to be matched by $4,000,000.

Degrees granted are the B.A., B.M. (Music), B.S. in Business, B.I.A. (Industrial Arts), LL.B., M.A.T. (Teaching), M.B.E. (Business Education), J.D. (Doctor of Jurisprudence). The governing board has forty-seven trustees, thirty-two members elected by the OKLAHOMA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, fourteen district superintendents of that conference, and the resident bishop.

JOHN O. GROSS

OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at OKLAHOMA CITY, Dec. 14, 1892 with Bishop DANIEL A. GOODSELL presiding. It superseded the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE which included many white churches that had been organized after the territory was opened to white settlers in 1889.

When the Oklahoma Conference was created, the Indian work continued as a part of it. However, in 1904 the Indian charges were set off as the Indian Territory Mission, the name being changed to the East Oklahoma Mission in 1906. The mission began in 1904 with 27 charges and about 1,275 members, but as time passed it did not flourish. The Indians were poor, the pastors' salaries were low, and the churches had to contend with the hostility of the unconverted and the competition of the Church, South. By 1911 the prospects for the work were so discouraging that the mission asked the GENERAL CONFERENCE to make it a part of the Oklahoma Conference, and it was so ordered. Some Indian work continued in the Oklahoma Conference, but after 1912 it was largely neglected until unification in 1939.

The Oklahoma Conference began in 1892 with four districts, Ardmore, Eastern, Northern, and Southern; 94 charges, 35 preachers, 60 local preachers, and 3,129 members. The conference grew rapidly, reporting nearly 15,000 members in 1903.

At its first session in 1892 the Oklahoma Conference took a strong stand for the establishment of a college. Several schools were launched over the years, but in the end the only college to survive was what is now OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY. The two Episcopal Methodists started Epworth University in Oklahoma City in 1901, but it failed in 1911 when the Northern Church withdrew support to start a college in Guthrie. Eight years later the institution at Guthrie was closed, and the denominational college was opened in Oklahoma City. In 1928 the Southern Church joined in its support, and Oklahoma City University was able to weather the depression years to become a strong Methodist college.

The Oklahoma Conference was merged in 1939 to help form the East and West Oklahoma Conferences of The Methodist Church. At that time the conference reported 246 charges, 209 ministers, 58,704 members, and property valued at $675,314.

OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at TULSA, Nov. 14, 1906 with Bishop JOHN J. TIGERT presiding. It superseded the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE which had become overwhelmingly a body of white ministers and churches. The Indian preachers and churches continued in the Oklahoma Conference and its successor conferences until 1918 when they were set off as the Indian Mission.

The Oklahoma Conference began with twelve districts, 237 charges, and 38,529 members. In 1910 there were fifteen districts, 295 charges, and 52,267 members, and the body divided to form the East and West Oklahoma Conferences. At that time practically all of the Indian work was placed in the East Conference. The next year the East Conference reported 27,901 members and the West Conference 28,177. At Tulsa on Oct. 29, 1930 the two conferences merged to form again the Oklahoma Conference with twelve districts and 76,665 members, an arrangement which continued until unification in 1939.

Southern Methodism in Oklahoma was interested in schools and other agencies, and with the aid of the Federal government and the Indian Councils, the Indian Mission Conference built a number of schools for the Indians. The Methvin Institute at Anadarko (1890-1906) was the Southern Church's last school for Indians. As the conference became predominantly white, schools for the whites were established. When the Oklahoma Conference began in 1906 it had four colleges: Epworth University at Oklahoma City, Spaulding College at Muskogee, Willie Halsell College at Vinita, and Hargrove College at Ardmore. All failed within the next ten years. Finally in 1928 the Southern Church joined the Northern Church in support of the college in Oklahoma City which became OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, a strong Methodist college today.

In 1919 the two Oklahoma Conferences started an orphanage at Oklahoma City and invited the Indian Mission, then one year old, to elect two members to the institution's governing board. Moved to TAHLEQUAH about twenty years later, the Oklahoma Methodist Home for Children has become an outstanding institution of its kind.

In 1882 the Indian Mission Conference began publishing a paper in Muskogee entitled Our Brother in Red. Between 1905 and 1920 Oklahoma Methodism joined first with ARKANSAS Methodism and then with TEXAS Methodism in publishing papers. In the latter year the Oklahoma Methodist began, flourished for ten years, and was then merged with the Texas Christian Advocate to form the Southwestern Christian Advocate.

In 1939 the Oklahoma Conference approached unification with ten districts, 257 charges, 364 churches, 91,795 members, and property valued at $7,583,752.

OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE (MC) was organized at TULSA, May 24, 1954 with Bishop W. ANGIE SMITH presiding. It was formed by merging the East and West Oklahoma Conferences. The latter two conferences were created at unification in 1939 when the Oklahoma Conference (MEC), the Oklahoma Conference (MECS), and the Oklahoma part of the Fort Smith-Oklahoma Conference (MP) were merged. (See OKLAHOMA, INDIAN MISSION, and OKLAHOMA CONFERENCES MEC and MECS for accounts of Oklahoma Methodism prior to 1939.)

The East Oklahoma Conference began in 1939 with six districts and 214 charges, while the West Conference had seven districts and 279 charges. The next year the one reported 57,313 members and the other 69,902. When they merged in 1954 to form the Oklahoma Conference, the East Conference had 222 charges and 90,028 members, and the West Conference 288 charges and 115,259 members making a total of 205,287 members in the Oklahoma Conference as it began. This represented an increase of sixty-one per cent in the total membership of the two conferences between 1940 and 1954.

Three Oklahoma pastors have been elected bishop: H. BASCOM WATTS and PAUL V. GALLOWAY from the pastorate of Boston Avenue Church, Tulsa, the one in 1952, the other in 1960; and W. MCFERRIN STOWE from St. Luke's Church, OKLAHOMA CITY, in 1964. Bishops DANA DAWSON and KENNETH W. COPELAND served as pastors in Oklahoma and were elevated to the episcopacy after moving elsewhere.

The Oklahoma Conference supports OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY which has over 2,000 students, a fourteen-million dollar plant, and an endowment of $2,000,000. The churches take offerings for PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE in LITTLE ROCK. Fifteen WESLEY FOUNDATIONS are maintained with five full time campus ministers. The Oklahoma Methodist reaches nearly half the families in the conference.

The conference also supports the following institutions and service agencies: the Oklahoma Methodist Manor for the aged and the Frances E. Willard Home for Girls in Tulsa; the 400-acre Boy's Ranch near Gore; the Methodist Home for Children at Tahlequah; two nursing homes, one at Enid and one at Clinton; Camp Canyon near Hinton; Lake Texoma Camp near Kingston; and Camp Egan near Tahlequah.

In 1970 the Oklahoma Conference reported 14 districts, 468 charges, 549 ministers, 259,812 members, and property valued at $97,408,269. The total amount of money raised for all purposes that year was $9,454,322.

OKLAHOMA-TEXAS CONFERENCE (EUB) consisted of two former annual conferences in OKLAHOMA and TEXAS plus two groups of churches previously belonging to two other annual conferences. The Oklahoma and Texas Conferences were united in 1956. A group of five UNITED BRETHREN Churches in the Oklahoma Panhandle were added to the Oklahoma United Brethren Conference when the North Texas United Brethren Conference was dissolved in 1913. Seven E.U.B. churches in Oklahoma belonging to the Kansas Conference became a part of the Oklahoma-Texas Conference in 1960.

The EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION began work in Texas in 1879. Bishop J. J. ESHER of the Evangelical Association was the man most instrumental in getting approval of his mission board to send men to preach the gospel in German in Galveston and SAN ANTONIO.

The first congregation was organized in San Antonio in 1879. Between 1880 and 1887, J. M. Gomer, who was in charge of the work at Galveston, made visits to the interior of Texas to seek opportunities for expanding the work among German-speaking Evangelicals who had migrated to Texas from northern states. The first session of the Texas Conference was held at Temple in October 1887. From 1894 to 1899, the conference existed as two Districts, "north" and "south." The conference continued as a single district from 1899 onward.

The membership of the seven charges comprising the Texas Conference at its beginning was 253. The greatest number of ministers for any one year was sixteen, in 1912, and these men served seventeen appointments.

The organizing Conference of the Oklahoma United Brethren Church was held at the Eden Chapel Church, ten miles southeast of Stillwater, in February 1898. Twenty-four ministers and twenty lay delegates made up the official membership.

The twenty-five charges totaling 1,500 members had been a part of the Arkansas Valley Conference preceding 1898. United Brethren people had been among those settlers securing property in the opening of the "Unassigned Lands" in 1889, and other openings of Indian lands in 1890's. By 1907, when Oklahoma became a state, the conference counted seventy-five churches, twenty-seven preachers, and 2,836 church members.

The Oklahoma Conference was principally an organization of rural churches. In 1900, the twenty-four churches averaged sixty-six members each; and in 1950, the average number of members in the thirty-one churches reporting was 130.

The North Texas Conference of the United Brethren Church existed from 1908 to 1913. At their final session in 1913, five churches in the Oklahoma Panhandle were transferred to the Oklahoma Conference.

The Texas Conference and Oklahoma Conference were united on May 29, 1956. Texas brought eight churches, 1,376 members, and eight pastors to the Union; Oklahoma brought twenty-two churches, 3,343 members, and nineteen pastors.

The Student Aid Society of the Texas Conference was continued in the united conference. Its purpose was to give financial assistance to ministerial students while attending Seminary.

Since Oklahoma-Texas union one mission church was begun—Cathedral Church now called Regency Park Church at Moore, Okla.—in 1963. Finances for the new church came largely from the Forward Fellowship program begun in 1959.

In 1960 the seven Kansas Conference churches located in Oklahoma were joined to the Oklahoma-Texas Conference and seven Itinerant Elders of the Kansas Conference transferred their credentials to the Oklahoma-Texas Conference.

From 1964 through 1967, Camp Redlands was leased by the conference from Oklahoma State University at Stillwater and was used chiefly as a site for Christian Education groups.

In 1968 churches in Texas joined former Methodist Conferences in that state and the twenty-five churches in Oklahoma became one with the former Oklahoma Methodist Conference.

OLD STONE CHURCH SITE AND CEMETERY, Leesburg, Va., is a national historic shrine of The United Methodist Church. (See LEESBURG, VIRGINIA.)

OLDHAM, WILLIAM FITZJAMES (1854-1937), missionary bishop of the M. E. Church in Southern Asia 1904-12; secretary of the Board of Missions, New York, 1912-16; bishop (general superintendent), South America, 1916-28. He was born at Bangalore, INDIA, Dec. 15, 1854. His father was an officer of the army of the East India Company. He married Marie Mulligan, born in Poona. Both were of British and Indian ancestry.

Oldham was employed as a government surveyor, when in 1873 he heard D. O. Fox, an associate of WILLIAM TAYLOR, preach. He was converted and joined the Methodist Church, and a little later he went to America and entered ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. He joined the MICHIGAN ANNUAL CONFERENCE. In 1884, he was accepted as a missionary of the Board of Missions and sent to India.

Bishop THORBURN was looking for a man to open Methodist work in SINGAPORE. He chose Oldham, whom he ordained as an ELDER on Jan. 11, 1885, and the next day appointed him to organize and superintend a mission in Singapore. Thorburn and Oldham went together and held evangelistic services in the town hall. They quickly organized the first Methodist Church, with seventeen members, all British and Eurasians. A few days later a Chinese gentleman joined.

Oldham's work in Singapore was dramatically successful. He developed strong influence among the multi-racial people of the city, organizing congregations using Indian and Chinese languages as well as English. He opened schools and obtained support from well-to-do people of all races. At first, the Malaysia field was included in the BENGAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE, but on April 1, 1893, the MALAYSIA Mission Conference was formed.

Having laid the foundations of the Church in Malaysia, Oldham returned to America and first entered the pastorate and then became professor of missions and comparative religions at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Bishop BASHFORD wrote of Oldham in this period, "I have wondered whether any pastor in Methodism ever accomplished a greater work than did Dr. Oldham in the last two years."

In 1904, he was elected missionary bishop for Southern Asia with residence in Singapore. In 1912, he was elected one of three co-ordinate secretaries of the Board of Missions and was in constant demand as a speaker and writer. But the 1916 GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him a regular bishop (general superintendent) and assigned him to South America with residence in BUENOS AIRES. He succeeded Bishop STUNTZ as the second resident bishop in Latin America. He came to Buenos Aires in 1917 and stood until 1928, when in turn he was succeeded by Bishop MILLER.

Bishop Oldham worked for an active cooperation among the Protestant denominations in the River Plate region. During his term of office the M. E. Church entered a cooperative agreement with the Disciples of Christ to work together in Colegio Ward and Union Seminary. Mrs. Mary Oldham, his wife, was a pious lady who was very much appreciated. Until today the Pastors' Wives Association of the Argentine Conference bears her name.

When Oldham was bishop in South America, he had to cross the Andes Mountains in the late fall with the last bank of muleteers to go before winter set in, an altitude of 18,000 feet and winter near. When the mule drivers arrived in late evening at an inn over the crest of the mountains, the bishop's mule was there but no Oldham. The men hurried back and found the bishop on the road unconscious, his clothes frozen to the ground. He is yet remembered in South America with admiration and affection. He retired in 1928, made his home then for several years in India before returning at last to the United States. He died in Glendale, Calif., March 27, 1937, and is buried in Forest Lawn. Among his writings are a sketch of Thoburn in The Picket Line of Missions, The Study of Missions in Colleges; Malaysia: Nature's Wonderland; The Crucial Hour of Missions; India, Malaysia and the Philippines; and Thoburn—Called of God.

OLDROYD, ROXANNA (1881-) is a notable pioneer in teaching science subjects to women college students in INDIA. She was born in Shreve, Ohio, Nov. 25, 1881. She was awarded B.S. and M.A. degrees by Kansas State University in 1904 and 1908.

In the summer of 1909, she went to India as a missionary appointed to teach science subjects in ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE. At that time very few Indian men or women cared to study science. Their interests were concentrated upon languages and philosophy. Miss Oldroyd taught physics, chemistry, and biology, but initially had fewer than a dozen students in college classes.

On furloughs, she pursued postgraduate studies in science subjects at the University of Chicago and in theology at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. Gradually but steadily, enrollment in her science classes grew, and many of her students became science teachers in other institutions. Many others developed an interest in medicine as a profession and eventually became physicians or surgeons. Of her many students who went on to distinguished achievements one, Evangeline Thillyampalam, became the principal of the college. Miss Oldroyd had a missionary career of almost forty years at Isabella Thoburn College.

OLDS, EDWIN THOMAS (1890-1966), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister, was born in South Canterbury, New Zealand, on Aug. 1, 1890, one of a large family in a humble Methodist home. He was educated at Oamaru and Christchurch. Accepted for training for the Methodist ministry, he spent the years 1912 to 1914 at the theological college in Dunholme.

In 1915, during the First World War, he enlisted in the New Zealand Rifle Brigade and saw active service in France. He was given an officer's commission in the field. After being severely wounded in 1918, he was invalided home to New Zealand.

In 1919 he was ordained. His most important appointments were Napier, where he was sent in 1931 to help restore confidence after a disastrous earthquake, and Pitt Street, the historic AUCKLAND church, where he built up a crowded congregation, ministering from 1935 to 1950. He was also chairman of the Auckland District from 1943 to 1949, and president of Conference in 1948. "Tom" Olds was an evangelist and a prophet of inspiration and hope. The young responded to his ardor, and the old found new courage. In the closing years of his life he suffered much weakness and pain, but his faith never wavered. He died in Auckland on Aug. 28, 1966.

OLIN, JULIA M. (-1879), American editor and writer and wife of STEPHEN OLIN, whom she married in 1843 when he was president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. She was born Julia M. Lynch, her father a person of consequence, in NEW YORK. Olin had come to Wesleyan as its president in 1842, and the next year married Julia Lynch, who was his second wife.

After his death, in 1851, she lived with her only surviving son, Henry. She decided to edit Olin's work, and being aided in this by some literary friends, she brought out in 1853, his Life and Letters, and his Greece and the Golden Horn in 1854. With the proceeds brought in by these writings she established a prize in the Wesleyan University.

Mrs. Olin herself wrote chiefly poems and certain material for daily devotions. She contributed to The Ladies Repository, Western Christian Advocate, and the Methodist Quarterly Review. It is said that she was a SUNDAY SCHOOL teacher all her life from the age of seventeen. She also is connected with the FIVE POINTS MISSION built on the site of the "old Brewery" in New York, and served as treasurer, directress or corresponding secretary for twenty-six years. She died in New York in 1879.

STEPHEN OLIN

OLIN, STEPHEN (1797-1851), American intellectual leader and college president, who exerted great influence during the first half of the nineteenth century. He was born in Leicester, Vt., on March 7, 1797, and was graduated at Middlebury College, taking honors of his class. His health being impaired, he went to the South and accepted the position of principal of an almost nondescript Tabernacle Academy near Abbeville, S. C. The new teacher boarded in the family of a local preacher by the name of James E. Glenn. After Mrs. Glenn asked him whether or not he opened his school with prayer, he was induced to begin doing so, and this resulted in his conversion.

Having become converted, he applied for license to preach, but the presiding elder, Joseph Travis, was in great doubt about him, and while he trusted Glenn's good judgment, would not look favorably upon Olin until he "put him up" to preach. The sermon was so good that Travis judged it to be a plagiarism. He was again put up and preached a better sermon than the first. A third time he was tried, and his effort excelled both of the others. Finally, on Sunday, before an immense congregation, he preached on the daughter of Herodias dancing before Herod and "swept the field." The presiding elder gave in and licensed him to preach. Two or three years later he entered the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, but in 1826 went to the University of Georgia, where he taught English literature for seven years. While there he married a Miss Bostick of Milledgeville, Ga., who was his devoted companion for twelve years. She died in Naples, Italy, while they were on an extended journey in Europe.

In 1834 he accepted the presidency of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, then at Boynton, Va., and then for a time, from 1837-41, he traveled in Europe and the East, publishing a volume having to do with his travels. In 1842 he was elected president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown, Conn., upon the death of WILBUR FISK. There had been a brief presidency there by NATHAN BANGS who resigned in order that Olin might take over.

In 1843 he married again, this time JULIA M. LYNCH who accompanied him in his travels and especially to the first meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in LONDON in 1846.

Olin was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, and took a prominent part in the great debate which divided that body. Knowing the South, as well as the North, he attempted to reconcile the insurmountable differences between the two sections, and in a speech to the body seconded the motion of WILLIAM CAPERS of SOUTH CAROLINA, calling for a committee to see what plan might be worked out for the pacification of the Church.

Olin, however, voted with the majority of the Conference and was appointed one of the committee to draw up a "reply to the Protest" in order to answer the "protest" which had been formally put in by the southern delegations. However, when next year the M. E. Church began to repudiate the PLAN OF SEPARATION, Olin joined Nathan Bangs in saying that the "honor of the Church was at stake" and that the commitment of the General Conference with regard to the Plan of Separation should be kept.

As president of Wesleyan (which became the strongest institution of learning of the M. E. Church during the years of the presidency of Wilbur Fisk and Stephen Olin), Olin entered the field of theological discussion and became a champion of the Methodist viewpoint. He held that the great lack in the theology of Methodism was "the reduction of its tenets to a scientific system." It is said that many Methodists hoped that Olin himself would commit the Wesleyan motifs to such treatment, but his demands as an administrator in charge of Wesleyan, and more particularly the desperate situation of his health (had health plagued him all his life), kept him from doing so. Eventually his nervous power gave way, and he died in Middletown on Aug. 16, 1851. His wife edited his writings after his death and published also his Life and Letters. His was one of the rare minds of the Methodist Church.

OLIN, WILLIAM H. (1821-1889), American minister and publicist, was born Jan. 5, 1821, in Laurens, Otsego Co., N. Y. He studied at Cazenovia Seminary, and afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar, and opened a law office in Oneonta, N. Y.

During revival meetings Olin heard A. B. Earle preach on "The Power of Prayer." Immediately he skeptically challenged the pastor to try prayer on him, but declined to cooperate by going forward. However, the minister urged people to pray for the young lawyer. A few nights later Olin yielded, was thoroughly converted and joined the church. Having been suggested as a candidate for Congress, and having been invited to enter partnership with a prosperous law firm in New York City, he declined. Instead, he entered the Methodist ministry and became a member of the ONEIDA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1851. With changes in district and conference boundaries he became a member of the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE, and then in 1869 of the WYOMING CONFERENCE.

Olin was a presiding elder seventeen and a half years, and a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE eight times, 1860-1888. While presiding elder of the Binghamton district (1854-57), he represented Broome County one term in the State Assembly, having been nominated by the Prohibition party and endorsed by the Republican. WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY conferred upon him the M.A. degree, and SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY the D.D. degree. He was married twice; first to Emily A. Reed, and in 1857 to Melissa E. Walker, both of Oneonta.

Olin had a striking personality, was an eloquent speaker and a contender for righteousness. He died in Dexter, Mich., on Sept. 16, 1889, and was buried in Oneonta.

LOUIS D. PALMER

OLIVER, (CAPTAIN) WILLIAM (1849-1937), Canadian Methodist lay missionary, was born March 19, 1849, at Bishoptown-on-Clyde, SCOTLAND. His father was a farmer and tile-maker, his mother a servant girl who took William, strapped to her back, when she went reaping with a sickle in the fields. William went to work at the incredibly early age of five, driving the blind horse that powered the mill for crushing tile clay. At seven he was a rivet boy at Denny's shipyards. By going to night school, for which he paid a penny a week, he learned to write by the age of fourteen.

At twenty, William Oliver went to sea as ship's carpenter on the Norwegian sailing ship "Ebenazer," and for the next twelve years he sailed all over the world on a number of vessels. Once, when their sailing ship was caught in the doldrums crossing the Atlantic, he saved himself and the crew from starvation by scraping fishy grain off the keelson, washing it, and grinding it up for porridge.

At the age of thirty-two, and in an advanced stage of alcoholism, he arrived in Victoria, Vancouver Island, where he left the ship and went to work in the shipyards, transferring a year later to New Westminster on the Fraser. It was here in the year 1883, at the age of thirty-four, that he was dramatically converted.

Not long after his religious experience he met THOMAS CROSBY, who raised money in the East to purchase or build a mission boat for the West Coast work. William Oliver offered his services. Working for mere room and board, he built the first Methodist mission boat on the West Coast, "The Glad Tidings." When she was launched he accompanied Crosby as engineer, later as skipper. After "The Glad Tidings" was wrecked, Oliver entered the fish-oil manufacturing business on the Queen Charlotte Islands, but five years later he sold out, and using his own money, he built the "Udal," which he presented to the church with the stipulation that he be allowed to navigate her. In the closing years of his life he designed and built two more mission vessels, the "Thomas Crosby," and the "Melvin Swartout." At the age of eighty he retired from sailing and took the job of supervising the building, equipment, and maintenance of the marine mission fleet for The United Church of Canada.

Captain Oliver was a daring navigator, a master craftsman, and a fearless personal evangelist, whose reputation was unsurpassed along the coast from Vancouver to Alaska. He was for years the companion and friend of the renowned Thomas Crosby, and though intensely devout he was at home with loggers, fishermen, trappers, and lighthouse-keepers wherever he went.

In April, 1896, Oliver married Agnes Calder, the daughter of one of the first converts among the Haida people of Queen Charlotte Islands. They had no children of their own, but adopted one boy, Robert. Captain Oliver died Jan. 3, 1937, after fifty years of service on the coast.

OLIVERS, THOMAS (1725-1799), British itinerant—shoemaker, musician, poet, hymn writer, controversialist—was born at Tregynon, Montgomeryshire, and baptized Sept. 8, 1725. Converted at BRISTOL under WHITEFIELD, joining the Methodists at Bradford-on-Avon, Olivers began preaching about 1744. Associated with WESLEY from 1753, he traveled until 1772 in Lancashire, Yorkshire, SCOTLAND, IRELAND and LONDON. After 1777 he resided in London, where he lent £600 toward Wesley's Chapel, and subedited (badly) Methodist publications. In dignified, well-reasoned, sometimes caustic writings he championed Wesley's Methodism against AUGUSTUS TOPLADY, ROWLAND and Richard HILL, and Theophilus EVANS. He wrote the hymn, The God of Abraham Praise, which yet remains in Methodist hymnals. He died at Hoxton, March 7, 1799.

GEORGE LAWTON

OLMSTEAD, B. L. (1886-1960), an ordained elder of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was editor of Arnold's Com- mentary (Free Methodist) for twenty-nine years. He held the degrees A.B. and A.M., Wheaton College, Illinois; B.D., McCormick Theological Seminary. He pursued graduate studies at Glasgow, Scotland on the Bernadine Orme Smith Fellowship. He was pastor of Free Methodist churches in MICHIGAN, INDIANA, and ILLINOIS. He served as Dean of Theology, GREENVILLE COLLEGE (1922-31). He then became editor of Free Methodist Sunday school literature, continuing until his death in 1960. He was a reverent scholar, clear writer, persuasive preacher. He died at Winona Lake, Ind.

BYRON S. LAMSON

OLMSTEAD, WILLIAM B. (1862-1941), an ordained elder of the California Conference of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was General Missionary Secretary. He attended Spring Arbor Seminary. He was pastor and superintendent in OHIO and MICHIGAN, and was elected editor of Sunday school literature in 1898 and General Sunday School Secretary in 1907. While President of Westington Springs Junior College, he was elected General Missionary Secretary serving from 1919 to 1933. He was a pastor in the California Conference until his death, Sept. 22, 1941. He was a capable administrator, clear writer, forceful preacher and a great missionary statesman. His death occurred at San Jose, Calif.

OLSON, OSCAR THOMAS (1887-1964), American pastor, ecumenist, liturgist and authority on the Methodist ritual, was born at CHICAGO, Ill., Jan. 2, 1887, the son of Oliver W. and Hannah T. Olson. He received his A.B. from ALBION COLLEGE in 1911, his M.A. from Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary in 1913. He held several honorary degrees.

He married Edith Margaret Ketcham in 1912, and one of their three sons was John Frederic Olson, president of OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY. His pastorates included Trinity Church, DETROIT, Mich.; historic Mount Vernon Place Church, BALTIMORE, Md., where he exerted considerable influence in that city; Wilmette Parish Church, Wilmette, Ill., and from 1924 until his retirement in 1959, he served Epworth-Euclid Church, CLEVELAND, Ohio.

Olson early obtained a name for himself in the field of liturgics, and was a pioneer in calling the attention of Methodism to the proper use of forms of worship. He was a member of the Joint Hymnal Commission of the Methodist Churches, which brought out the Methodist Hymnal in 1935, and on its sub-committee which drew up the Responsive Readings published in that Hymnal. He was chairman of the Commission on Rituals and Worship of the M. E. Church, and served as secretary and editor for the commission that published the Book of Worship in 1944. He also became chairman of the Commission on Worship of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1940-48. He was a delegate from the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE to the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1932, the Uniting Conference of 1939, and to the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940, 1948, 1952, 1956, and 1960. In the last named quadrennia, he was a delegate from the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE. He was put in strong nominations for the episcopacy several times by his conference brethren.

In 1947, he was made secretary of the ECUMENICAL

METHODIST COUNCIL, Western Section; in 1951 at the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL in OXFORD, England, he was elected President of the American Section; in 1956 at the World Methodist Conference at LAKE JUNALUSKA, he became Vice-President of the World Methodist Council.

He died Nov. 23, 1964 and was buried in Forest Hill Cemetery, Ann Arbor, Mich.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA, U.S.A., known as "the Gateway City," is on the Missouri River opposite Council Bluffs, Iowa, and is the industrial and commercial center of NEBRASKA. An important grain, livestock and meatpacking market, Omaha's major industry is food processing. Among other things, it manufactures farm machinery, fertilizer and insecticides. It has the nationally known "Boys Town," a famous symphony orchestra, Joselyn Museum, and Mormon Cemetery.

The site of a licensed Indian trading post in 1825, Omaha was founded in 1854 and incorporated in 1857. It is the seat of the Municipal University of Omaha, Creighton University, Duchesne College, the College of St. Mary, and of Nebraska's School for the Deaf.

Methodism was introduced into the Omaha region about 1851 when William Simpson was sent to Council Bluffs from the IOWA CONFERENCE. Omaha first appears on the M. E. Church records in 1854. It was listed (1855) in connection with the MISSOURI CONFERENCE. The next year it was included in the KANSAS and NEBRASKA CONFERENCE. In 1861 it reported eighty-one members with property valued at $6,000, and then came to be in the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE which was organized in 1860.

Omaha had three churches in 1876 with 359 members, not including an A. M. E. Church with thirty-seven members. First Church then had 252 members.

Omaha was for many years Headquarters of the Omaha Area in the M. E. Church, including Iowa and Nebraska. After 1939 the JURISDICTIONAL system separated these states, and though Omaha continued as headquarters for a time, it served various territories—KANSAS, indeed, being added for one quadrennium. LINCOLN, Neb., is at present headquarters for the Nebraska Area as well as for the Nebraska Annual Conference. In 1891 the Nebraska Methodist Hospital (now the Omaha Methodist Hospital) was established. It is presently in process of moving to new and adequate modern facilities in the western suburbs of Omaha. GOODWILL INDUSTRIES came to Omaha in 1934 from St. Louis, Mo., with Ross Wesley Adair at the head. E. E. Hosman guided its development until his retirement when it moved to very modern facilities in a strategic location on South 42nd Street.

Strategic Air Command headquarters to the south of the city offers special opportunities for Methodism to touch the lives of a select group of U.S. Airmen and their families. The Omaha Campus Ministry, an ecumenical project, has been directed by Leonard S. Barry, under Nebraska Conference appointment since 1963. He ministers to colleges and graduate schools of the city. Benjamin F. Schwartz also serves as Assistant Protestant chaplain of the Veterans Administration Hospital in Omaha. There are four congregations of the A.M.E. CHURCH, and one each of the FREE METHODIST, WESLEYAN METHODIST, and C.M.E. CHURCHES.

In 1970 there were seventeen United Methodist churches in Omaha with a total membership of 14,508, and property valued at $7,476,595.

First Church was the first church of any denomination to be organized in Omaha. The first Methodist sermon ever preached in Nebraska was delivered by Harrison Presson on April 21, 1850 to members of the wagon train with which he was traveling. Returning later, Presson was a member of the Nebraska Conference for many years. Omaha first appeared on the records of the M. E. Church in 1854.

On Aug. 13, 1854, Peter Cooper preached at the Snowden residence. In September 1855, Isaac F. Collins of Council Bluffs, Iowa, organized First Methodist Church in the Territorial Capitol Building with six members—twelve years before statehood. Omaha reported twenty-six members in 1855; eighty-one in 1861; and 232 in 1876.

Early in 1856 the first building was erected on the site given to the church by the Ferry Boat Company, whose president was William B. Brown, a true pioneer of Omaha and a Methodist. The Ferry Boat Company gave two lots. One was sold for $1,500 and the money was used in building the first sanctuary at a cost of $4,500. It was dedicated in 1856 by Moses Shinn, presiding elder.

In 1876 a frame church was constructed and occupied until June 8, 1890, when the basement of the third building was first occupied. The imposing edifice was of stone and brick, and seated 1,200 people. It cost approximately $100,000 and was dedicated May 24, 1890. This church was completely destroyed by fire on Jan. 11, 1954.

After the fire the present church was built at 69th and Cass Streets. The first service was held in it June 2, 1957. It is located on twelve acres of land. In 1970 First Church reported 3,796 members.

Omaha City Mission Society, as it is now constituted, is an agency of the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of The United Methodist Church, and is a new organization, having been incorporated in January, 1959. However, the present organization is the successor to the oldest social agency in the state of NEBRASKA, the Christian Workers Association, which was founded Oct. 27, 1872, by a group of laymen of the First Methodist Church of the city of Omaha. In 1922 the Women's Home Missionary Society of The M. E. Church became interested in sponsoring the work of "The Mission," and soon assumed the responsibility for its operation.

The work of the Agency was originally that of relief to the poor, a shelter for the homeless, day care for children, and a dormitory for women and girls. The growth of the city and the changing of neighborhoods made the location at 1204 Pacific unsuited for the program of the Agency by the late twenties. The building was sold and the Agency moved in 1934 to a rented property at 2201 Cass Street. The new location and a new approach to human needs caused the program of the Agency to be that of a community or "settlement house" center. The building became known as Neighborhood House and served with great success for twenty-four years in a very needy section of the Near-North Side of Omaha.

A new modern community center called "Wesley House" at 2001 North 35th Street was erected in 1958-59. Wesley House is located in the center of an area of 16,000 persons in which there are no churches of major denominations, no recreation or community service facilities except a public grade school. It is an area in which there is an increasing number of minority peoples. The neighborhood shows some signs of change and deterioration, but is not past reclamation. A third community center program was begun at 30th and Grant Streets in the property of the Municipal Housing Authority in the city of Omaha in the summer of 1959.

Before Wesley House building plans were approved, a re-study was made of the services and the type program to be carried on by the Agency. The purposes of Omaha City Mission Society were set forth in the new constitution to be:

To provide Christian neighborhood centers which shall work cooperatively with the communities, schools, churches, and other religious and social welfare agencies to determine and meet the spiritual, intellectual, physical, moral and civic needs of the communities irrespective of race, color, or creed. This purpose shall be achieved through the provision for religious instruction, and services, recreation, group work, and education.

A professionally trained, dedicated staff of Christian workers is now actively engaged in fulfilling this purpose through the various groups, programs and activities of the Agency in three centers in three distinct communities. Those centers are: Wesley House, 2001 North 35th Street; Neighborhood House, 724 North 22nd Street; and Hilltop Homes, 3012 Grant Street.

St. Paul Church is a church situated midway between an inner-city situation and the suburbs and continues to demonstrate a deep concern for church extension. Involved in a building program and an enlarging local program, St. Paul has managed to invest significantly in the development of five new churches in the Omaha area during the past ten years.

St. Paul is the result of a merger of three churches—Centenary, Walnut Hill, and Benson Methodist churches, as these were during the days of economic depression. Their merger was accomplished in 1930 when the respective properties were transferred to the St. Paul M.E. Church. A new site was purchased—its present location—at the intersection of Country Club Avenue and Corby Street.

During the period since this merger the church has grown approximately four times its original membership. Its leadership is characterized by laymen and ministers who are concerned to identify the efforts of the church both with the community and with the larger reaches of world responsibility. The aim is to balance its local program with the investment of both money and personnel in new churches, and in world mission projects.

Throughout its history the church has emphasized a strong Christian education program. Wherever possible its program has also had a strong family emphasis, but the church has provided also for persons whose experiences are found mostly outside the family setting. The time of one staff member is devoted to programs reaching persons who do not feel at home in the traditional couple, or family-centered type of church life. Having been a pioneer in Omaha in the development of a program characterized by multiple-services and a staff ministry, St. Paul looks forward to continuing opportunities for improvements.

In 1970 St. Paul Church reported 3,205 members, property valued at $1,120,455, and a total of $213,952 raised for all purposes.

ISAMU OMURA

OMURA, ISAMU (1901-), Japanese pastor and church leader, was born in Yamanashi Prefecture in central JAPAN, and was baptized as an infant in the Methodist Church. He graduated from the Theological Department of AOYAMA GAKUIN, TOKYO, in 1928. After serving for three years as a pastor, he came to BOSTON UNIVERSITY, where he received the S.T.B. degree in 1933, and S.T.M. in 1934.

On returning to Japan he became pastor of the Asagaya Methodist Church in Tokyo, and at the same time began teaching in the Theological Department of Aoyama Gakuin. He gave up his pastorate when he was made Dean of the Theological Department in 1937, but, when he resigned as Dean in 1940, he returned to the same church, of which he is still pastor. He has been active in the work of the United Church of Christ in Japan, in which the Japan Methodist Church merged in 1941. He has represented the church in various international meetings, including the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in Denver in 1960. At that time he was serving as vice-moderator. In 1962 he was elected moderator of the United Church of Christ in Japan, and was re-elected in 1964.

ONDERDONK, FRANK SCOVILL (1871-1936), American missionary and leader in missionary work in MEXICO, was born in Mission Valley, TEXAS. Educated at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas, he was admitted to the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, and then went to Mexico in 1897 and was an active leader in the Central Mexico Mission. He was District Superintendent in San Luis Potosi (1897-1901), and in Mexico City (1901-03); principal of the Colegio Wesleyan in Guadalajara (1903-07); and in San Luis Potosi (1907-14).

A large, genial, optimistic, and energetic man, he earned the affection as well as the support of those who knew him both in Mexico and in the missionary promotional visits he frequently made back to Texas and into other states, where he addressed large assemblies of Southern Methodists. In 1910, when the Mexican revolution started, Onderdonk went back to Texas to take charge of the work there. He wrote one book A Glimpse at Mexico.

ONEIDA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Cazenovia, N. Y., in June 1829. It was formed by dividing the GENESEE CONFERENCE. The 1828 GENERAL CONFERENCE voted to permit the Genesee Conference to divide into two bodies if it so desired. At its session in Ithaca, beginning July 24, 1828, the conference voted to divide, designated the part of its territory east of Cayuga Lake as the Oneida Conference and agreed to meet as separate conferences in 1829. The territory of the Oneida Conference included a part of central New York and a small part of northern PENNSYLVANIA. The conference began with six districts—Black River, Cayuga, Chenango, Oneida, Pottsdam, and Susquehanna. There were fifty-nine charges and 19,320 members.

At its 1835 session the Oneida Conference voted to ask the General Conference to divide it into two conferences. At that time the conference had nine districts, 119 charges, and 34,763 members. The next year the northern part of the conference territory was set off as the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE. This left the Oneida Conference with six districts—Berkshire, Cayuga, Chenango, Cortland, Oneida, and Susquehanna—sixty-seven charges, and 19,164 members.

In 1851 the Oneida Conference had eight districts and 30,484 members. The next year three of those districts—Newark, Susquehanna, and Wyoming—were set off as the WYOMING CONFERENCE. This left the Oneida Conference with 19,207 members.

The 1868 General Conference abolished the Oneida Conference. Its territory was divided between the Wyoming Conference and the newly created CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE. The Chenango and Otsego Districts went to the Wyoming Conference, and the Auburn, Cazenovia, Cortland, and Oneida Districts to the Central New York body. The latter is regarded as the legal and historical successor of the Oneida Conference.

In 1868, its last year, the Oneida Conference reported 146 charges, 19,467 members, and property valued at $840,600.

ONTARIO LADIES' COLLEGE, founded in 1874, is located in Whitby, Ontario, CANADA. The original structure, built by Sheriff Nelson G. Reynolds in 1859 and known as "Trafalgar Castle," is reputed to have been the finest private residence in Canada in its day. When it was learned that the palatial dwelling would have to be sold, a small group of men in the Whitby area acted swiftly to secure the building and its 100 acres of property from the sheriff as a school for girls, in the name of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. J. E. Sanderson was appointed moral governor and J. J. Hare principal. In 1878, an extension known as Ryerson Hall, in honor of EGERTON RYERSON, was erected to provide for the increasing enrollment. In 1895 another extension, known as Frances Hall, in honor of Lillian Frances Massey Treble, a generous benefactress of the school, was built. Between 1911 and 1913 further extensions to the main structure were made, as there were in 1955.

The college has been administered by a board of directors, incorporated in 1878 as a private company with share capital under the statutes of the Province of Ontario. In 1961 this charter was amended to provide for a company without share capital.

The college has always maintained close ties with the church. At the time of church union in Canada in 1925, this relationship was substantially strengthened. The school is now classified as a secondary school operating under the Board of Colleges of The United Church of Canada, which makes an annual grant.

The first principal remained at his post forty-two years and was succeeded in 1915 by Francis L. Farewell. At his death in 1928, Charles R. Carscallen was appointed. Stanley L. Osborne became principal in 1948 and was succeeded in 1968 by R. C. Davis.

When the school was founded, it was primarily a finishing school. Today the curriculum embraces the five-year program of the arts and science branch of the department of education of the Province of Ontario, and offers English, history, geography, mathematics, science, Latin, French, German, and home economics. In the residence 125 students can be accommodated.

ORANGE, New South Wales, Australia. Wolaroi College for boys is 200 miles west of SYDNEY. It was established as a Methodist school in 1926, being acquired from private interests, and has twenty-seven acres of land.

From 1950 modern buildings have been erected, such as Manual Arts, Classrooms and Junior School. The school has an agricultural trend, but also directs to University Entrance in all fields—Arts, Sciences, and Commerce.

Enrolment is 132, of whom 112 are boarders.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

ORANGEBURG, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., Methodist Home for the Aging. On Nov. 2, 1953 the Board of Hospitals and Homes of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE purchased 113 acres of land east of Orangeburg on which there were ten buildings, properly equipped to take care of aging people. The Home thus purchased was opened on Jan. 6, 1954 with ten residents. The property had formerly served as a training school for air cadets during World War II.

In 1956 the Costen Harrell Building was opened. In 1958 a modern infirmary was opened and in 1961 Harmon Hall opened. In 1963 extensive renovation was made to Capers Hall and a superintendent's residence was built. In 1964 there was a tenth anniversary celebration and a new wing was added to the infirmary. A new residence hall was opened the next year and the business manager's residence renovated. The infirmary has a capacity of fifty-one. The residence capacity, including the infirmary, is 200. The present value of property is $110,000 and that of buildings and equipment is $485,000. There is very little indebtedness.

Trinity Church is a church of the former Central Jurisdiction and is a haven of worship for a cross-section of the Orangeburg community, as well as for students and faculties of two colleges, CLAFLIN COLLEGE, a Methodist institution, and the South Carolina State College. Trinity has served people of all stations of life since T. Willard Lewis, presiding elder of the Charleston District, and Thomas Phillips organized the church the first Sunday in January 1866, in a schoolhouse built by the Freedmen's Bureau. The present edifice, located on Boulevard, is the third structure built since the church was organized. Its three levels house a sanctuary, parish hall, nine classrooms, a pastor's office, a fully-equipped kitchen, weekday kindergarten department, mid-week service chapel, lounges, scout room and utility compartments. Also facing Boulevard, directly across from the two colleges, is the parsonage, a brick structure erected in 1949.

Trinity Church provided conference lay leadership for periods longer than any church in the conference, and has a church school and Sunday attendance record greater than any church in the conference.

Over the years Trinity has served as a center for spiritual, civic, political, and educational activity. The Centennial Celebration was observed the month of January, 1966.

ORCHARD, JOHN (1838-1907), New Zealand minister, was born in Devonshire, England. In 1861 he became a probationer of the BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. Two years later he was transferred to Victoria. In 1886 he came to CHRISTCHURCH, New Zealand, where he served for nine years. Three years after coming to New Zealand he was appointed General Superintendent of the Church in the Colony, and in 1899 was president of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, three years after the union of the Wesleyans, the Free Methodists, and the Bible Christians. He was prominent in many public movements and was, at the time of his death, a member of the City Council, of the Licensing Bench, of the Charitable Aid Board, and was a governor of the technical college. He died on Jan. 6, 1907.

ORDER OF CALEB is the organization and continuous roll, past and present, of Methodist ministers who have served twenty or more years in MONTANA. It was instituted during the 1912 session of the North Montana Conference by Bishop LUCCOCK, Aug. 16, 1912, at the Grand Union Hotel, Fort Benton, at a Pioneer Banquet given to mark the fortieth anniversary of Brother Van's (VAN ORSEL) arrival there in 1872. Brother Van refused to be honored alone and suggested that those who had served twenty years in Montana also be honored. This became the basis of membership, and the motto selected was Numbers 13:30. ("And Caleb stilled the people before Moses and said, Let us go up at once, and possess it, for we are well able to overcome it.") Following Brother Van, the Montana Methodists have honored a distinguished list of their veteran preachers.

ORDER OF ST. LUKE, originally named the Brotherhood of St. Luke, was organized in the American Methodist Church in 1946 by R. P. Marshall and William Esler Slocum, as a liturgical and pastoral fellowship, composed of Methodist ministers, seminary students and lay associates. It is not an Order in the strict sense, but a fellowship; however it does have a Rule of Life and Service which centers around the devotional life of the members, and an emphasis upon worship and the study of liturgy. Very similar to the Sacramental Fellowship in English Methodism, it maintains fraternal relations with this group, and some members hold membership in both.

The Order publishes a quarterly review, Work Worship, devoted to studies in the field of liturgy and ecumenical action. Yearly convocations are held in various Methodist seminaries, and the members have been active in the ecumenical movement, the president-emeritus, Romey P. Marshall, having been one of the organizers of the World Center for Liturgical Studies at Boca Raton, Fla. Chapters are organized in various conferences in the U.S.A.

ORDERS OF WORSHIP, U.S.A. (See WORSHIP IN AMERICAN METHODISM.)

ORDINATION. This is the name for the solemn act whereby men are set apart for office in the Christian ministry. The Lord Himself chose His apostles, and sent them forth endowed with special gifts. The rite of ordination goes back in principle into the Old Testament, and was applied to the priests, Levites, and kings (Numbers viii: 10), anointing with oil being the practice. The "laying on of hands" was also a frequent practice in ancient days, and the communication of special spiritual endowment was connected with it (see IMPOSITION OF HANDS). Moses adopted this ceremony when he set apart Joshua as his successor (Numbers xxvii: 18; Deuteronomy xxxiv: 9). In the New Testament accounts are given of the selection of church officers (Acts xiv: 21-3; vi: 1-7; xiii: 1-4). The form of ordination in New Testament life came always to be the imposition of hands with prayer. When the apostles set apart the seven deacons, as told in Acts vi, they laid their hands upon them "and prayed."

In reaction against the Roman position making ordination a sacrament, many of the evangelical churches laid the chief emphasis upon the vocation, or divine call, rather than upon an outward ordination. Martin Luther appealed to the credentials of St. Paul when he exclaimed that "He who is called, he is consecrated, and may preach Him who gave the call. That is our Lord's consecration, that is the proper chrism." However, the Augsburg Confession in Article 14 states, "No one may teach publicly in the Church, or administer the sacraments except he be rightly called." Ordination is regarded as the church's solemn approval and public attestation of such inward call. This attitude has been continued in Methodist Churches. (See MINISTRIAL CALL.)

Just when the various "orders" of the ministry of the Church originated has been a matter of debate. It is generally admitted that there is not mentioned in the New Testament an order of clergy in the modern sense of the term. After a time, however, there came to be recognized an order—not simply an office—of DEACONS, and the origin of this is to be found, as stated above, in Acts vi: 17. There was also in early days a definite order of "presbyter-bishops" (Acts xiv 23; xx 17, 28), which order later divided into presbyters (priests; see ELDER) and bishops (see EPISCOPACY). Thus there came to be in the universal Church from an early time the three traditional orders of the ministry, namely, bishops, priests, and deacons, which orders have continued into the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States. JOHN WESLEY, who sent to American Methodism three forms for ordination in the SUNDAY SERVICE, chose the name "elder" in place of "priest," and "superintendent" in place of "bishop."

At an early date the bishop took the power of ordination into his own hands, and was able to initiate persons into the diaconate, or priesthood (eldership), and also into the episcopate. One opinion is that "very early some of these episcopi were assigned the appointment and ordination of the new elders but there seems to have been no rule about it; e.g. in Egypt up to the first quarter of the third century, the presbyteries ordained without episcopal supervision" (Mejer-Jacobson quoted in Rites and Ritual of Episcopal Methodism, Harmon, p. 312).

Eventually bishops alone came to have the right to ordain (in association with the presbyters), as they now do in the Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal, and United Methodist Churches. In the United Methodist Church under certain circumstances district superintendents can do everything a bishop can do except ordain.

Ordination and John Wesley. Until well after his evangelical conversion, which itself made little difference to his views on ordination and the ministry, John Wesley held the Anglican beliefs of his day, stating that "bishops, priests and deacons were of Divine appointment" and that Episcopal ordination was necessary for valid sacraments. His field preaching—and more important in this context, his employment of LAY PREACHERS—constituted irregularities of practice. His reading in 1746 of Lord Peter King's Primitive Church, and, by 1755, of Edward Stillingfleet's Irenicon convinced him that the orders of bishops and priests respectively were essentially the same, though they performed different functions, and that no particular form of church government was prescribed by Christ or the Scriptures, and therefore none could be perpetually binding. As an ordained presbyter, Wesley accordingly claimed the right to ordain, but for a time refused to do so guarding against separation from the Church of England; another factor was undoubtedly the influence of his brother CHARLES, who did not share his new beliefs as to presbyterial powers.

John Wesley emphasized the distinction between the preaching and the sacramental office, maintaining definitely that ordination was required for the latter. In order to provide the Sacraments for his people, Wesley tried, but with little success, to secure regular ordination for some of his preachers from Anglican bishops, and, in one instance, illegal though his action strictly speaking was, obtained ordination from ERASMUS, a vagrant Greek bishop, for one preacher. In 1775, in consultation with JOHN FLETCHER and JOSEPH BENSON, he drew up a scheme for the greater efficiency of the lay preachers, including proposals for ordination, but these proved abortive.

However, in America, where according to statistics Methodism had expanded rapidly, there were few Anglican priests (and no bishops) from whom the Methodists could obtain the Sacraments. He appealed in vain to Lowth, Bishop of London, under whose jurisdiction Anglican work in America lay, to ordain one of his preachers for Methodist work there. Possibly influenced by a schismatic step in 1783, when two of Selina, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON's chaplains separated from the Church of England and proceeded to ordain laymen, Wesley, on Wednesday, Sept. 1, 1784, "appointed Mr. Whatcoat and Mr. Vasey to go and serve the desolate sheep in America." On the next day, Thursday, he says he added three more, though no names are given. His Diary for Sept. 2 records that he "ordained Dr. Coke as a Superintendent by imposition of hands and prayer." THOMAS COKE was already a priest of the Established Church and therefore, according to Wesley's revised beliefs, required no further ordination to become a bishop or superintendent. The Diary has the word "ordained"; the Journal says "appointed"; and the certificate issued by Wesley has the words "set apart." (Journal, Standard Ed. vii; 15-16.) This "setting apart" seems to have been due as much to Coke's persuasion as to Wesley's own wishes—Coke and the Methodists in America interpreted it as episcopal consecration, though it is held by some that Wesley simply intended by this act to delegate his personal authority to Coke while in America, and also as a blessing upon his work of superintendence.

Ordinations for SCOTLAND, and for missionary work overseas successively followed. A complete list of those ordinations of which actual evidence exists may be found in the Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society (xxxiii, 118-19). This includes details of names, times of ordination, and respective orders.

Wesley's justification for these further ordinations was that these regions were outside the legal jurisdiction of the Anglican Church. This was a frail excuse based on a wrong assumption, as the Church of England had its representatives in these countries. Inevitably, ordinations for the English work followed. Pressure was brought to bear on Wesley by people and preachers alike, while some of the latter had taken upon themselves the right to administer the Sacraments without any authority deriving from Wesley at all. As his brother Charles, who had been the greatest restraint upon these moves, was now dead, John Wesley ordained the first of three men for England, ALEXANDER MATHER, deacon and presbyter on Aug. 6 and 7, 1788, respectively. HENRY MOORE and THOMAS RANKIN were similarly ordained on Feb. 26 and 27, 1789.

Together with the appointment of Coke, Wesley published his Sunday Service for the American Methodists, which was a revision of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. The ordination services he prescribed therein were for the orders of deacon, elder, and superintendent, indicating his preference for the threefold order of ministry. After John Wesley's death, his followers in England placed little value on his opinions on this subject; the rite of ordination was for the meantime abandoned (apart from the ordination of men destined for service overseas), and when the laying on of hands was resumed in 1836, ordination was simply to the "office and work of a Christian minister"—a form unknown to Wesley.

The final attitude of Wesley to his ordinations, and related questions, is clearly that of a man with a mind deeply and painfully divided. He had set his heart upon preventing separation from the Church of England, yet in his old age he knew that his purpose was defeated, and that the cumulation of his own actions involved virtual separation. So in the Journal for July 27, 1786 he can register the determination of the British Conference not to separate "at least till I am removed into a better world" (cf. May 16, 1788). Yet on July 29, 1788 the Journal can still rehearse the "variations" from the Church of England as not involving separation. So also in his celebrated last bitter letter to ASBURY of Sept. 20, 1788: "But in one point, my dear brother, I am a little afraid both the Doctor [Coke] and you differ from me. I study to be little; you study to be great.—How can you, how dare you, suffer yourself to be called Bishop? I shudder, I start at the very thought." Wesley was not declaring regret that he set up an authoritative connexional Church government in America, exercising episcopate under "General Superintendents." It was simply that he did not like the word "bishop," which for him had traditionalist and Anglican connotations it did not carry for most of his American followers. In summarizing the evidence that the aged Wesley had mixed feelings about his ordinations (John Wesley and Christian Ministry, pp. 172-3), the present writer states his judgment: Wesley "does regret, not so much the ordinations, as the circumstances necessitating them and the results of them."

Ordination in American Methodism. John Wesley for forty years after he held his first Methodist Conference in 1744, would let none of his preachers administer the Sacraments while they were unordained, although he licensed and directed them in preaching. Nor did Francis Asbury in America allow—when he could help it—any of the American preachers, unordained as they then were, to administer the Sacraments, although ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and one or two others acted on their own. However, in 1784, Wesley sent over to America with Thomas Coke forms for ordination in the Prayer Book or Sunday Service which he had prepared, and which the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE adopted. From that day to this in American Methodism the three respective forms of ordination which Wesley sent have been used to induct men into the diaconate, the eldership, and the episcopate. Preliminary to this move, as is narrated above, John Wesley himself had ordained Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey as elders, and had ordained Thomas Coke a superintendent (see CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, SUNDAY SERVICE, THOMAS COKE, FRANCIS ASBURY).

The ordination forms of the American Methodist Ritual—which were taken from the Book of Common Prayer almost litteratim—may be studied for the vows which the respective ordinands take, and the authority given to each person in these three separate investitures. In the Methodist Episcopal Churches, the "ordination of a bishop" was definitely changed by the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the respective Churches to "the consecration of a bishop," with the intention of indicating the teaching of these Churches, and that of The United Methodist Church, that the bishop is not a higher order than that of the elder. The Protestant Episcopal Church and the Church of England hold that there is an order of bishops and another order of priests, but in episcopal Methodism the bishop is regarded simply as an elder who has been set apart by a special rite for an office of high administration. However, the M.E. Church, South always contended—and a strong opinion in present Methodist life contends—that "once a bishop always a bishop," and that men who have been inducted into this office have the right to ordain as long as they live. This right has recently been challenged by those Methodist bodies which elect a bishop for a stated term only, especially the CENTRAL CONFERENCES of the now United Methodist Church.

At the General Conference of 1964 (TMC) a strong effort was made to do away with the ordination of deacons, and make this simply consecration to an office rather than to an order. The same idea, namely, that there is but one ordination, was furthered by the E.U.B. CHURCH, when it came into union with The Methodist Church.

The EVANGELICAL branch of the E.U.B. Church had traditionally observed a dual ordination of deacons and elders while the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST had only one ordination (elder) except for a few years (1818-25) in its early history. With the formation of the E.U.B. Church in 1946, one ordination was adopted—that for an elder.

However, at the 1968 Conference uniting The Methodist Church and the E.U.B. connection, there was a report of a quadrennial committee which had been directed in 1964 to study the ministry in The Methodist Church. This committee in turn consulted with the E.U.B. representatives and there was general agreement that there should be a recommendation that The United Methodist Church keep the diaconate as a separate order as it has been in Methodism since the time of Wesley and the Christmas Conference. This was done and so the two orders remain in The United Methodist Church. (See also, DEACON, ELDER, EPISCOPACY.)

O'REAR, EDWARD CLAY (1863-?), American jurist, who represented the M.E. Church, South in important litigation for many years, was born on Feb. 2, 1863, in Montgomery County, Ky. He was educated at the public schools of that state. Judge O'Rear, as he was usually called, was elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his Church in 1910, and became chairman of the Vanderbilt Commission created by the General Conference of 1906 and asked to determine the relation of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY to the M.E. Church, South. He, as attorney, represented the Church in the ensuing litigation. He became a judge in Montgomery County, Ky., and later became judge of the Court of Appeals of KENTUCKY. He was the Republican nominee for the governor of Kentucky in 1911. Judge O'Rear was a well-known figure in the general councils of the M.E. Church, South and earned the gratitude of that Church for his efforts in its behalf.

OREGON, population 2,056,171 in 1970 is in the Pacific northwest. The area of the state is 96,981 square miles. Oregon was made a territory in 1848, and in 1859 it was admitted to the Union. In 1853 WASHINGTON Territory was carved out of Oregon Territory.

The first Methodist and the first American missionaries in Oregon were JASON LEE and his associates who in 1834 settled on the Willamette River between present day OREGON CITY and SALEM. In 1843 Lee was replaced by GEORGE GARY as superintendent of the mission, and Gary in turn was superseded by WILLIAM ROBERTS in 1847.

The Oregon and California Mission Conference, which also included the present states of NEW MEXICO, ARIZONA, WASHINGTON, and IDAHO, was created in 1849. The 1852 GENERAL CONFERENCE authorized the division of the Oregon and California Mission Conference so as to form the OREGON CONFERENCE and this then included Oregon, Washington and Idaho, and was organized in March, 1853. The 1872 General Conference authorized the formation of a conference in east Oregon. In 1873 the bishop in charge of the Oregon Conference appointed preachers to three districts in the newly formed East Oregon and Washington Conference, so named because it included the work in east Washington also. In 1876 the name was changed to the COLUMBIA RIVER CONFERENCE. The Oregon Conference lost the west Washington work in 1884 when the PUGET SOUND CONFERENCE was organized.

The M. E. Church had foreign language work (German, Norwegian, and Danish) in Oregon and the surrounding states. (See WASHINGTON.)

The M.E. Church, South began work in Oregon in 1858, and in 1866 the PACIFIC CONFERENCE (MES) was divided to form the Columbia Conference. The latter included Oregon, Washington, and the northern part of CALIFORNIA. The first session of the Oregon Conference was held at Corvallis, Ore., Oct. 26-30, 1866 with Bishop H. H. KAVANAUGH presiding. It reported twelve charges, fourteen preachers, and 526 members. The Southern Church persevered in the northwest, but it did not have as great success as the Northern Church. In 1890 the Columbia Conference was divided to form the East Columbia Conference, but prior to the division the conference had only thirty-five charges and 1,963 members. In the same year the Oregon and Puget Sound Conferences of the M.E. Church reported a total of nearly 15,000 members. Both the Columbia and East Columbia Conferences continued until 1917 when they merged with the MONTANA CONFERENCE to form the NORTHWEST CONFERENCE which continued until unification in 1939. In 1917 the Columbia, East Columbia, and Montana Conferences reported 1,905, 2,010, and 969 members respectively. The Southern Church established two schools which operated twenty years or more before closing—Corvallis College at Corvallis and Columbia College at Pendleton.

The M.P. CHURCH listed conferences or missions in Oregon from 1850 to the turn of the century, but it had no appreciable strength in the state. In 1968 the FREE METHODIST CHURCH had some 110 congregations and over 8,000 members in Oregon. Each of the three major Negro Methodist denominations has one or two churches in the state.

The M.E. Church projected ten or more academies and colleges in Oregon, but only one, WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, has survived. Today the Oregon Conference also supports a number of other service agencies and institutions.

THE IDAHO CONFERENCE which began in 1884 has always included within its bounds several counties in eastern Oregon. In 1968 the Idaho Conference had thirteen charges and about 2,770 members in Oregon.

In 1968 the Oregon and Idaho Conferences merged to form the Oregon-Idaho Conference. At that time The Methodist Church had 158 pastoral charges and approximately 55,000 members in the state of Oregon.

OREGON CITY, OREGON, U.S.A. First Church. The first pastor at Willamette Falls, later Oregon City, was Alvin F. Waller, assigned by JASON LEE in 1840. The work was to be solely among the Indians. By 1842 the Indians were disappearing and whites beginning to arrive. More came in 1843. That year the Methodists erected in Oregon City the first Protestant church on the Pacific Coast. The church was dedicated in 1844 by GUSTAVUS HINES who succeeded Waller that year. By 1848 DAVID LESLIE was pastor and mission superintendent, and WILLIAM ROBERTS took up his residence at the place. That year Oregon City and Clackamas, attached to the circuit, reported forty-seven members. The following year, JAMES HARVEY WILBUR and J. L. PARRISH were appointed to Oregon City and Portland.

In 1855, the Oregon City Seminary, originally set up as an interdenominational school in 1849, was sold to the Methodists. The original sponsors, headed by Congregational pastor George H. Atkinson, were unable to finance the school. The Methodists leased it to the City Council in 1860 and sold it in 1867.

GEORGE ABERNETHY, first Governor of OREGON, was a member of this church, a trustee and largest contributor. In 1846, the Territorial Fourth of July celebration was held in the church, and the Provisional legislature met there in 1847-48. In 1855 the OREGON ANNUAL CONFERENCE met in this church, with Bishop O. C. BAKER presiding.

In 1856 the building was moved to Seventh and Main Streets, and replaced by a new structure in 1890. In 1903 the building was raised and a store constructed under it. In 1919 the plant was destroyed by fire. The next building, a remodeled home, was dedicated by Bishop WILLIAM O. SHEPARD, March 20, 1921, while Melville T. Wire was pastor. The cornerstone for a new building was laid, Aug. 6, 1950 and the structure was dedicated Feb. 17, 1957.

OREGON CONFERENCE (MC), grew out of the mission established by JASON LEE and his associates on the Willamette River in September 1834. The group farmed, preached, and conducted a Sunday school and a day school. Additional personnel, including a physician and several women, arrived in 1837. In 1838 a branch was opened at The Dalles on the Columbia River, and in 1839 Lee returned east to ask for more help. He brought fifty-one men, women and children to OREGON. Stations were then opened in several more places. Meantime, adverse reports on Lee's management of the mission caused the Missionary Society in New York to send out GEORGE GARY in 1843 to replace him as superintendent. The original purpose of the mission was to minister to the Indians, but it soon became largely a ministry to the white settlers. WILLIAM ROBERTS, an able leader, succeeded Gary as superintendent in 1847. By 1848 there were seven circuits in Oregon with 443 members, and on Sept. 5, 1849 Roberts presided at the organization of the Oregon and California Mission Conference which had been authorized by the 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCE.

In 1852 the Oregon and California Mission Conference was divided to form the Oregon Conference which at the time included all of what are now Oregon, WASHINGTON, and IDAHO, and part of MONTANA. At the end of the first year the conference reported eleven charges and 706 members. As time passed new conferences were formed in the region (see OREGON), and finally in 1928 the boundaries of the Oregon Conference (ME) were limited to the state, except for six eastern counties which continued in the IDAHO CONFERENCE. In 1929 the Oregon Conference had 29,694 members. It came to unification in 1939 with 144 charges and 34,729 members. The Portland District of the NORTHWEST CONFERENCE (MES) brought thirteen charges and 1,835 members into the Oregon Conference of The Methodist Church in 1939.

Jason Lee and his associates started the Oregon Institute in 1842, the forerunner of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY at SALEM. Through the years the Oregon Conference fostered a number of other academies and colleges which lived and served for longer or shorter periods, but Willamette is the only Methodist institution of higher learning in Oregon which has survived. With an endowment of nearly $9,000,000, a plant valued at $10,000,000, a faculty of more than 100, and a student body of 1,500, Willamette rates high academically. It claims to be the oldest United States university west of Missouri.

The Pacific Christian Advocate of the M.E. Church was founded in 1855 at Salem, Ore., moved to PORTLAND in 1857, and continued publication for more than sixty years.

The Oregon Conference supported Willamette Methodist Hospital, Willamette View Manor, the Methodist Home in Salem, five WESLEY FOUNDATIONS, and several GOODWILL INDUSTRIES in the state. It joined the American Baptists in supporting Rose Villa at Milwaukie, and it cooperated with the Presbyterians and Episcopalians in maintaining Rogue Valley Manor at Medford.

One member of the Oregon Conference, BRUCE BAXTER, was elected bishop in 1940.

In 1968 the Oregon Conference had four districts, 145 pastoral charges, 213 ministers, 51,717 members, and property valued at $24,807,197. By authority of the Western JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, in 1968 both the Oregon Conference and the Idaho Conference voted unanimously to merge in 1969 to form the Oregon-Idaho Conference.

OREGON MISSION. The Methodist mission to the Indians of OREGON under the leadership of JASON LEE was one of the most remarkable in the early history of such work. While it seemed to fail in the end, it did have certain enduring results.

The trigger that sent Lee to Oregon was the report of a plea in 1831 by four Indians in St. Louis for Christian missionaries who would interpret to their people "the white man's God." Lee was a young member of an old New England family. He was recruited by WILBUR FISK, president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn. Lee's nephew, DANIEL, agreed to go out as associate to Jason in the enterprise. Lee also recruited Cyrus Shepard as a teacher, and employed two lay assistants.

They went by boat to St. Louis and from there set out in April, 1834, with another party that invited them along. Altogether there were sixty men, 200 mules and horses, and twenty head of cattle. Lee soon discovered that the Indians were not waiting for the gospel with open arms or open minds. He also found the traders less than enthusiastic about missionary work. The travellers' route took them from Independence, Mo., to the Platte River, to Wyoming, to Fort Hall, Idaho, to Fort Walla Walla, Wash., to Fort Vancouver, and finally to the Willamette Valley.

Soon they had a mission house built—and three Indian orphans to care for. Lee began with a school and sought to train the Indians as farmers so as to encourage a settled way of life. The school made slow progress; the Indians were lukewarm toward it; the climate was hard on the New Englanders; Daniel Lee had to leave to recuperate and Cyrus Shepard had a leg amputated in 1839 and died in a few months.

To strengthen the work the supporting Board sent out reinforcements: a doctor (with a wife, daughter, and son), and a ship's carpenter, plus a large quantity of supplies. A few months later another group of missionaries arrived: a single minister, a minister with a wife and three children, and a woman teacher. Jason Lee married one of the new teachers.

In 1838 Lee decided to make a trip back to New England to enlist support for an expanded mission. He aroused great response: "never before had the Methodist Church experienced a missionary campaign equalling that led by Jason Lee between the early part of November, 1838 and May, 1839," writes Wade Crawford Barclay. A budget of $30,000.00 was appropriated, and plans made for nine mission stations, with farmers, mechanics, teachers, and physicians as well as ministers. A boat was chartered to carry to Oregon the fifty-one persons who had been recruited.

With more personnel and a larger budget the work expanded rapidly, with a total of six mission stations soon in operation. But some locations were poorly chosen, some of the new missionaries (or their wives) not fully committed to the work, and the Indians began to lose their first enthusiasm for the gospel. Some of the new staff wrote back to New England criticizing Jason Lee's leadership; the Board back home felt it was not getting as frequent reports as it should, and money for the Oregon mission (and for all mission work) was increasingly hard to secure.

The Board's Oregon committee first considered sending out a special agent to try to evaluate the situation, but finally sent out George Cary to take over the work from Jason Lee with orders to liquidate virtually all "non-religious" work, and to cut down on personnel as rapidly as possible. Cary went to work with a vengeance on his arrival at the mission on June 1, 1844, and by September 1847, the whole enterprise had been liquidated—five of the stations being closed down and the sixth one given to the American Board (Congregational) representative in Oregon, Marcus Whitman.

Jason Lee, in the meantime, had gone back to New England to defend his policies and was able to vindicate his actions. But his health failed and he died in 1845, only two years before the promising enterprise to which he had given his life came to an inglorious end. There were, however, some enduring achievements: the beginnings of a school that eventually became WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, and the laying of foundations for the settling of Oregon as a state.

He has held the following appointments within the Church: Croydon, two years; Coonamble, four years; Peak Hill, three years; Home Missions Department (Assistant Secretary), four years; LEIGH THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, twelve years, assistant Principal; METHODIST LADIES' COLLEGE, Burwood, five years as Principal; Connexional Secretary, Methodist Conference, five years; Secretary of Conference 1968-69; president 1969-70.

In addition he has given the following leadership to the Methodist Church: Convenor of the Board of Finance, New South Wales; Member of the management of the Property Department; Department of Christian Education; Home Missions Department; president of the War Memorial Hospital Board; editor of The Methodist; Member of the Australasian General Conference Standing Committee; General Conference Board of Finance; Laws Committee; and member of the Joint Constitution Commission for the Uniting Church in Australia.

At other times W. D. O'Reilly has had active engagement in the affairs of Good Neighbor Council; New South Wales Society for Health; Australian Council of Churches, and Council of Churches in New South Wales, of which he became president in 1967. He was also responsible for the establishment of chaplaincy services to the Mental Hospitals in New South Wales.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

ORIGINAL SIN. The Wesleyan Doctrine. Included in WESLEY'S abridgement of the Church of England's Thirty-Nine Articles is the following version of the Article on "original or birth sin" (the passages omitted being indicated by brackets): "Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam [As the Pelagians do vainly talk], but it is the [fault and] corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually, [so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit, and therefore in every person born into this world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation. And this infection of nature doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated]." Although Wesley's abridgement clearly represents a full acceptance of man's chronic, calculable involvement in sin, his excisions also suggest concern over the difficulties presented by the notions of original guilt and indwelling sin which were to prove so preoccupying to subsequent Methodist theologians.

The persistent, repetitious nature of man's inclination to evil—and the universal misery associated therewith—were, to Wesley, pragmatic evidence of universal moral corruption. Of this there was no question. His own Doctrine of Original Sin, according to Scripture, Reason, and Experience (1757) was directed against the writings of John Taylor, whose interpretations were considered by Wesley to compromise the view that the natural condition of man is diseased, corrupt, fallen, and "devilish"—and thus to cancel out the very essence of the plan of salvation itself. Through Adam, its federal head, mankind suffered not only the loss of "original righteousness" (the knowledge and love of God, its moral image), but a corruption in understanding, will, and liberty (the so-called "natural" image of God) as a consequence of Adam's alienation from vital fellowship with God (Sermon V, i, 1-9). Although Wesley denied (until clear Scriptural proof could be brought) that any man is liable to eternal punishment for Adam's sin alone, he held that the deprivation attending mankind's collective participation in Adam's sin included the proper implications of guilt, except as graciously resolved through the universal impact of Christ's atoning grace (Romans v:18, often being cited at this point). The question of man's condition of guilt could not be discussed, insisted Wesley, apart from the integral acceptance of the universally-enlivening "prevenient" consequences of redemptive grace. As a doctrinal corollary to this, in definitive Wesleyanism, the baptism of infants remained an acknowledgement of the covenant of grace which had blessed, and continued to enlighten, universal men.

Wesley, of course, did distinguish between "original" (or "inbred," "indwelling") and "actual" sin (or sin properly so-called), thus indicating his own practical emphasis on associating guilt with direct, volitional involvement (eg. Sermon XV, The Privilege of those that are Born of God, ii, 2). However to place the Wesleyan doctrine of original sin more completely in its proper context one must also see the doctrine of entire sanctification as another direct corollary. Indeed, for Wesley the phenomenon of the reception of perfect love (as a gracious gift) constituted a restoration to that responsive communion with the divine will which defined holiness; there was release here, from man's "root" condition of unrighteousness. (See CHRISTIAN PERFECTION.)

[So CHARLES WESLEY can sing from 2 Corinthians v:17,

Enter Thyself and drive it hence,
And take up all the place (Works, xiii, 49.)

Early American Methodism. Methodist preachers and authors in the early American period (late eighteenth and early to mid-nineteenth centuries) continued, for the most part, to sustain the Wesleyan position on the universal moral corruption of "natural man"—a condition whose properly-attendant guilt had been resolved, and whose deep depravity had been mitigated, through the universal efficacy of Christ's atonement. It was such a continuing doctrinal heritage which led the American Wesleyans to reject the moralisms of the Deists and Unitarians which they encountered. Indeed, it was such an emphasis on man's moral impotency (apart from gracious restoration) which led NATHAN BANGES, American Methodism's great theological editor in the early nineteenth century, to disavow the term "Arminian" as adequately designating that doctrinal position characteristic of Methodists (acknowledging that many "who have been denominated Arminians, have not always oiled their doctrine sufficiently with divine grace").

In his extended exchanges with Professor E. T. Fitch of Yale College (published in 1837 as Calvinistic Controversy), President WILBUR FISK of the WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY felt that the conflict between Calvinism's "new divinity" and the Wesleyan stance came to a head in this very matter of the moral corruption characteristic of "natural man." The question, Fisk concluded, was simply this: "Has fallen man, on the whole, the power to make a right choice, or has he not? We say without grace he has not. And therefore fallen man is not, in the responsible sense of that term, a free agent without grace."

There was tension, however, within early American Methodism as to the continued utilization of such a doctrine of "natural man's" moral corruption. Writing in The Methodist Magazine for 1820, one Methodist author anonymously expressed his concern over this ambiguity: "We have been warring against fatality and some other doctrines connected with it, until we have been driven, it is to be feared, into extremes on the other side," such as the concept that "the most vicious disposition [may be] reformed . . . by illuminating and directing it, in the free and proper exercise of its natural faculties and powers." "This language," continued this critic, "certainly contains the very marrow of Pelagianism. By adopting it, we fly into the face of the eighth article of our faith [Of Free Will]; and thereby, we deny the first and most important doctrine of revealed religion—the utter moral depravity of man through the fall, by which he is naturally rendered absolutely incapable of any liberty in the actions of his mind, respecting a choice of good in preference to evil."

Subsequent Transitions. Certainly the most important development in mid-nineteenth century American Methodist theological history occurred, not so much at the point feared in the article just cited, but in the consideration of the implications of "original guilt" (even as resolved by grace). ASA SHINN in his Essay on the Plan of Salvation (1813) had sharply rejected any penal consequences associated with the mere possession of "original corruption"; to hold otherwise was to deny one of the inescapable "first principles of morals," namely, that "no person is accountable for what is not his power." This type of concern was to be most influentially championed, in the theological mind of mid-century American Methodism, by DANIEL D. WHEDON, Whedon, who served as editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review from 1856 to 1884, was convinced that the unique position of Methodism, theologically speaking, lay in the clear affirmation of man's freedom of contrary choice over against the "necessitarianism" of traditional Calvinism. This position led Whedon to be quite openly critical of what he took to be the carelessness of such British Methodist theologians as RICHARD WATSON and WILLIAM BURT POPE. The issue centered on the propriety of assessing universal guilt (except "presumptively") in relation to the condition of natural man prior to his own accountable action. Whedon cited, with approval, the statement of Wilbur Fisk that guilt "is not imputed until, by a voluntary rejection of the Gospel, man makes the depravity of his nature the object of his own choice." Here, insisted Whedon, there was no "hereditary guilt," only "a hereditary nature personally made guilty." Such a position was simply contradicted, according to Whedon, by W. B. Pope's statement (in his Compendium of Christian Theology, 1875) that the true doctrine of original sin is opposed "to every account of sin which insists that it cannot be reckoned such by a righteous God save where the will actively consents; and that none can be held responsible for any state of soul or action of life which is not the result of the will at the time. There is an offending character behind the offending will." (2nd. ed., 1880, Vol. II, pp. 83-4.)

THOMAS O. SUMMERS and JOHN J. TIGERT, influential theologians in the M.E. Church, South (and related to VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in the 1880's), proved supportive of the tradition suggested by Pope which upheld universal man's "realistic" involvement in Adamic guilt and the expiation of Christ's atonement. Whedon's influence, on the other hand, was to be seen in the statement by Professor MINER RAYMOND (GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, in his Systematic Theology, 1877) that the real tragedy consequent upon Adam's offense is not condemnation but the inheritance "by the natural law of propagation" of a corrupted nature.

Whedon's emphases were to be further elaborated, late in the nineteenth century, in the systematic concerns of Professor JOHN MILEY (DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, New Jersey) for a "consistent Arminianism" within American Methodist thought. Miley proved quite critical of the ambiguities regarding the nature of culpability associated with Wesley's doctrine of original sin. He insisted that the denial of original guilt, "native demerit," was the definitive theological contribution of Arminianism; indeed, Wesleyan interpretations should be clarified accordingly. The issue of injustice in the Divine economy—as related to a doctrine of universal Adamic guilt—was simply not relieved by any compensatory provisions of grace.

A somewhat different representation of the Wesleyan tradition, within mid and late-nineteenth century American Methodism, is to be found in the writings of WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN, who became the first president of Methodism's BOSTON UNIVERSITY. In his Introduction to the study of systematic theology (Einleitung. Systematische Theologie einheitlich behandelt, published in 1865 while Warren was professor in the Methodist seminary at Bremen, Germany), Warren reiterated the traditional Wesleyan doctrine of the transformation of man's initial status and condition through atoning grace; none of Adam's descendants were held guilty (i.e., under actual condemnation) until they rejected the grace of Christ. Nevertheless, Warren was quite critical of any phraseology such as "infant justification," or the restoration of "gracious ability," which might suggest some element of condemnation prior—at least, logically—to the restorative intervention of grace. Rather, insisted Warren, it was the teaching of "consistent Methodism" that the graciously-unconditional benefits of the atonement were initially constitutive of man's moral condition; "the child stands on a level with every other new created being, a natural and equal object of divine care." Rather than abstracting the moral individual from the prevenience of redemptive grace, as was the tendency in Whedon and in Miley, Warren's theological anthropology often was characterized by an unacknowledged incorporation of the effects of prevenient grace into the descriptions of man's moral nature.

The Twentieth Century. The early twentieth century, in American Methodism, was to provide clear evidences that the consensus had by then swung away from the language and implications of inherited moral corruption and attendant guilt (resolved by universally-efficacious atoning grace) to the clear affirmation of natural man's given condition as simply being that of proper and immediate moral accountability. American Methodist hymnody and ritual saw less of the language of man's sinful corruption (or of its specific theological corollary, the prevenient grace consequent upon universal atonement). The emergent influence of critical-historical Biblical scholarship, with its reassessment of some of the traditional literalisms that had become associated with the story of Adam, contributed to the disenchantment with the language of "original sin," and its implications regarding mankind's Adamic involvement. Prominent Methodist theologians such as ALBERT KNUDSON (at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY for over three decades following 1906) emphatically concluded that there is "no such thing as inherited guilt or an inherited moral depravity"; only the free activity of the will originated sin (cited in Robert Chiles' important study of Theological Transition in American Methodism, 1965). Bishop FRANCIS MCCONNELL, whose John Wesley was published in 1939, was frankly relieved to relegate the idea of "original sin" to an eighteenth-century frame of reference; rather, commented McConnell, man's nature and character is "the result of forces—physical and psychological—which have been at work for hundreds of thousands of years."

The revaluation of the traditional doctrines of original sin and original guilt—together with the acceptance of the myth form for mankind's "Adamic" involvement—was, however, to prove part of the effect within Methodism of the psycho-theological reassessment of man's nature associated subsequently in this century with the emergent influence of Kierkegaard's existential critiques, Freud's depth psychology, Barth's Biblical theology, and the re-examination of historical theology. The problem of mankind's chronic perversity—and the compensatory givenness of redemptive grace—received new emphasis in the studies of Methodist scholars such as GEORGE CELL, DAVID SHIPLEY, ALBERT OUTLER, Harold Lindstrom, Colin Williams, and others. Williams' summary of the contemporary, "existential" relevance of Wesley's doctrine of original sin, for instance (in John Wesley's Theology Today, 1960), insisted that "its restatement in terms of modern Biblical understanding" left Wesley's essential position untouched: "... in the light of prevenient grace we can speak of every man being his own Adam, so that we become aware of our separation from God as incurring guilt, because of the possibility of the repair of that relationship constantly offered by God." However, continued William's restatement, the truth that every man is his own Adam must not be stressed "to the point where the fallenness of the race for which the symbol of the First Adam stands is lost. It is only in the light of God's offer of a restored relationship (through prevenient grace) that every man becomes his own Adam."

It must also be added that mid-twentieth century Methodist literature generally continued to be marked by a now-recognizable ambiguity as touching the ground of man's moral accountability—whether it was a continuing provision of the natural order or a gift of gracious restoration. The ambiguity itself seemed to be a repetitious element in the theological anthropology of Methodism.

Developments in British Methodism. It is perhaps characteristic that in 1875, when as observed above, D. D. Whedon was in America assailing the notion of "original guilt," W. B. Pope, the most influential systematic theologian of British Methodism at that period, should be offering a learned defence of the traditional system. Since that time responsible British Methodist thought appears to have moved much more conservatively in relation to this matter than that of America, and therefore has remained much closer to Wesley, though serious account has been taken of the findings of natural science regarding the physical evolution of the human race.

Somewhat naturally, the prevailing tone has been set by the scholarship of the Church of England. Possibly the most constructive theological event was the publication in 1889, by a group of Oxford scholars coming out of the Anglo-Catholic tradition, of Lux Mundi, a set of powerfully argued essays which sought to vindicate the proposition that on the one hand the findings of natural science and of sober biblical criticism could be candidly accepted, and that on the other hand all the essential intention of traditional Christian doctrine could be maintained. This volume says little directly on the subject of Original Sin, but this approach was pursued in the most influential British books on this subject by F. R. Tennant, The Origin and Propagation of Sin (1901), and The Fall and Original Sin (1903). Here the case is argued for an "evolutionary theory of the origin of sin." During the moral probation of the evolving human race, in its first days, there was occasion for an event spiritually and morally analogous to the event described in mythological terms in the Genesis Fall-story. Thus evolutionary biology as an account of the physical origin of the race can be combined with the doctrine in theology of the fallen and sinful condition of the race.

The resultant attitude of "non-fundamentalist orthodoxy" is characteristic of most responsible Methodist theological thought in Britain at the present time. This attitude has been confirmed by various findings of modern New Testament exegesis. Thus it would be widely accepted that in such a text as 1 Corinthians xv:22, "as in Adam all die" St. Paul's essential thought is that of Adam as the spiritual "type" of the race, and is by no means entirely dependent upon an understanding of Adam as the physical ancestor of the whole race. So the Pauline theology can well survive the understanding of the Genesis Fall-story as an unhistorical myth. So also it is realized that the New Testament "wrath of God" is not so much the personal attitude of a punishing divine Judge to individual men, as a principle of divine nemesis in human affairs. So the traditional Christian doctrine that the whole fallen and guilty race is collectively under "the wrath" can be well maintained but without the morally dubious proposition that God will hold personally responsible for sin individuals who are not yet old enough or experienced enough to have made a voluntary and personally accountable choice.

The general consensus of British Methodist thought today, therefore, would be to allow the legendary character of the Genesis Fall-story, to dismiss the notion of "original guilt," yet to affirm the collective and individual moral and spiritual bondage of the race, together with the utter impossibility that man should save himself by self-improvement and education, apart from the saving grace of God.

FIRST CHURCH, ORLANDO, FLORIDA

ORLANDO, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church had its beginning when the annual conference meeting at JACKSONVILLE, Fla., in January 1874, appointed O. W. Ransome to the Orlando Circuit. At that time Orlando was a village of 450 people. Since there was no church building, services were held in the court house. A CAMP MEETING near Zellwood in 1878 greatly strengthened the Methodist work in Orlando. In 1881-82 Orlando became a half-station served by Anderson Peeler, M.D. During this time a church building was erected at a cost of $1,000 on a site purchased for $200. Under C. E. Pelot a larger building was erected in 1888. The building was not finished, but it accommodated the Annual Conference session in January 1886. Existing records of the church date from January 1885. The building was remodeled in 1904-05, during the pastorate of R. V. Atkisson, at a cost of several thousand dollars.

Plans for a modern building were made during the pastorate of Dr. Chapman, and the building was erected during the pastorate of Dr. Wray at a cost of $50,000. This structure served as the sanctuary until 1963. In 1924 during the pastorate of W. A. Cooper, Wesley Hall was built, and it serves as a part of the educational facility at the present time. In 1872 the church had a membership of 75; in 1938, 1,878; in 1944, 2,918; and 1970 the membership totalled 4,758 and it is the largest church in the FLORIDA CONFERENCE. Many of the twenty-two other Methodist churches of Orlando have been sponsored by this church. It was listed as one of the "Ten Great Churches of America" by the Christian Century magazine in 1950. Each year it is listed as one of the ten Methodist churches giving most to missions. Two pastors of the church have been elected to the episcopacy while serving here: JOHN W. BRANSCOMB in 1952 and E. J. PENDERGRASS in 1964.

ORMSTON, MARK D. (1890-1960), American FREE METHODIST minister, was born Dec. 17, 1890, at St. Johns, Mich. Converted at age fifteen, he early became a thorough student of the Bible and his life was a reflection of its message. He was a student at GREENVILLE COLLEGE. He entered the ministry of the East Michigan Conference of the Free Methodist Church, where he served as pastor and superintendent until 1936. He was a bishop, 1936-58; bishop emeritus, 1958-60. During his term as bishop, Ormston was also chairman of the Commission on Missions. He led a successful debt elimination campaign and placed the missionary program on a sound financial base. Bishop Ormston was an able administrator, a wise counsellor and trusted friend. He excelled as an eloquent, spirit-filled preacher. Great congregations were stirred to action by his prayers and sermons. He died at Jackson, Mich., June 23, 1960.

ORPHAN HOUSE, NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, England, was built in 1743 to house the first Wesleyan society to be gathered in the town. It was intended to be an orphanage for forty poor children—hence its name—but this scheme was not carried out. Instead, it became a hostel for the Wesleyan itinerants in the north of England, a library, a preaching house, and the place where JOHN WESLEY himself lived when in the area. GRACE MURRAY was matron for some time. The Orphan House was outside the walls of the town, and in the 1745 rebellion was thought to be in danger from the invading army. Wesley held an impressive service in the House on Sept. 29, 1745, asking for divine help for King George of England. CHARLES ATMORE started a SUNDAY SCHOOL at the Orphanage in 1790. It remained the center of Wesleyan worship until 1821, when the Brunswick Chapel was built on a neighboring site, when the Orphan House ceased to function as a place of worship. In 1856 the Orphan House Wesleyan Day School was erected on the same site; this was demolished in 1957; a memorial plaque was attached to the building which replaced it. The Orphan House is remembered, not only because of its link with Grace Murray, but also because in the eighteenth century it was for long the headquarters of Wesleyan Methodism in the north.

ORTON, JOSEPH (?-1842), British missionary pioneer to AUSTRALIA. The first notice of him that exists is his appointment in 1826 as a Wesleyan probationer to Falmouth and Montego Circuits, JAMAICA. Here he suffered violent persecution in the immediate pre-emancipation days, and was imprisoned with Isaac Whitehouse, another preacher, in the common jail for fourteen days, being released only on direct orders from the chief justice. Apparently broken in health he returned to England in 1828.

In 1831 he was sent to Australia, where Methodism was at its lowest ebb. He was made chairman of the New South Wales District, with a staff of five ministers. A strong, gracious, and far-sighted administrator, his appointment coincided with the beginnings of nonconvict immigration. Having brought new life to New South WALES, he was made chairman of the new Van Diemen's Land (Tasmania) District in 1835, from which he visited what was to become the state of Victoria. Then he interested the government in the support of a mission at Port Phillip, later to be the city of Melbourne. Australian Methodism owes a great debt to his leadership and courageous planning. He died at sea April 30, 1842.

CYRIL DAVEY

ORWIG, WILLIAM W. (1810-1889), American pathfinder-churchman of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, was born to Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Orwig, Sept. 25, 1810, near Orwigsburg, Pa. On May 24, 1832 he married Susanna Rischel; to them were born ten children.

He was received into the itinerancy of the EASTERN CONFERENCE (EA) in 1828; he was presiding elder in his mother conference at the age of twenty-two, and just before retirement was presiding elder of ERIE CONFERENCE; elected bishop in 1859, his poor health prevented his re-election in 1863.

He pioneered in publishing. Elected book agent and editor in 1836, he promptly bought the second printing press for the denomination and edited Der Christliche Botschafter, the first general periodical of the denomination. His Geschichte der Evangelischen Gemeinschaft, 1857, put into English in 1858, was so well done that all subsequent histories have been indebted to it.

The range of his theological concerns is reflected somewhat in his book titles: Katechismus (a catechism for youth), 1847; Die Heilsfulle (The Fullness of Salvation), 1873; and Pastoral-Theologie, 1877.

Other pioneering activities included his leadership in founding the Missionary Society, his advocacy of the Sunday school, and his bold fostering of higher education in the founding of Union Seminary at New Berlin, Pa., in 1856.

He contributed much toward the later development of his church before his death in Cleveland, Ohio, on May 29, 1889.

GEORGE OSBORN

OSBORN, GEORGE (1808-1891), British minister, was born in Rochester on March 29, 1808. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1828. He took a prominent part in the internal controversies of Wesleyan Methodism between 1830 and 1857. He was a strong opponent of change in the Wesleyan system, and especially of the admission of lay representatives into the Conference; he was a vehement supporter of JABEZ BUNTING. In 1847 he persuaded the Wesleyan Methodist CONFERENCE to permit him to "test" the loyalty of Wesleyan ministers to the status quo by asking them to sign a document in which they affirmed that they had not contributed to the FLY SHEETS. More than a thousand ministers signed, but the number who refused to do so was sufficient to rob the "test" of its effectiveness. He was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED at the Conference of 1849, at which he played a large part in the expulsion of the ministers accused of having written the Fly Sheets. In later years Osborn continued to maintain the conservative position, and he became increasingly isolated. He became one of the secretaries for Foreign Missions in 1851, retaining the post until 1867; he then was appointed as a Theological Tutor at RICHMOND COLLEGE, London (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES), remaining there until retirement in 1884. He was twice president—in 1863 and 1881. When the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE met in London in 1881 he gave the opening and closing addresses, and it was at this Conference that he met WILLIAM GRIFFITH again for the first time since 1849. Griffith received the communion from Osborn's hands (standing, as he objected in the true Puritan tradition, to kneeling). Among Osborn's literary works was The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley (xiii vols., London, 1868-1872), though this was not a definitive edition. He also published Outlines of Methodist Bibliography (1869). Osborn enjoyed great prominence in nineteenth century Methodism, but achieved very little.

JOHN NEWTON

OSBORN, THOMAS GEORGE (1844-1910), British Methodist educator, was the son of Thomas Osborn of Rochester and a nephew of the well-known GEORGE OSBORN. He was educated at Wesley College, Sheffield, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he became a Fellow. Although studying for the Bar, in 1866 he was persuaded to accept a temporary emergency appointment as Headmaster of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL—where he remained for nearly twenty years. During that time he successfully introduced the best current public school practice to Wesley's foundation, and left it immeasurably stronger. During much of this period Woodhouse Grove served as a preparatory school for Kingswood, so that Osborn was in charge of both institutions, seeking to ensure for them a true family spirit as well as high academic standards and religious culture. Upon his resignation in 1885 (partly because of pressure to have a minister instead of a layman as headmaster), he founded Rydal School in Colwyn Bay. He remained one of the most prominent and influential laymen in Wesleyan Methodism, for long a member of every Conference from the first admission of laymen. At the centenary of Wesley's death in 1891, he delivered an address at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, London, in which he called for a Ladies' College for British Methodism. He did not marry until 1896, and died April 8, 1910.

FRANK BAKER

OSBORNE, DENNIS (1828-1902), was an Anglo-Indian who was soundly converted in LUCKNOW in 1871 under the preaching of WILLIAM TAYLOR. At the time he was superintendent of the chief engineer's office. One Sunday when the pastor was ill, Osborne was called upon to preach. That first sermon established his reputation as a preacher. Osborne and another layman held meetings in Allahabad and organized a church. When the church fell into trouble, having no pastor, Osborne went again for meetings, and this time remained as pastor, resigning his coveted post and accepting an uncertain salary of less than one-third of what the government had been paying him. He joined the Annual Conference in 1874. He and JAMES MILLS THOBURN started annual meetings in Lucknow at the time of the Dasehra Festival. People came from as far away as CALCUTTA, BOMBAY, MADRAS, and CEYLON. The meetings were held annually for more than fifty years.

Osborne went to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1884. His speeches in America generated so much interest in missions that he returned with funds to open a boys' school, the Philander Smith Institute at Mullingar, Mussoorie. He became superintendent of the Allahabad District, and organized English language congregations in Agra, Roorkee, Mussoorie, Meerut, and Ajmer. He was at the time of his death superintendent of the Bombay District. Osborne sponsored PHOEBE ROWE, the Anglo-Indian woman evangelist.

OSHKOSH, WISCONSIN, U.S.A. Evergreen Manor, Inc., is a church operated home for the aged, owned and operated by the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE of the United Methodist Church. Construction was completed in 1967 at a total cost of $1,750,000, which includes land, furnishings, and construction.

Evergreen Manor has a Health Center of forty-eight beds, licensed by the Boards of Health of the State of Wisconsin and the city of Oshkosh, which gives skilled nursing care to the residents. The Health Center is Medicare certified.

Evergreen Manor is operated under a corporation of twenty-one directors, elected by the Wisconsin Conference. The functional operation of Evergreen Manor has as its one task the care of aging men and women. Adequate resident activities make homelife challenging. Evergreen Manor allows no discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin.

Evergreen Manor is a member of the Wisconsin Methodist Homes Association and is currently under the direction of the Executive Director of the Association, George H. Palmer.

OSLO is the capital of Norway. It was founded about 1050 A.D. The number of inhabitants (in 1966) is about 500,000.

The revivalist movement, which was started at Fredrikstad in 1849 by Ole P. Petersen (see NORWAY), and which was preliminary to the first Methodist congregation being organized at SARPSBORG in 1856, spread to Oslo as early as 1857. Carl Nilsson Osterlund, who was a bricklayer by trade, and who had been saved at the time when CHRISTIAN WILLERUP and Petersen were active in Halden, came to live in Oslo. He immediately began to hold meetings, and founded a Sunday school in Oslo seven years prior to the organization of a congregation there.

In the autumn of 1862, Anders Olsen, a cobbler, settled in Oslo. Some more Methodists from the Halden district also moved to Oslo, and this made more urgent the desire that there be a permanent organization. Anders Olsen dominated the period of transition from organized activity to congregation, and it was he who laid the foundation for the congregation which was organized in Oslo in 1865.

In the autumn of 1870, MARTIN HANSEN was appointed pastor in Oslo. The meetings drew very large crowds, and it became obvious that a chapel would have to be built. Hansen secured a site for the congregation, where a two-story building was erected, with the meeting hall on the first floor. This began to be used on April 23, 1871. On the same site three years later a church was consecrated in 1874—the first Methodist church in the capital of Norway. This congregation continues today as the First Methodist Church of Oslo.

The work in Oslo expanded, and in 1877 a second congregation was organized and became known as "Methodist Congregation Elmh." This congregation first built a small chapel, and then in 1896 a four-story business building with adjoining church was completed.

In 1887, a third congregation was founded in Oslo. In the beginning it made use of rented accommodations, but subsequently got its own church. This is the congregation which in 1961 took into use an eight-story business building with adjoining church. This church located in the center of the city is known as "Centralkirken."

One further congregation was founded in Oslo in 1895, and this also built a chapel. The chapel was demolished at a later date, and a five-story business building together with a church replaced it, and was taken into use in 1956. This is the Immanuel Church.

The tenth WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE was held in Oslo, Aug. 17-25, 1961. The president of the Conference was HAROLD ROBERTS, of Great Britain. The theme of the Conference was "New Life in the Spirit." About two thousand delegates and foreign guests attended the conference, as well as great numbers of visitors from all parts of Norway and Sweden. His Majesty, Olav V. King of Norway, was present on the opening night of the conference to welcome and extend greetings to the delegates.

Immediately prior to the conference, the World Federation of Methodist Women had held their Sixth Assembly, the theme being "Jesus Christ Is Lord." Also at this assembly the attendance was very large.

EILERT BERNHARDT

OSTERHOUT, SMITH STANLEY (1868-1953), Canadian minister, was born of United Empire Loyalist stock in Cobourg, Ontario, on June 30, 1868. He graduated from VICTORIA COLLEGE, Toronto, and following ordination came to British Columbia in 1893 as a volunteer for the Indian work and was stationed on the Nass River in the northern part of the province.

After five years on the Nass he was moved to Port Simpson, the largest Tsimshian village on the coast. Here he served for another five years. He learned and spoke the language fluently, edited a grammar, and translated hymns and scripture into the Tsimshian. The provincial government made him a justice of the peace for Cassiar district.

After eleven years in Indian work, he ministered to white congregations in Victoria, Kamloops, Vernon, and Vancouver. In 1911 he was appointed superintendent of Oriental missions for western Canada, and served in that capacity until his retirement in 1939. He was a member of the first General Council of The United Church of Canada, in 1925.

In 1929 he published Orientalism in Canada, which was regarded as a valuable contribution to one of Canada's racial problems. In 1916 and 1939 he was president of the British Columbia Conference. He died on Oct. 7, 1953, in Vancouver, B. C.

Osterhout was a man of broad sympathy and understanding. Possibly his greatest contribution to the religious life of his day was his ability to interpret the values of the Oriental and Occidental, each to the other.

OSTROM, EGON NILS (1903-1945), Swedish minister, evangelist, martyr, and missionary was born in Halsingborg, SWEDEN, Nov. 27, 1903. A godly mother kindled the lamp of faith in his heart, and at the age of thirteen he had a transforming Christian experience which made him a "winner of souls."

He studied for the ministry at the UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in Gothenburg and was graduated in 1927. A spectacularly successful ministry in Mölndal, 1925-30, made his name known all over Sweden, and many tried to convince him to stay in Sweden as a minister and evangelist. But in 1930 he was transferred to SUMATRA for work among the Chinese of that island. He spent about ten months in CHINA to learn the Hokkien dialect, and upon his return to Sumatra he was able to speak the language. Large crowds gathered around his pulpit, for the Hokkien-speaking Chinese of Sumatra had never heard a white person so able to use their mother tongue.

In 1937 he returned from furlough, which included studies at DREW UNIVERSITY in the United States, and was appointed to Tebing Tinggi where he had some very successful years in spite of the war. Being a native of Sweden, he and his family decided (together with another Swedish family) to remain in Sumatra. He served as Methodist district superintendent and as Mission treasurer, besides his work as evangelist among the Chinese. When all neutrals were interned at the beginning of the Indonesian revolution, he used his time in camp as a Red Cross worker, and was appointed Acting Consul for Sweden. On Dec. 11, 1945 he decided to return to his home for some documents, though many of his friends warned him. He was picked up by some extremists, thrown into a river, and his body was never found. The story of Egon N. Ostrom is ably told by his wife, Vera Edborg Ostrom, in her book O Boksu—the story of a man who gave his life for Sumatra.

RAGNAR ALM

OSUNA, ANDRÉS (1872-1957), Mexican educator and outstanding layman, whose connection was with the M.E. Church South, in that land, but whose influence was felt in the realm of education over the whole country. He was born in a Christian home in Cd. Mier, Coahuila, and from childhood had the religious influence of his mother and of a missionary, Alexander M. Southerland. The Instituto Fronterizo (later Laurens Institute) in Monterrey, and the Methodist church the family attended also exerted great influence in his life. Adventurous, the child moved from one place to another seeking education, working his way ahead, learning English and teaching what he knew. He graduated as teacher from the Normal School in Monterrey in 1892, and the same year married Lugarda L. Treviño.

He established a private grammar school in Saltillo, Coahuila, and became one of the founders of the teacher's training school there, in 1894. Later he became director of that school. He was appointed general director of Elementary Education in the State. His influence was felt in a reorganization of the plan of studies, the program of work, the equipment used, the buildings, and the administration, for eleven years.

In 1909 a new door was opened to him through contact with WALTER R. LAMBUTH, secretary of Missions from the M.E. Church, South in the U.S.A. Osuna was invited to work in the editorial department for Spanish books in the Publishing House at NASHVILLE, Tenn. There, he carried on an important program of publication and was also able to study at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. He received the Ph.D. there in 1915.

President Venustiano Carranza appointed him General Director of Public Education in the Federal District in 1915. He was elected temporary Governor in his home state in 1918.

From 1920-27, along with other duties, he accepted the position of manager of the Union Publishing House (Protestant concern) in Mexico City, and in 1927 was appointed Director of Public Education in the state of Nuevo León. Osuna was most helpful to the Church in matters of finance, properties, governmental relationships, and education. He was a fine Christian, a true witness. His death occurred on May 17, 1957.

GUSTAVO A. VELASCO G.

OTTERBEIN, PHILIP WILLIAM (1726-1813), American bishop of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, was born June 3, 1726 in Dillenburg, Nassau, GERMANY, where his father served as both minister and teacher in the Reformed Latin school. Of the ten children born into this family three died in childhood, while six sons became ministers and the surviving daughter married a minister. With the death of her husband Mrs. Otterbein moved her family to Herborn, so that the children could better obtain an education at the Academy, nearly equivalent to a university schooling. The eldest son supported the family until the next in age, Philip William, could take over. Then Philip, in turn, supported the group until the son below him in age, had completed his education.

Following an examination before the Herborn faculty, May 6, 1748, Philip William was approved as a candidate for the ministry and became a preceptor in the Herborn school. The next year, June 13, 1749, he was ordained and filled the pulpit at Ockersdorf in addition to teaching. Opposition appeared from some who wanted to stop his preaching, about which his mother remarked, "Ah, William, I expected this and give you joy. This place is too narrow for you, my son; they will not receive you here; you will find your work elsewhere."

When Michael Schlatter, a missionary to PENNSYLVANIA, appeared in Germany looking for volunteers to accompany him back to the New World to fill vacant pulpits among the German Reformed, Otterbein responded. He and five other recruits were examined by the Dutch Reformed Synod of Holland and approved. They landed in New York, July 28, 1752.

Otterbein was soon called to the congregation at Lancaster, Pa., the second most important Reformed church in America. During the six years he served in this city a new stone church was erected, internal order within the congregation assured, and he served one year, 1757, as president of the Reformed coetus. Following an earnest sermon on repentance and faith in 1754, a man under conviction came to Otterbein for advice. Philip William replied, "My friend, advice is scarce with me today." Then the preacher retired to his quiet place where he stayed until he had obtained the joy of his own conscious salvation.

Some years later, about 1767, attending a "great" meeting in the barn of ISAAC LONG in Lancaster County, Otterbein heard a Mennonite bishop, MARTIN BOEHM, preach a warm sermon on personal salvation. Following the message, Otterbein hurried forward, embraced the Mennonite, and exclaimed, "Wir sind bruder (We are brothers)." Here he had found one who knew spiritual truths through deep pangs and struggles which Otterbein himself had discovered under similar effort. This occasion furnished roots for a religious movement that eventually was to culminate in the formation of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

Pastorates were conducted in Tulpohocken, Pa. (near Reading), FREDERICK, Md., and YORK, Pa., during the next sixteen years. Within that period Otterbein was married to Miss Susan LeRoy of Lancaster, April 19, 1762, who died within six years, April 27, 1768. He remained a widower for the rest of his life.

Otterbein assumed charge of an independent Reformed congregation in Baltimore, Md., May 4, 1774, but after having refused the offer several previous times. Perhaps the change of decision was induced by a letter that FRANCIS ASBURY wrote Feb. 3, 1774 urging Otterbein, whom he had not yet met, to settle in BALTIMORE. In the forty years that followed, Otterbein and Asbury became close friends.

Otterbein, along with a number of Reformed ministers and laymen desirous of promoting a spirit of inward piety, began to meet with some regularity as early as 1774. They did not intend to create a new church but to form a little association within the Reformed Church that might serve "to leaven the whole lump." Ultimately most of the ministers of the group withdrew from this society, while the laymen remained. Otterbein became the leader under whom they worked. Their efforts were expanded chiefly in MARYLAND and VIRGINIA, where the Reformed Church had very little influence upon the German people. Eventually this group of "united ministers" did form a new church in 1800, known as the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (see UNITED BRETHREN). Philip William Otterbein and Martin Boehm, a former Mennonite, became the first bishops or superintendents.

In 1805, Otterbein suffered a serious illness, from which he never quite recovered. From then until his death he did not leave Baltimore, but the preachers of this new church came to him for counsel and assistance.

Upon the invitation of Francis Asbury, Philip William Otterbein assisted in the consecration and ordination of his friend to the office of bishop, Dec. 27, 1784. Their last visit together was on the evening of March 22, 1813. HENRY BOEHM, a traveling companion of Asbury and son of Martin Boehm, was present and wrote about the experience many years later: "That was an evening I shall ever remember; two noble souls met, and their conversation was rich and full of instruction. They had met frequently before; this was their last interview on earth—long ago they met in heaven."

Less than two months before his death, at the age of eighty-seven years, Otterbein had received a special request from the Miami Conference asking that he ordain several persons by the laying on of hands, so that these afterwards might perform the same for others. (Up to this time certain United Brethren preachers had been ridiculed as irregular by some persons in other denominations.) On Oct. 2, 1813, in the parsonage at Baltimore, in the presence of several members of the congregation, CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER, JOSEPH HOFFMAN, and Frederick Schaffer were duly ordained by Otterbein, assisted by WILLIAM RYLAND, an elder in the M.E. Church.

Death came to this churchman Wednesday, Nov. 17, 1813, at his home. At the funeral service a German discourse was preached by J. D. Kurtz, a Lutheran, followed by an English message delivered by William Ryland.

Asbury received the news of Otterbein's death while on one of his trips, and exclaimed, "Is Father Otterbein dead? Great and good man of God! An honor to his church and country. One of the greatest scholars and divines that ever came to America, or born in it. . . ." Four months later, in March 1814, by request of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, the conference adjourned to Otterbein's Church where Asbury preached in memory of his departed friend.

Otterbein was buried in the courtyard of the church in Baltimore where he had served for nearly forty years. Soon after his death the church became known as The Otterbein Church (later THE OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH), and continued to be an independent congregation supplied by ministers of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. In 1949 it was formally received into The E.U.B. Church.

OTTERBEIN CHURCH, "The Old Otterbein," Conway and Sharp Streets, BALTIMORE, Md., "Mother Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST," and a United Methodist Historic Shrine, was erected 1785-1786 on the same site on which a temporary chapel had been erected in 1771, when the congregation was organized. Several other churches existed in Baltimore at the time Otterbein Church was erected, but all have either rebuilt or relocated, leaving Otterbein have the distinction of being the oldest church edifice in the city. Organized as an independent German Evangelical Reformed Church in 1771, the same congregation became United Brethren when the United Brethren denomination was launched in 1800, and pastor Otterbein was elected to the bishopric.

The first pastor of the congregation was BENEDICT SCHWOPE, who served from 1771 to 1774. He was a warm friend of Methodists ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and FRANCIS ASBURY. Several Methodist histories state, "There is a strong tradition that Strawbridge received ordination from Rev. Mr. Schwope." On Monday, June 22, 1772, Schwope loaned his chapel to Francis Asbury as a place for the organization of the LOVELY LANE MEETING HOUSE congregation ("Mother Church of American Methodism").

Desiring to follow the frontiersmen into KENTUCKY, Schwope resigned his pastorate in 1774, but not before he, with assistance from Asbury, had prevailed upon PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN to accept the Baltimore pastorate. Otterbein preached his first sermon in the chapel on May 4, 1774, and remained as pastor until his death, Nov. 17, 1813. His ashes repose in the adjoining churchyard.

The temporary chapel of 1771 soon gave way to the present edifice, erected in 1785-1786, on the same site. Bricks for the massive walls were brought from England as ballast in the famous clipper ships. All nails used in the building were hand-made. The bells were cast in Bremen and were installed in 1789. The bells rang at the close of all America's wars since their installation. Before Baltimore had a fire alarm system, the bells called volunteer firemen to fight fires. The big bell tolled for the deaths of our martyred presidents: Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, and Kennedy. In keeping with instructions from Otterbein, the bells have never been rung on Good Friday. When immigrant ships arrived from Germany, the bells rang a welcome while residents of "Little Germany"—the community around the church—rushed to the nearby docks to greet the newcomers. The German language was used in the services until 1918. Many outstanding citizens of Baltimore have been members of the church. Five pastors became bishops and several became editors of German literature.

In 1825 the cemetery surrounding the church was filled and ground was purchased for a new one "way out in the country"—eight blocks west.

In addition to loaning the Methodists the chapel in 1772, and the appeal to Otterbein by Asbury in 1774, there are other facts that indicate the close rapport of their respective groups in the late 1700's and early 1800's. When Asbury was consecrated as a bishop in 1784, he requested that Otterbein should have a part in the ceremony. Asbury and Otterbein had many consultations on ways and means of merging their groups into a united church, even to the working out of a proposed discipline. The long absences of Asbury from the city, the increasing age of Otterbein, and the barriers of language seem to have been the factors that prevented the union.

OTTERBEIN CHURCH, BALTIMORE, MARYLAND

When Otterbein finally yielded to a demand by his German associates that he ordain them, he insisted that a Methodist preacher should assist him. Asbury was out of the city, so William Ryland, a nearby Methodist pastor, was brought in for the ceremony. This was in October, 1813. Several weeks later Bishop Otterbein died and the English sermon at his funeral was preached by Ryland. Asbury was out of the city and when he heard of the death of his friend, several weeks later, he wept like a child and delivered a classic eulogy. In March 1814, when the Methodist conference met in Baltimore, a memorial session was held in Otterbein Church, with Asbury delivering the sermon.

Otterbein Church is the only church building in the Baltimore area, still standing, where it is definitely known that Asbury preached—not once, but many times.

OTTERBEIN COLLEGE, Westerville, Ohio, first institution of higher learning established by the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. Otterbein University (changed to College in 1917), resulted from action taken by the old Scioto Conference in the fall of 1846. The first Board of Trustees met in Westerville, Ohio, on April 26, 1847, and decided to open on Sept. 1, in two small buildings purchased from the Blendon Seminary, a defunct Methodist institution. Otterbein claims to be the first college in America to begin as a coeducational institution, and the first to employ women on its faculty. The first two graduates of the university were women. No student has ever been denied admission to Otterbein on grounds of sex, race, color, or creed.

Nine conferences of The E.U.B. Church elected twenty-four trustees to the governing board. Ten trustees were elected by the Alumni Association, and ten at large. Otterbein secured a charter from the State of Ohio in 1849 and granted its first degrees in 1857. Graduating in the second class (1858) was BENJAMIN HANBY, the songwriter, son of Bishop WILLIAM HANBY, and one of Otterbein's most famous alumni.

For more than sixty years, Otterbein University fought a constant battle against debt, with student enrollment fluctuating between fifty and 200. The Civil War, a disastrous fire which destroyed the Old Main Building in 1870, and two national financial panics threatened to snuff out her feeble flame of learning. Due largely, however, to the heroic efforts of Presidents LEWIS DAVIS (1850-57 and 1860-71), Henry A. Thompson (1872-86), Henry Garst (1886-89), T. J. Sanders (1891-1901), and George Scott (1901-04), the university maintained an excellent faculty, produced outstanding graduates, and finally achieved economic stability.

Under the vigorous leadership of Presidents Lewis Bookwalter (1904-09) and Walter C. Clippinger (1909-39), Otterbein College enjoyed three decades of unprecedented prosperity and growth. Eight new buildings were erected, and an endowment of a $1,000,000 was created. Then the successive blows of world war and depression brought this era to a painful halt. President J. R. Howe (1939-45) struggled against dwindling enrollments and diminished resources to hold the college to its course. Under President J. Gordon Howard (1946-57), Otterbein began to share in the phenomenal growth of post-war American higher education. In 1967 the student body numbered 1,530, the faculty 103, the total number of college employees over 300. The operating budget was over $3,500,000; the endowment $3,051,973; and the physical plant $5,934,714 (forty-four acres and forty-one buildings).

When the Association of Ohio Colleges first adopted minimum standards for college work, Otterbein was one of fifteen Ohio institutions to meet the requirements. She became a member of the North Central Association in 1912 and of the Association of American Colleges in 1915.

OTTERBEIN PRESS, a publishing house of The E.U.B. CHURCH, located at 230 W. Fifth Street, DAYTON, Ohio. The first publishing house of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST was established in a dwelling on the west side of North Court Street in Circleville, Ohio in 1834. The Religious Telescope and other church publications were issued from Circleville until 1853, when the U. B. Publishing House was moved to Dayton, Ohio.

A four story building was erected for publishing purposes on the northeast corner of Fourth and Main Streets in downtown Dayton. It was enlarged on numerous occasions (1869, 1884, 1891, and 1903). In 1905 the first section of a fourteen story office building was built on the original site. A second section was added in 1921 and included a tower with six additional stories. Early in the twentieth century land in downtown Dayton was too valuable to be used as a factory location. A site was purchased on West Fifth Street and the present structure, The Otterbein Press, was built in 1915.

The business for many years was handicapped with a heavy indebtedness, partly due to its own expansions and also from the erection and operation of the office building. The office building was eventually sold in 1952 and the assets were placed in an investment fund for ministerial pensions.

The profits of the publishing enterprise were designated solely for preacher pensions. Since 1947, a total of $2,071,000 had been transferred from profits for this purpose. In each of the two years 1966 and 1967, The EVANGELICAL PRESS and The Otterbein Press gave jointly a total of $415,000 for pensions. After the formation of the Church Services Division of the Board of Publication in 1963, a sum of $1,370,000 was transferred from The Otterbein Press assets to erect and equip the three story office building and historical wing at 140 South Perry Street, Dayton, Ohio. The net worth of The Otterbein Press (Aug. 31, 1967) amounted to $3,625,000 and there was an employment of 230 persons. Current sales were listed in 1967 at $4,700,000. The Press itself, as an agency of The E.U.B. Church, went under the Board of Publications of The United Methodist Church in 1968. In 1969 Otterbein Press was sold along with the Cincinnati and Harrisburg plants.

OUR CHURCH RECORD (1894-1910) was the weekly periodical of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church published by J. F. McCULLOCH in GREENSBORO, N. C. It was an outgrowth of The Central Protestant and was the only publication sponsored by a specific conference in the M.P. Church. Our Church Record was started with the view of arousing interest in the need for a conference educational institution. In 1898 there were several issues devoted to the history of the Methodist Protestant Church in NORTH CAROLINA which provide valuable material for the researcher interested in the Methodist Protestant movement. In 1910 the name of the paper was changed to The Methodist Protestant Herald.

GIDEON OUSELEY

OUSELEY, GIDEON (1762-1839), Irish preacher. A fox-hunting, drinking, gambling country gentleman from County Galway, he was converted in 1791 through Methodist meetings begun in his home town of Dunmore by soldiers from the Royal Irish Dragoons. He became a LOCAL PREACHER, but his proficiency in the Irish language led to him being called out by the 1799 Conference with CHARLES GRAHAM and JAMES MCQUIGG as a General Missionary over the whole of Ireland. For forty years he exercised this unique public ministry, preaching in fairs and markets everywhere with great evangelistic success. Many other preachers were appointed from time to time to help in this Irish Mission, but most of them had to retire, broken in health by the hardships they had to endure. Ouseley continued to preach and travel until a few months before his death. A memorial church to him is in Mountmellick, County Laois, the town in which he preached his last sermon.

ALBERT C. OUTLER

OUTLER, ALBERT COOK (1908-), American minister and theologian, was born at Thomasville, Ga., on Nov. 17, 1908. He received his A.B. degree from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1928, and the D.D. there in 1952. Other degrees are from EMORY UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1933; Yale, Ph.D., 1938; Kalamazoo College, D.D., 1962; LYCOMING COLLEGE, L.H.D., 1964; Notre Dame, LL.D., 1966; OHIO WESLEYAN, L.H.D., 1967; General Theological Seminary, D.S.T., 1967; Emory University, Litt.D., 1968. His wife is Carlotta Grace Smith, whom he married in 1931 and they have two children.

Dr. Outler served certain appointments in the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE and then took the post of instructor in theology at DUKE UNIVERSITY, 1938-39, becoming a full professor and serving there until 1945. He was an associate professor at Yale, 1945-48, the Dwight professor of theology there, 1948-51, at which time he went to SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in Dallas, Texas, where he became professor of theology.

He has been a delegate to the Methodist Church's Third World Council in Faith and Order at Lund, Sweden; a Methodist delegate to the Third Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in New Delhi; vice-chairman of the Fourth World Council of Faith and Order, Montreal, 1963; observer at the Second Vatican Council; a delegate (NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE) to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, 1960, '64, and '68; vice-president of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs and the chairman of the Ecumenical Study and Liaison Committee of 1964. He is the past president of the American Theological Society and of the American Society of Church History.

Among his books are: A Christian Context for Counseling, 1946; Colleges, Faculties and Religion, 1949; Psychotherapy and the Christian Message, 1954; The Confessions and Enchiridion of St. Augustine, 1955; The Christian Tradition and the Unity We Seek, 1957; That the World May Believe, 1966; A Methodist Observer at Vatican II, 1967; Who Trusts in God; Musings on the Meaning of Providence, 1968. He is a member of the editorial committee of A Library of Protestant Thought, and also the author of John Wesley (1964). He is a member of the Editorial Board of the WESLEY WORKS PROJECT and currently is serving as chairman of the theological study Commission on Doctrine and Doctrinal Standards authorized to study Part II of the Plan of Union by the General Conference and other pertinent references in the Discipline and to bring back to the General Conference of 1972 its report on doctrine and doctrinal standards in The United Methodist Church. He delivered the uniting ceremony sermon at Dallas, Texas, before the combined General Conferences of The Methodist Church and the E.U.B. Church. He is a Fellow, American Academy of Arts and Sciences and a member of The Academy of Texas.

OVERSEAS MISSIONARY SOCIETY, New Zealand, has its headquarters in Auckland. "Overseas" was formerly "Foreign." In 1856, when a Wesleyan Methodist Conference was constituted for Australasia, its responsibilities included the care of the existing missions in TONGA and FIJI. When Methodist work was reopened in SAMOA, and established later in New Britain (1875), Papua (1891), and the Solomon Islands (1902), Methodist men and women from NEW ZEALAND shared with Australians in the labors there. After a New Zealand Conference had been formed, affiliated with the Australasian General Conference, a minister in circuit work was regularly appointed as honorary Conference secretary for Foreign Missions. He and other representatives from New Zealand attended some sessions of the Board of Missions at Sydney.

In 1913, the various divisions of the Methodist Church in the country were united, and the Methodist Church of New Zealand became independent of the Methodist Church of Australasia. Plans then begun for a division of the overseas mission work were delayed by the First World War. In 1922, the centenary year of New Zealand Methodism, the Solomon Islands Mission District was separated to be the sole overseas missionary responsibility of the Methodist Church of New Zealand. In anticipation of this step, the Methodist Foreign Missionary Society of New Zealand was constituted. The first full-time General Secretary was W. A. Sinclair, set apart in 1919. He was succeeded by A. H. Scrivin in 1932.

Except for financial and staffing setbacks during the depression of the 1930's and for the occupation of the Solomon Islands by the Japanese during the Second World War, the work of the society has gradually extended.

In 1953, the missions boards in AUSTRALIA and New Zealand entered into an agreement for cooperation, which resulted in New Zealand Methodism taking an active share in a newly founded mission in the NEW GUINEA Highlands.

OWEN, ISAAC (1809-1866), pioneer American clergyman in CALIFORNIA, began life in VERMONT but two years later was taken by his parents to INDIANA. Coming under the influence of Methodist circuit riders, he was converted at age seventeen, and admitted to the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1835. While stationed at Greencastle, he took private instruction from professors at Indiana Asbury University (now DEPAUW), and also at Bloomington, seat of the state university. So tutored, he acquired a critical knowledge of the Greek Testament. Indiana Asbury recognized his abilities as an organizer and orator, employed him four years as financial agent and conferred on him an honorary D.D.

A second career opened for him in 1849 when he was appointed the first missionary of the M.E. Church to California. Joining the gold rush, he and Mrs. Owen, with an infant daughter, took the long overland trip westward to SACRAMENTO where they were sheltered in Sutter's Fort until a frame parsonage could be built. They lived in it a scant month before it was swept away by the flooded American River. Escaping to SAN FRANCISCO, they later established a home at Santa Clara where Mrs. Owen remained while her indefatigable husband ranged over mountain trails linking California settlements. So fruitful was his ministry, historian LEON L. LOOFBOUROW characterized him as "the Francis Asbury of California."

Isaac Owen called "a convention" of ministers and laymen Jan. 6-7, 1851 at the Methodist Church of San Jose "to consult and advise" on the "founding of an institution of the grade of a university." It soon came into being, was seated first at San Jose, then Santa Clara, and in 1924 at Stockton, and is now the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC—oldest chartered institution of higher learning in California.

Owen had planned to start a university in California before he had left Indiana, which was sheer audacity, for in 1850 California had but 699 Methodists. Nevertheless Owen's University of the Pacific dream became reality. Its historian, Rockwell D. Hunt, says that Isaac Owen "more than any other individual, as trustee, agent, and presiding elder, may with good reason be called the founder . . ." But closely associated with him were WILLIAM TAYLOR and EDWARD BANNISTER.

On Jan. 16, 1850 the ship Arkansas arrived in San Francisco Bay with $2,000 worth of books which Owen, in the honored Wesleyan tradition, had purchased before starting west. With the help of William Taylor, they were put on sale—establishing the first continuously existing bookstore in California.

In 1860 Owen was put in charge of the Sacramento District, and he and most of his family made the wearying four-day trip by wagon from Santa Clara to the state capital. There Mrs. Owen soon died. When Owen was elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1856, he could not spare time for the trip east, but upon his election again in 1864, he did go to PHILADELPHIA. Later, while in charge of the San Francisco District, what appeared to be a trifling wound on his hand became serious as erysipelas set in. He died Feb. 9, 1866, and Bishop SIMPSON later recorded, "no man did more for laying the foundation of the Church on the Pacific Coast than did Isaac Owen."

LELAND D. CASE

OWENS, THOMAS (17? -1808), British pioneer missionary to the WEST INDIES, was an Irishman, whose date and place of birth are uncertain. He became a Wesleyan traveling preacher in 1785, and was one of the earliest missionaries appointed to the West Indies. A man of high character and personal charm, he was offered the Anglican living (£800 per annum) at Carriacou by Governor-General Matthews, but refused it in order to continue ministering to the slaves. He served ably in Grenada, St. Vincent, Tortola, St. Kitts, etc., returned to Britain in 1803, and died in 1808.

OWENS, THOMAS (1787-1868), American pioneer preacher of the deep South, noted for his exuberant humor and irregular, colorful words and actions. He was born near CHARLESTON, S. C., on Jan. 8, 1787, the son of Thomas and Frances Owens. His parents, who were Methodists, removed to the MISSISSIPPI Territory, it is thought in 1803. Tommy Owens—as he was always called—led a rather wild life in his youth, addicted to profanity, Sabbath breaking, occasional drunkenness, and horse-racing. On one occasion, while riding an impromptu race, he was thrown over his horse's head and for a time his life was despaired of. He would frequently comment afterward, "The way of the transgressor is hard."

Through concerned prayers and later while attending a quarterly conference communion service, he was converted and entered upon his new life with great delight. He began to enjoy discharging churchly duties, then became an exhorter, knowing instinctively how to call for penitents, and how to manage the altar services—which he did with marked success. After a successful meeting in his own church, he and one of his co-workers decided to go to Greenville, Miss., not far away, and there they soon organized a church with about sixty members. The court house was used for worship.

Tommy Owens was small and thin, and when the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was organized on Nov. 1, 1813, at the home of Newitt Vick, he was admitted, though over some opposition because of "his unusual flow of wit and humor." Also he seemed to lack requisite physical strength. He was, however, admitted and gave fifty-five years to the ministry—much longer than most of the robust brethren who had doubted his endurance in conference life.

His irrepressible humor often got him into trouble with the more sober conference brethren. Taking part in a debate once and greatly opposing ministers marrying and bringing their young wives to conference, he ended by saying, "They come riding up to conference beside their young wives with all the importance of a Bishop."

Bishop R. R. ROBERTS, who was presiding, interrupted and said, "Brother Owens, please tell the Conference how important a Bishop is." "Well, as to that, Sir," Owens replied, "I do not know that I can decide; but they are very important in their place. To say the least of it, I think those who marry before they learn how to preach might have the prudence and modesty with their young wives that a cow has with her young calf; hide them out awhile before they bring them to conference." He himself later married Mrs. Rebecca Bass Calvit on Jan. 8, 1828.

On one occasion, the conference voted to have the bishop reprimand Brother Owens for his levity in the pulpit. The bishop did so and then kindly called upon Brother Owens to lead in prayer. Owens said, "O Lord, Thy knowest that this world's a whirligig—a whirligig, O Lord. Amen." (Lazenby's History of Methodism in Alabama and Mississippi, p. 88)

The grandmother of this writer said she heard him once when she was quite young and remembered that the congregation sang the hymn, "Oh How Happy Are They," with the lines (which Methodist Hymnal Commissions have long excised!), "I rose higher and higher on a chariot of fire, and the moon it was under my feet"; Brother Owens stopped the music and said, "Ah, Brethren, that was high flying for you."

On another occasion there was a debate concerning uniformity in dress for the preachers. "Most of the Southern preachers had already abandoned the short trousers, knee buckles, and long stockings which were still worn by both of our bishops now present with us." So wrote historian John C. Jones in 1826. Most of the older ministers continued to use and contend especially for the old-fashioned Methodist coat. "But," added Jones, "our younger ministers soon quietly gave up the keel-bottomed coat with its standing collar, for the neat-fitting frock coat. J. R. LAMBUTH and Thomas Owens were the first to venture into our Annual Conference with the ordinary frock coat. Some of the old brethren looked at them reprovingly. . . . They were soon followed by most of the young men in the Conference, and ultimately by most of the older ministers too." (Jones, ii, 119).

As the Mississippi Conference covered the western and southern part of ALABAMA in those days, Owens served appointments in Alabama, as well as in Mississippi, which later became a state in 1818. He lived to be eighty-one years of age, dying at his home at Rocky Springs, Miss., on July 1, 1868, and the Mississippi and Alabama Conferences are proud today to claim him as one of their pioneers.

OWENSBORO, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. Settle Memorial Church. The first Methodist Society was organized in Owensboro (then Owensborough), in 1833. From this Society evolved the present Settle Memorial Church. ALBERT H. REDFORD, the second pastor of the Methodist Society in Owensborough in 1839, was a leading figure in KENTUCKY Methodism for forty years. He served as book agent for the GENERAL CONFERENCE and was the author of The Life and Times of Bishop Kavanaugh and a three-volume History of Methodism in Kentucky.

Owensboro's first Methodist church building was erected in 1851 and it was here that David Morton, later the first secretary of the Board of Church Extension of the M.E. Church, South, served from 1858 to 1860. Sixty-three years later BACHMAN GLADSTONE HODGE (elected bishop in 1956) became pastor of Settle Memorial.

Settle Chapel, the second building occupied by the Owensboro church, and Settle Memorial, the third and present edifice, were named for Henry C. Settle, who served the congregation from 1866 to 1870 and again from 1877 to 1881. Settle Chapel was completed in 1881, during Settle's second assignment to Owensboro, and Settle Memorial in 1907. The Century of Progress, published by the Historical Society of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE, used the one word "brilliant," to describe Settle.

In 1970 Settle Memorial reported 1,992 members, property valued at $1,026,795, and a total of $96,486 raised for all purposes.

OWINGS, RICHARD (1738-1786), first native born local preacher in American Methodism, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Nov. 13, 1738, son of Joshua and Mary (Cockey) Owings. In 1770 he accompanied ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, under whom he was converted, on a preaching mission to Georgetown (now part of the District of Columbia), and "crossing the Potomac river, planted societies in Fairfax county, Virginia." When Strawbridge died in 1781, while visiting at the home of a convert, Joseph Wheeler, the funeral sermon was preached by Owings.

He was appointed in 1775 to the BALTIMORE Circuit. His name appears in the Minutes as "Owen" and "Owens," incorrect forms of the surname which he did not use. The family name is perpetuated in Owings Mill. The Minutes of 1786 list him as a deacon appointed to the Fairfax (Virginia) Circuit.

Thomas Scott recalls that Owings "was nearly six feet in height, slender, stooped in his shoulders, sandy hair and florid complexion." He died on Oct. 8, 1786 and was buried in the cemetery of Leesburg's "Old Stone Church." His will, dated Oct. 5, 1786, and probated five days later on Oct. 10, was witnessed by JOHN LITTLEJOHN, Samuel Murrey and Thomas Edwards.

OWSTON FERRY CASE. In May, 1874, the perpetually smoldering relations between the Wesleyan Methodist connection and the Church of England once more burst into flame. The vicar of Owston Ferry, G. E. Smith, declined to allow the title "The Reverend" to appear on the tombstone of the daughter of a Wesleyan minister, the Rev. H. Keet (Anglican incumbents have some control over the form of memorials erected in their churchyards). The Archbishop of Canterbury, A. C. Tait, in a letter to The Times on Aug. 11, 1874, agreed with the Wesleyans that such an objection ought not to have been made, but the Bishop of Lincoln, Christopher Wordsworth, upheld Smith's action on the ground that the Wesleyan ministers, not being in what he called Holy Orders, had no right to the title of "Reverend," and that in any case this was contrary both to the wishes of JOHN WESLEY and of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference regulations of 1793. In the previous year the bishop had issued a "Pastoral to the Wesleyan Methodists in the diocese of Lincoln," inviting them to the return to what he called the Mother Church, according to the principles of their founder.

Very vehement controversy followed both these actions, and the Wesleyan Conference of 1874 manifested a great deal of anti-Anglican feeling. Smith's decision regarding the tombstone was upheld in the ecclesiastical court of arches but was overruled by the court of appeal, the privy council. One result of all this was Osborne Morgan's Burial Law Amendment Bill of 1880, which Bishop Wordsworth bitterly opposed as a bill which would "imperil the existence of the Church of England." One indignant rural rector armed his flock with pitchforks to keep the dissenters out of his churchyard. Nevertheless, the bill became law, enabling dissenting ministers to hold their own services, after due notice, in the parish churchyard. This act (43 and 44 Victoria c. 41) and subsequent clarifications in 1900, brought to an end what B. L. Manning called "the dreariest and most unifying of all the campaigns in the long war between the Establishment and Dissent."

MALDWYN L. EDWARDS

OXFORD, England, Wesley Memorial Church. WESLEY severed his connection with the spiritual life of Oxford University when he "delivered his soul" to its members in Great St. Mary's Church, on Aug. 24, 1744. His private diary shows that at the time of his conversion he was in touch with small religious groups of townspeople in Oxford, where they probably formed the first Methodist Society. Oxfordshire was assigned to the London District by the Conference of 1746, but in 1748 it became a separate circuit. In 1765, Thomas Tobias was stationed as "travelling preacher" in the Oxford Circuit, since which time there has been a regular succession of Methodist preachers in the town. When Wesley visited Oxford, he usually preached in private houses, and his congregations must have been small. In 1773 it was said that Methodists in and around Oxford worshipped with the Baptists. Ten years later, however, the Methodists had acquired a meeting house, for Wesley records in his Journal for July 14, 1783, "I preached in the new preaching-house at Oxford, a lightsome cheerful place." This preaching-house is the building now (1969) numbered 32 and 34 New Inn Hall Street, which was then and still is the property of Brasenose College, from which it was rented by the Society for 23s. 8d. a year. Wesley preached in this building on some half-dozen subsequent occasions, but only in 1788 and 1789 was it too small to hold the congregation of both townspeople and students with comfort.

After Wesley's death the Society, which can never have been large, fell into decay, and there were less than twenty members in 1799. However, the cause recovered and in 1815 was strong enough for members to decide to build a chapel. Donations were solicited, but came in slowly, even though the Conference in 1816 considered the case of the Oxford Chapel "extraordinary," and allowed the preachers of the Oxford Circuit to send a circular letter to every superintendent minister. There was strong opposition in Oxford to the building of a Methodist Chapel; eventually a site a short distance west of the meeting house was bought from Daniel Harris, one-time Keeper of Oxford Gaol. His relations tried, though unsuccessfully, to prevent the sale on the grounds that Harris was insane and incapable of managing his own affairs.

The architect of the new chapel was William Jenkins, who had taken up that profession after twenty-two years as a Methodist preacher. In May 1817, the foundation stone was laid and the Chapel was opened in February 1818. The building cost over £5,000, most of which was raised by loans and annuities, which left a heavy burden of debt. Nevertheless a schoolroom, used both as a Day School and Sunday school was added at a cost of over £200 in 1819.

Henry Goring, an Anglican resident in Oxford, presented the Chapel trustees with £2,000 towards liquidating the debt on the Chapel, and £500 towards the school, which was immediately improved; in 1831, a new school was built. Unfortunately Church records are sparse and little is known of this period though there was an active Tract Society and a Missionary Auxiliary. CLASS MEETINGS were still a regular feature of Church life; in 1846, there were six meetings on Sunday, the first at 7 A.M., three every Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, two every Friday and one every Wednesday. Unfortunately the Church was divided by the FLY-SHEET agitation; teachers seceded from the Sunday school, taking their classes with them, and the congregation was depleted, membership falling from 249 in 1845 to 180 in 1854. Much of the Chapel debt remained unpaid, annual income was usually less than expenditure, and in 1857 when BENJAMIN GREGORY took up his ministry at the church he found Oxford Methodism in a pitiable condition, ruined by dissension and on the verge of bankruptcy. Under his ministry, things began to change. Undergraduates, at the risk of offending the University authorities flocked to hear his sermons, and though local Anglo-Catholic Clergy were bitterly anti-Methodist, Gregory forged close links with local Evangelical Anglican clergy as well as with other nonconformist bodies. The financial position of the Church was further strengthened in 1859 by a legacy from its old benefactor, Henry Goring, but the millstone of debt was not cleared for another ten years. Originally, singing in the Chapel had been accompanied by an orchestra, but a small organ replaced this in 1862, and a larger and better instrument was installed in 1866. At this time, the Church had an active Young Men's Improvement Society; Day School and Sunday school now seem to have separated, but both flourished.

Until 1871, membership of Oxford University had been limited to Anglicans, but in that year the religious tests were abolished. Perhaps anticipating the growth of non-conformity within the University, the Conference of 1871 appointed a special committee to consider the building of a new chapel, since the old was dilapidated, and "inadequate to meet requirements of the times." The Conference sanctioned a general appeal for funds and work on the new chapel, built in front of the old, began in 1877 during the ministry of G. Maunders, the memorial stones being laid in July. The architect was Charles Bell of London, who adapted the Gothic decorated style for the new building. A striking feature is the carving of the arcade capitals and other ornamental stonework to represent English plants. There is a rose-window in the (ritual) east wall, and in the west a stained glass window representing flowers mentioned in the Bible and water plants, placed there by local Temperance Societies in memory of Maumder, who died before the building was complete. On the south side is a window representing Faith, Hope and Charity and another showing the Risen Lord between Simeon and Anna. The cost of the new building and of the conversion of the old into lecture and classrooms amounted to £13,000. For a time these classrooms were also used by a Girls' School, founded in 1800; the old Lancasterian School having now become a successful high grade boys' school, though the stages of its development are not clear.

Benjamin Gregory was prevented from fulfilling his preaching appointment at the Chapel during his Presidential year, and sent as his substitute HUGH PRICE HUGHES, who made an immense impression. As a result, Hughes accepted the ministry of Wesley Memorial Church in 1881, although he knew Maumder had said that Oxford was the poorest Methodism he had known and many people advised him against the move. Nevertheless Hughes spent three of the most fruitful years of his life at Oxford, despite the fact that both University and city were antagonistic to Methodism, while the countryside around was sunk in agricultural depression. Under Hughes' energetic leadership, Methodism became a strong force in the Oxford district. Hughes founded a Mission Band, which visited surrounding villages in wagons called "Gospel Chariots," which gave new life to languishing causes and established new ones. A powerful preacher, Hughes increased the membership of the Church by over a hundred in his first year. He took a particular interest in undergraduates, as a result of which, a Wesleyan Society (now the John Wesley Society) was formed.

Hughes' successors were for the most part men of signal ability and scholarship. They included G. Stringer Rowe, later House Governor of the Ministerial Training College at Headingley; John Martin, who had served with distinction in the West African Mission Field, where he wrote grammars of local languages, for which he also devised alphabets; James Chapman, later principal of the Women's Teacher Training College, now Southlands College, Wimbledon. During Chapman's ministry, the Church celebrated the centenary of Wesley's death, an event which met with friendly support from the evangelical wing of the Anglican Church, but with bitter attacks on the "Wesleyan schism" from Anglo-Catholics. During the ministry of Enoch Salt (1893-6), Anglo-Catholic opposition was more bitter, but this drew Methodism closer to the older Dissent (Baptist, Congregational); a Non-conformist Church Council was formed in Oxford. A branch of the WESLEY GUILD, whose activities continue to the present, was also formed during Salt's pastorate. From the time of Hugh Price Hughes until the First World War missions to the city as a whole and open-air evangelical meetings were an important feature of church life.

A heavy program of restoration and renovation of the church buildings was finished just before the outbreak of War in 1914. This event acted as a great stimulus on church life; work among young people was increased and there was a flourishing club for soldiers. Immediately after the War, the social activities of the church were re-organized and extended, and the Boys' School expanded. Unfortunately the Trade Depression which followed forced the trustees to close the school and sell the buildings in 1930, to St. Peter's College, which bought the old Chapel building in 1932. Thanks to this sale, it was possible to build a new block containing offices and rooms for smaller meetings, among which is the extremely attractive John Wesley Room.

The Bicentenary of Wesley's admission as a Fellow of Lincoln College was celebrated in 1926 when representatives of Methodist Churches in the British Isles and overseas attended a special service in Lincoln College Chapel. Rt. Hon. Walter Runciman unveiled a bust of Wesley in the College Quadrangle.

Wesley Memorial Church celebrated its Jubilee with special services in 1928, and in 1932 the Union of the three English Methodist Connexions was marked by a service at which representatives of these bodies, as well as the Anglican and Nonconformist Churches were present. Within the year, the congregation of the nearby UNITED METHODIST CHURCH was united with that of Wesley Memorial. The Church's Diamond Jubilee was celebrated in 1938, in a time of growing political uncertainty. When war broke out in 1939, troops were billeted in the Church Hall and in 1940, a Forces Canteen was opened; this did not close until 1945, during which time it served 204,000 meals, as well as countless cups of tea and other refreshments. Short services for the Forces were broadcast from the church during the war, and in spite of black-out restrictions, social organizations continued with renewed vigor.

In 1951, the church was the headquarters of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, and Methodists from all over the world became familiar with its precincts.

Although the post-war years were marked by financial stringency, church membership steadily advanced, and a new problem was created with the greatly increased number of Methodist students in the University. At first, these were met by the appointment of an assistant minister, who was also an officer of the Student Christian Movement, which shared with the Church the expense of his maintenance. However, a Commission was appointed in 1961 to consider the position of the church with regard to members of the University and to other chapels in the circuit. This decided that there should be two ministers, one of whom, as in earlier days, should be superintendent minister of the Circuit. In 1964, D. Rose was appointed to Wesley Memorial Church and became superintendent minister in 1965.

The Church celebrated the 150th anniversary of the opening of the old chapel and the ninetieth anniversary of the opening of the new chapel in May 1968 by special services. The president of Conference, Irvonnay Morgan, unveiled a plaque on 32 and 34 New Inn Hall Street, recording that it was the first Methodist meeting house in Oxford and that John Wesley preached there on several occasions. St. Peter's College plans presently to demolish the old Chapel, and replace it with new buildings.

OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A. The Methodist church in Oxford was organized in 1837 under the leadership of William Craig, pastor, with David O. Shattuck as presiding elder of the Holly Springs district. The first deed bears date of Aug. 23, 1838, the trustees being Richard R. Corbin, William Webb, Daniel Grayson, Nathaniel S. Jennings, and William Gordon. On this lot, which cost $50, a frame building was erected in the fall of 1838, during the pastorate of A. J. S. Harris. Pastors who served in this building were E. J. Williams and William B. Walker, with others whose names are not available.

On July 4, 1851, a new lot was purchased on Jackson Avenue near the square and a new church built thereon, a handsome brick building with an auditorium upstairs and a substory beneath. The University of Mississippi had opened at Oxford, and this new building was evidently intended to serve the students as well as the townspeople. Trustees in 1851 were William Gordon, William Webb, John M. Boggs, Lewis T. Wynn, Hugh W. Rison, B. Walton, and William Jones. The following served as pastor in this church before it was burned in 1889: Lewis H. Davis, E. J. Williams, George W. Carter, C. N. B. Campbell, John Barcroft, John J. Wheat, Amos Kendall, S. R. Brewer, W. B. MURRAH, Kenneth A. Jones, W. T. J. Sullivan, E. B. Ramsey, R. M. Standifer, and Thomas W. Dye. Many outstanding students and faculty members worshipped in this building, among the former CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, later a Methodist bishop and JAMES W. LAMBUTH, one of the great pioneer missionaries in the Methodist Church, serving in China and Japan from 1854 until his death in 1892. There was a Methodist parsonage on South Lamar Street during most of this time.

A Gothic brick church was built on the same location in 1890 with a Sunday school annex, one of the first of its type in the area. The Sunday school during the college year was always too large for the building, and for a number of years the church used the public school building just across the street. The movement for a new church began in 1920 but it was not until fifteen years later the actual plans began to be put into effect. A building committee was appointed in 1935. The NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE approved the building of the first unit at a cost of $60,000 and the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE promised to cooperate. A new location was secured from the Bank of Oxford in December 1936, and construction began on Feb. 1, 1937.

The new sanctuary was constructed in the fall and winter of 1949 and the spring of 1950. H. ELLIS FINGER, now a bishop, was pastor at that time. The cost was $90,000.

In addition to the enterprising local membership, which now reports 1,184 persons, the Oxford Methodist church has been primarily the church of the University of Mississippi. It is located nearer the campus than the church in any of the other college towns and is more influenced by the school than any similar church in Mississippi.

OXFORD COLLEGE OF EMORY UNIVERSITY, Oxford, Georgia, occupies the old campus of Emory College established in 1836. When Emory College became the College of Arts and Sciences of EMORY UNIVERSITY, in 1915, the Oxford division continued as an academy. In 1929 a junior college was started. The institution is an integral part of Emory University, and library and assets are re-OXFORD INSTITUTE ON METHODIST THEOLOGICAL STUDIES grew out of a concern that Methodist beginnings at Oxford University be memorialized through a living theological consultation. As early as the 1951 meeting of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL at OXFORD, some effort to mark this memorial was sought. At the World Methodist Council meeting at LAKE JUNALUSKA in 1956, the format of a theological institute was agreed upon. The first such Institute was held in 1958.

One hundred persons from over the world made up largely of Methodist theologians come together for a ten-day institute at Lincoln College, Oxford. The total membership is divided roughly as one-third U. S., one-third British and one-third the rest of the Methodist world. This institute has provided a meeting place for persons engaged professionally in theology in world Methodism. It has focused each time on a significant doctrine of the Church, and on some occasions has contributed to studies of these doctrines in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The first Institute was in 1958 and its theme Biblical Theology and Methodist Doctrine. The second Institute in 1962 was on The Doctrine of the Church. The third in 1965 was on The Finality of Christ, and the fourth in 1969 had as its theme, The Living God. Presiding as wardens in these respective sessions were the Rev. Reginald Kissack (1958), Principal HAROLD ROBERTS (1962) and Dr. DOW KIRKPATRICK (1965), and Principal Raymond George (1969). The first of the series was published in the July 1959, London Quarterly and Hol- born Review and the others were published in book form by ABINGDON PRESS, NASHVILLE, Tenn., U.S.A. A fifth Institute is projected for the summer of 1973.

OXFORD METHODISTS were the original followers of JOHN WESLEY at Oxford University. John Wesley himself described the beginning of the Oxford Methodists as follows: "In November, 1729, four young gentlemen of Oxford—Mr. John Wesley, Fellow of Lincoln College; Mr. Charles Wesley, Student of Christ Church; Mr. Morgan, Commoner of Christ Church; and Mr. Kirkham of Merton College—began to spend some evenings in a week together in reading, chiefly, the Greek Testament." (Works, viii, 334.) The "Mr. Morgan" mentioned was WILLIAM MORGAN, the elder of the brothers who were at Oxford, who died in tragic circumstances in DUBLIN on August 26, 1732. Robert Kirkham, who died in March 1767, was the son of the Rev. Lionel Kirkham of Stanton, Gloucestershire. Kirkham's place as the fourth member of the party is disputed, however, by V. H. H. Green, the historian, who forwards the claims of Francis Gore of Christ Church (see The Young Mr. Wesley, p. 151). By 1735 this group had grown to some fourteen or fifteen (Works, xiii, 288), and Luke Tyerman (The Oxford Methodists, 1873) lists the following as having been connected with it: Charles Morgan (born, 1714), Commoner of Lincoln College; John Clayton (1709-73), Brazenose; BENJAMIN INGHAM (1712-72), Queen's; JOHN GAMBOLD (1711-71), Christ Church; JAMES HERVEY (1714-58), Lincoln; Thomas Broughton (died, 1777), Exeter; John Boyce (born c. 1711), Christ Church; William Chapman of Pembroke; Charles Kinchin (died, 1742), Corpus Christi; Richard Hutchins (died, 1781), Lincoln; Christopher Atkinson (1713-74), Queen's; JOHN WHITELAMB (1710-69), Lincoln; and WESTLEY HALL (died, 1776), Lincoln. As one would expect, it is not easy to be exact about membership, and Green in The Young Mr. Wesley quotes from a contemporary list which gives the following additional names: GEORGE WHITEFIELD, Pembroke College; Thomas Horne, Christ Church; Richard Smith and Henry Evans, Christ Church; John Robson and Gridsley (Christian name unknown), Lincoln; Matthew Salmon, Brazenose; Kitchen (Christian name unknown), Pembroke; Robert Watson, Henry Washington, John Bell, Roger (?) Wilson and John (?) Smith, Queen's. Green also lists men who "were on the periphery of the HOLY CLUB, who were at least interested in its activities": Bulman, Bingham, Morgan Graves, Cox, Watkins (Wadham College); Christopher Rhodes and John Spicer (Christ Church); and William Golburne. Others are named who fall into this category: Nash, Langford, Potter, Thomas Patten (Corpus Christi); William Nowell (Brazenose); Hudson Martin (Jesus); George Watson (Christ Church); William Haward (Merton); William Clements (Lincoln); Nicholls, William Smith, Thomas Greives, Robert Davison, and Matthew Robinson (the last four all of Lincoln).

G. BROMLEY OXNAM

OXNAM, GARFIELD BROMLEY (1891-1963), American bishop was born at Sonora, Calif., Aug. 14, 1891, the son of Thomas Henry and Mamie (Job) Oxnham. He was educated at the University of Southern California (A.B., 1913), and BOSTON UNIVERSITY (S.T.B., 1915). He did graduate study at Harvard and other schools. During his career some twenty-one institutions, including AMERICAN, Boston, NORTHWESTERN, Princeton, Southern California, and Yale Universities, conferred on him a total of eight honorary degrees—D.D., S.T.D., Th.D., LL.D., Litt.D., L.H.D., D.Sc., and D.C.L. He married Ruth Fisher, Aug. 19, 1914, and they had three children, Robert, Philip, and Ruth (Mrs. Robert McCormack).

Admitted on trial in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE in 1913, Oxnham was ordained deacon in 1915 and elder in 1917. His appointments were: 1916, Poplar, Calif.; 1917-26, Church of All Nations, Los Angeles; 1927, professor, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; and 1928-35, president, DEPAUW UNIVERSITY.

In one year at Poplar, Oxnham built a new church and a new parsonage and more than doubled the church membership. In ten years at the Church of All Nations, he identified with the labor movement and other causes, and he organized activities including a boys' club of 1,000 members. As a result the area which had previously had the highest juvenile delinquency rate in Los Angeles attained a rate lower than the average for the municipality as a whole. While serving the church Oxnham was also professor of social ethics in the University of Southern California for four years.

A delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1924-36, Oxnham was elected bishop in 1936. His episcopal assignments were: 1936-39, OMAHA; 1939-44, BOSTON; 1944-52, NEW YORK; and 1952-60, WASHINGTON.

The episcopacy gave full scope for Oxnham's abilities. He visited every parsonage in the Omaha Area which comprised IOWA and NEBRASKA. He traveled widely; usually his annual expense account was larger than that of any other bishop in the church. He wielded great influence as secretary of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1939-56, transforming the periodic meetings of the church leaders into a real Council which considered a full and challenging agenda at each session. He originated the plan which requires the bishops in turn to visit foreign fields so as to gain first-hand knowledge of world conditions. He conceived and led the Methodist Crusade for World Order, 1944-48. Under his leadership WESTMINSTER SEMINARY in MARYLAND was moved to Washington as WESLEY SEMINARY, and the School of International Service was established at American University with funds appropriated by the General Conference.

Endowed with a quick mind, a diversity of gifts, and a capacity for hard work, Oxnham developed competence in a number of fields. He filled ten or more important university lectureships, including the Lyman Beecher at Yale, Fondren at SOUTHERN METHODIST, Merrick at OHIO WESLEYAN, Earl at PACIFIC, Tipple at DREW, and Hoover and Tuthill at Chicago. His books, more than twenty in number, widened his influence. Among them were: The Mexican in Los Angeles, 1920; Social Principles of Jesus, 1923; Preaching in a Revolutionary Age, 1944; The Church and Contemporary Change, 1950; I Protest, 1954; and A Testament of Faith, 1958. He was a trustee of nine institutions, including Boston and American Universities.

Active in both denominational and ecumenical organizations and movements, Oxnham served as president of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1944-46; was a presiding officer at the organization of the National Council of Churches, 1950; was one of the presidents of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1948-54; and later was a member of the Central Committee of the latter. He chaired the division of educational institutions, General BOARD OF EDUCATION, 1939-44, and did the same for the division of foreign missions, General BOARD OF MISSIONS, 1944-52. During World War II he was a member of the Civil Advisory Commission to the Secretary of the Navy, official visitor for the Joint Chiefs of Staff to army and navy chaplains, chairman of the Commission to Study Post War Relief Conditions in GERMANY, and chairman of the Methodist Commission on CHAPLAINS.

Claiming that the Committee on Un-American Activities of the U.S. Congress had for seven years released so-called "files" containing false material which said or suggested that he was a communist, and pointing out that the Committee had ignored repeated requests to correct its files, Oxnam in July 1953, requested a hearing before the Committee. In a twelve-hour session he attempted to explain his beliefs and to refute the false accusations. The Committee did not apologize or retract, but afterward two individual congressmen said they did not believe the bishop was or ever had been a communist. The reaction in the press was favorable to the bishop. After Oxnam's death the 1964 Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE adopted a resolution saying the bishop had "called the House Committee on Un-American Activities to public accounting" for the "irresponsible way" in which it had attacked and tried to intimidate him and other churchmen. Also, the resolution declared that Oxnam had "left the impress of his brilliant mind, courageous spirit, and tireless will on every level of the life of The Methodist Church as well as the National and World Council of Churches."

Broken in health, Oxnam retired in 1960. He died at White Plains, N. Y., March 12, 1963. On April 11, 1964, his ashes were interred in a solemn service of enshrinement beneath the chancel of the Oxnam Chapel, Wesley Theological Seminary, Washington, D. C.

PACE, JAMES (1930-), missionary to BOLIVIA, was born in Brownsville, Texas. He received the A.B. degree from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY and the B.D. degree from Yale Divinity School. He married Evelyn Duponey, and they have four children. A missionary to Bolivia since 1957, he has served as pastor, superintendent of the Central District, conference executive secretary (1962), director of Wesley Seminary, and executive secretary of the conference committee on literacy and literature.

NATALIE BARBER

PACE, JOHN CAPERTON (1888-), and MILDRED SMITH (1893-), served with distinction as missionary educators in INDIA from late 1920 until July 1943. Pace was born in Palestine, Texas, and was educated at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.A.), SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and Yale Divinity School (B.D.). Mrs. Pace was born in Stirling City, Texas, April 17, 1893.

They were appointed to India and arrived there in 1920. Their first appointment was to a boys' industrial school at Aligarh, United Provinces, but in February 1922, they were put in charge of the only high school then in existence in the large NORTHERN INDIA CONFERENCE.

After furlough in 1925, they were sent to the now-famed Ingraham Institute at Ghaziabad, a few miles from DELHI. They remained in that key appointment until 1942, when they left India on furlough. The next year, for family reasons, they withdrew from service under the board; and, after a few years on a farm, John Pace accepted the presidency of a junior college in TEXAS.

While he was in the grip of the responsibilities of the principalship of Ghaziabad, Mrs. Pace was both his invaluable colleague and a very convincing adviser of other primary and second school officers. Their helpful influence was felt in hundreds of schools in India, penetrating into secular schools of government, and even into schools maintained by non-Christian groups.

PACIFIC CHINESE MISSION. Thousands of Chinese immigrants poured into CALIFORNIA following the Gold Rush of 1849. Nearly two decades passed before the M. E. Church began evangelizing them. With support from the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE and the General Missionary Committee in New York, Otis Gibson, who had served as missionary in CHINA, became superintendent of missionary work among the west coast Chinese in 1868. He soon organized two Sunday schools in SAN FRANCISCO and one in SAN JOSE. In 1870, a headquarters building called the Chinese Mission Institute was opened in San Francisco. By 1878 Gibson reported that the work was opening up and expanding on every side.

Several factors served to hinder the ministry to the Chinese immigrants. In the early years there were no native Chinese preachers to assist the missionaries. The white people soon developed strong race prejudice against the Chinese. It was not unusual for Chinese to be attacked, kicked, and beaten as they were on their way to Methodist services and language classes. Then in 1882 came the Chinese Exclusion Act which effectively stopped the rapid influx of immigrants from China.

Because of ill health, Gibson resigned as superintendent of Chinese missions in 1884 and was succeeded by F. J. Masters. Other leaders in the Chinese work were John Hammond, A. J. Hanson, George Hedley, Edward James, and George Pearson. Eventually Chinese missions were started in Berkeley, Gilroy, Monterey, Salinas, Watsonville, Hanford, and Marysville, California, and in such cities as PORTLAND, SEATTLE, DENVER, SAN ANTONIO, and TUCSON in other states. In 1907, superintendent James reported that he had traveled 6,000 miles in making the circuit of the work in the Pacific Chinese Mission.

The California Conference formed a Chinese District in 1893, and in 1904 the Chinese Mission was formally organized in San Francisco with Bishop LUTHER B. WILSON presiding. In 1908 the name was changed to Pacific Chinese Mission and it included all Chinese work in the western half of the United States. At unification in 1939, the Pacific Chinese Mission with eleven effective preachers, 428 members, and 773 Sunday school pupils became a part of the California Oriental Mission which also included Filipino and Korean work. The organization was designated as the California Oriental Provisional Conference in 1945. In 1952 the ministers and churches of the provisional conference were absorbed into the English-speaking conferences of the WESTERN JURISDICTION. However, sixteen years later there were still five Chinese Methodist churches in California—at San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, and Los Angeles.

PACIFIC CONFERENCE (1852-1939) was the first organized work of the M. E. Church, South on the west coast. Sent by the bishops of the church, JESSE BORING and A. M. WYNN of the GEORGIA CONFERENCE and D. W. POLLOCK of the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE arrived in SAN FRANCISCO in 1850. They distributed literature, organized circuits, enrolled members, and in April 1852, formed the Pacific Conference to include CALIFORNIA, OREGON, ARIZONA, and NEW MEXICO.

At the outset the work of the conference was limited to the vicinity of San Francisco, but in 1854 the presiding elder of the Stockton District learned that some members of a church on the LOS ANGELES Circuit of the M. E. Church, opposed to an abolition society in the congregation, had withdrawn and desired affiliation with the Southern church. He visited the group, organized a class of sixteen, and sent three preachers to the area in 1855.

Due to anti-Southern feeling, the work progressed slowly in southern California. A Los Angeles District was formed in 1858 but was discontinued the next year. In 1866 and 1867, Los Angeles was the sole appointment of the Pacific Conference in the southern part of the state. However, in 1868, the Los Angeles Mission District was formed with five appointments.

The Pacific Conference organized an Oregon District in 1859, and in 1866 the GENERAL CONFERENCE designated Oregon and a part of northern California as the Columbia Conference (1866-1917).

In October 1870, the Pacific Conference was again divided to form the Los Angeles Conference (1870-1922). The new body included southern California and Arizona; at the beginning it had ten preachers and 475 members. Throughout its history the Los Angeles Conference was never large. In 1880 there were about 1,000 church members. By 1900 there were thirty churches and some 2,000 members, one-sixth of them in Arizona. When the conference was dissolved in 1922, it gave back to the Pacific Conference some 4,500 members and sixteen churches, while the remainder—about 2,800 members and twenty-one congregations—formed the Arizona Conference.

For lack of strength the Southern Methodist conferences in California were not able to establish a permanent college or seminary. However, they started several educational institutions which served varying periods of time. Among them were Bascom Institute at San Jose, Asbury Institute at Sacramento, Corvallis College in Oregon, and the Pacific Methodist College at Vacaville. The latter institution later moved to Santa Rosa; it began in 1861 and closed in 1887.

The Pacific Conference launched a church paper at San Francisco in 1852. Published under several different names, it finally became the Pacific Methodist Advocate in 1891 and so continued until 1934. The Los Angeles Christian Advocate, started in 1885 by the Los Angeles Conference, failed within three years. GROVER C. EMMONS, long a Southern Methodist leader in southern California, founded The Upper Room in 1934 and was its editor until his death ten years later.

The conferences laid strong emphasis on Sunday schools and youth work. Trinity Church in Los Angeles pioneered in the ministry to youth and prepared the memorial to the General Conference of 1890 which resulted in the establishment of the EPWORTH LEAGUE in the Southern church. Soon after 1900, the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY began operating the Homer Toberman Deaconess Home in Los Angeles. It has continued as a settlement or neighborhood house ministering to the needy.

Trinity Church, organized in 1869, was the largest church in the Los Angeles Conference from 1880 onward, and in time it became one of the strongest congregations in Southern Methodism. In the decade from 1920 to 1930 the congregation quadrupled in size. The growth and dominance of Trinity Church were due largely to an intensive program under the leadership of able pastors, such as H. M. DuBOSE, CHARLES C. SELECMAN, and ROBERT P. SHULER. At its peak strength the church had nearly 5,000 members.

Through the generosity of a Southern Methodist, LIZZIE H. GLIDE, the Glide Memorial Church was erected at Taylor and Ellis Streets, San Francisco, in 1929 at a cost of about half a million dollars. Beginning with seventy members, Glide Memorial took the place of the Fitzgerald Church a few blocks away. A program of continuous evangelism lifted the membership to about 1,350 by 1939. In the 1940's the membership began to decline. In 1967, the church reported something over 300 members.

The M. E. Church, South did not fare well in competition with the M. E. Church in California, particularly in the southern part of the state. The Southern church preachers were vigorous and determined, but their denomination did not invest as much money in church extension as did the Northern church. Moreover, the Northern church had a distinct advantage in that the majority of the immigrants into the region were from the northern states.

At unification in 1939, the Pacific Conference with 19,817 members constituted the total numerical strength of the M. E. Church, South in California. Some 11,308 of these members went into the California Conference and 8,509 into the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

PACIFIC GERMAN CONFERENCE grew out of mission work among the German-speaking people in the northwest. Frederick Bonn joined the OREGON CONFERENCE in 1880 and gave himself to work among the Germans. He went to Puget Sound in 1882 and soon had German churches at TACOMA and SEATTLE. JAMES H. WILBUR started work among the Germans at Walla Walla.

In 1888 the North Pacific German Mission, including work in WASHINGTON, OREGON, IDAHO, and MONTANA, was organized. In 1892 it became the North Pacific German Mission Conference, and in 1905 the Pacific German Conference. The conference was organized Sept. 7, 1905 at PORTLAND, ORE., with Bishop WILLIAM F. McDOWELL presiding. At the time of organization it had two districts, Portland and Spokane, and there were twenty-two charges and 1,242 members. Twelve of the charges were in Washington.

The Pacific German Conference was the last of the German conferences to be organized in the M. E. Church in accordance with the plan for a system of such conferences adopted by the 1864 GENERAL CONFERENCE. The Pacific German Conference reached peak strength in 1910 when it had twenty-four charges and 1,539 members. Liquidation of the German conferences came rapidly after 1925 when the ST. LOUIS GERMAN CONFERENCE merged into the overlying English-speaking conferences. The decrease in German immigration and the rapid Americanization of the German language churches after the first world war made the mergers inevitable. With few church services being conducted in German there was no logical reason for maintaining the German conferences. The Pacific German Conference merged in 1928, having at the time seventeen charges, nineteen churches, 1,256 members, and property valued at $107,350.

PACIFIC GROVE, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. At the southern tip of the Monterey Peninsula is situated this one-time capital of CALIFORNIA Methodism. The annual conference of 1875 was offered a gift of 100 acres of land at this place for a summer resort and retreat for Methodists. The offer was accepted and the area was developed as Pacific Grove Retreat. CAMP MEETINGS were held; Methodist families vacationed here in great numbers; many Methodists came here to live and to die; and the city of Pacific Grove came into being.

A church was built, far larger than the local membership required, to be serviceable for the sessions of the annual conference which met here twenty-seven consecutive times, 1886 to 1913. Preceding the session many of the ministers and their families were at Pacific Grove several days while the Itinerants' Club met each morning and provided intellectual stimulus for the ministers while the families enjoyed the vacation. Lectures on poetry, Bible themes, or other contemporary topics, discussions on church polity, Sunday school curriculum or other matters of interest filled the hours, and in the evening an illustrated lecture or musical program. Pacific Grove provided a Methodist cultural center for the people whose interests followed the annual conference sessions.

In time the church corporation lost all the property except that occupied by church and parsonage because of financial problems. Changing patterns of life shifted interest away from the former ways, and Pacific Grove ceased to be a dominant factor in conference life. The first pastor named was J. B. Chynoweth, in 1884. He reported twenty-five members. The church was a notable one for many years, and the conference cemetery at Pacific Grove was the place of interment of many Methodist ministers.

PACIFIC JAPANESE MISSION. The M. E. Church began work among the Japanese in CALIFORNIA in 1877 when some Japanese attended the Chinese mission being conducted by Otis Gibson. (See PACIFIC CHINESE MISSION.) In 1884, Kanichi Miyeyama, a Japanese, was admitted on trial into the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE. The conference formed a Japanese District in 1893, and in 1894 the first Japanese Methodist Church in America was dedicated in SAN FRANCISCO. Work among the Japanese extended north, south, and east from San Francisco.

The Pacific Japanese Mission was organized in 1900 with M. C. HARRIS as superintendent. The mission included the Japanese and Korean work on the Pacific slope and in HAWAII. Methodist work had flourished among the Japanese in Hawaii because Kanichi Miyeyama went there as a missionary from California in 1885. In 1905 the Hawaii work became the Hawaii Mission, leaving the Pacific Japanese Mission with eight pastors, 699 church members, and 305 Sunday school pupils.

Beginning in 1897, the M. E. Church, South did oriental missionary work on the west coast, and there was some division of responsibility between the two Episcopal Methodisms. (See CALIFORNIA ORIENTAL MISSION.)

HERBERT B. JOHNSON was superintendent of the Pacific Japanese Mission from 1904 to 1925. That period was marked by the development of anti-Japanese feeling on the west coast and the rise of an English-speaking generation of Japanese. Many Japanese Methodist young people began to achieve places of leadership in the English-speaking communities. Frank Herron Smith served as superintendent from 1926 to 1944. He led in church extension, in Christian training for young people, and in the promotion of good will among Americans and Japanese. Japanese churches were organized in CALIFORNIA, OREGON, WASHINGTON, ARIZONA, and COLORADO.

At unification in 1939, the mission was superseded by the Japanese Provisional Conference which also included the Japanese work from the California Oriental Mission of the M. E. Church, South. The promising work of the provisional conference was soon interrupted by the second world war. More than 110,000 Japanese people on the west coast were evacuated to the desert areas of western America. Though the doors of many Japanese churches were locked and other sanctuaries were rented, somehow religious services and activities were carried on among the Japanese in the relocation centers. Because of the illness of Smith, John B. Cobb was appointed acting superintendent in 1945. Channing A. Richardson led the mission from 1946 to 1948, and in 1949 Taro Goto became superintendent, the first Japanese in the United States to hold the office.

In the post-war years, the work of the provisional conference was notable in several ways. Leadership in the churches passed from Japanese-speaking to English-speaking members. There was progress in church building—ten new churches, thirteen education units, and seven parsonages, along with the purchase of fifteen parsonages. Also, there was a definite trend toward integration of the Japanese work with the English-speaking conferences. The merger finally was consummated in 1964, and the Japanese Provisional Conference was no more. At the time of integration the conference had forty-one ministers (eleven retired), thirty churches, 6,534 members, and property valued at $3,581,900.

PACIFIC NORTHWEST CONFERENCE, which includes the state of WASHINGTON and part of IDAHO, was organized as a conference of the M. E. Church, Sept. 17, 1929 at SPOKANE, Wash., with Bishop TITUS LOWE presiding. At the time of organization the conference also included the work in ALASKA, but that was set off as the Alaska Mission in 1939. The Pacific Northwest Conference was formed by merging the Puget Sound and COLUMBIA RIVER Conferences. The one covered west Washington, and the other east Washington and a part of Idaho. When organized the new conference had nine districts and 49,724 members. (See WASHINGTON for beginnings of Methodism in the state.)

The Columbia River Conference was formed in 1873 by dividing the OREGON CONFERENCE. It was first called the East Oregon and Washington Conference, the name being changed to Columbia River in 1876. The conference included east Washington, east OREGON, and the panhandle of Idaho. At the end of the first year it reported nineteen charges and 455 members. In 1922 the Oregon territory of this conference was given to the Oregon Conference. In its last year, 1928, the Columbia River Conference reported three districts, 115 charges, 20,449 members, and property valued at $1,853,050.

The Puget Sound Conference was formed in 1884 by dividing the Oregon Conference. Its territory was west Washington. In 1924 Alaska was made a part of the conference. The conference started with two districts and thirty-four charges. At the end of the first year it reported 1,638 members. In its last year, 1928, the Puget Sound Conference had four districts, 168 charges, 28,580 members, and property valued at $2,669,250.

The PACIFIC GERMAN CONFERENCE and the PACIFIC SWEDISH MISSION CONFERENCE were absorbed by the overlying English-speaking conferences in 1928, and a few ministers and churches from both bodies were received into the Columbia River and Puget Sound Conferences at that time. At Unification in 1939, three M. P. congregations with about 800 members, and two from the M. E. Church, South with 394 members, entered the Pacific Northwest Conference of The Methodist Church. The WESTERN NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE was merged with the overlying English-speaking conferences in 1939. This merger brought nine churches with about 530 members into the Pacific Northwest Conference. The new Pacific Northwest Conference was organized at Bellingham, Wash., on June 14, 1939 with Bishop WALLACE E. BROWN presiding. It began with five districts; and in 1941 it reported 247 pastoral charges and 48,011 members.

Methodist work among the Japanese in Spokane began in 1902. The JAPANESE PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE was merged with the overlying English-speaking conferences in 1964. This merger brought four Japanese churches with 1,023 members into the Pacific Northwest Conference.

One member of the Pacific Northwest Conference, J. RALPH MACEE, was elected bishop in 1932.

Methodism in Washington has supported schools and service agencies. The Columbia River Conference had the Columbia Christian Advocate in Spokane in the 1890's, and the Puget Sound Conference supported the Pacific Christian Advocate at Portland, Ore. Both conferences maintained several WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the state schools. The College of PUGET SOUND (now UNIVERSITY) was founded at Tacoma in 1888. With an endowment of over $5,000,000, and a plant valued at $13,000,000, the school has a student body of more than 2,300.

In 1968 the Pacific Northwest Conference was supporting the Deaconess Children's Home at Everett, Central Washington Deaconess Hospital at Wenatchee, Spokane Deaconess Hospital, Kadlec Methodist Hospital at Richland, Bayview Manor in Seattle, Wesley Gardens at Des Moines, Rockwood Manor at Spokane, Goodwill Industries at Aberdeen, Seattle, Spokane, and several camps.

The Pacific Northwest Conference reported in 1970 seven districts, 236 charges, 405 ministers, 101,718 members, and property valued at $52,416,524. In that year it raised for all purposes $7,914,835.

PACIFIC SWEDISH MISSION CONFERENCE (ME) grew out of Methodist mission work among the Swedish-speaking people in the northwest. The Swedes came to the region in large numbers in the 1880's. While most were Lutherans, some had been won to Methodism in the eastern part of the United States. Swedish Methodist work began on the west coast in 1873 when a group of Swedish and Norwegian friends organized a class in the Howard Street M.E. Church, SAN FRANCISCO. Two years later the class became an independent church, and the next year it received its first pastor. As time passed Swedish churches were organized in BERKELEY, PASADENA, SPOKANE, TACOMA, SEATTLE, PORTLAND, SALEM, and elsewhere.

In 1890 a Swedish District with ten charges was organized in the Puget Sound Conference. A year later the district reported only 108 members. In 1900 there were 225. Notwithstanding the low aggregate number of members in the Swedish churches, the Pacific Swedish Mission Conference was organized on Sept. 2, 1908, at Oakland, Calif., with Bishop HENRY W. WARREN presiding. It began with two districts, California and Washington, and there were eighteen charges and 950 members.

The Pacific Swedish Mission Conference continued only twenty years, holding its last session in 1928. At that time it had sixteen charges, 1,230 members, and property valued at $253,600. The Swedish churches and ministers were received into the overlying English-speaking conferences.

PADUCAH, KENTUCKY, U.S.A., is a city on the Ohio River named for the Chief of an Indian tribe that occupied the area. The earliest religious meetings in Paducah are unrecorded, but in 1834 two circuit riders, George W. Martin and George W. Cayce, called together a group of their converts and organized the first Methodist church in the lower Ohio Valley. It was organized in the private school of Professor Robert Ball and was known as the Paducah charge. These were followed by Finley Bynum, G. W. Kelson, J. D. Fleming, J. W. Jones, E. M. Williams, E. W. Yancey, J. P. Stanfield, and George E. Young. In 1841 the first appointment was made to Paducah Station, in the person of James Young, and under his leadership the church building was completed.

Although in KENTUCKY, the charge was in the MEMPHIS ANNUAL CONFERENCE, which in 1883 changed the name of Paducah Station to Broadway Church. In 1888 a group of members formed a second mission in north Paducah, and in 1970 there were thirteen United Methodist churches in the city, with a total membership of 5,097. Broadway is the largest, with 1,054 members.

PAGE, JESSE HAYES (1831-1903), distinguished American minister and educator, was for almost a quarter of a century a leader in the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. CHURCH. He was born May 23, 1831. In 1881 he united with the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. He was a member of a prominent Wake County, N. C., Methodist family which included his nephew, the Honorable Walter Hines Page, Ambassador to Great Britain, 1913-1918.

Page was educated at South Lowell Academy and at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE. In 1855 he came to Brinkleyville, N. C., where he and WILLIAM HENRY WILLS opened the HALIFAX MALE ACADEMY and later the ELBA FEMALE SEMINARY. He was licensed to preach at Bethesda Church at Brinkleyville in 1858, the same year in which he joined the North Carolina Conference of the M. P. Church. On Dec. 2, 1856, he married Martha Elizabeth Wills, daughter of Henry Wills. The Pages had one son and five daughters.

Page served as Secretary of the North Carolina Conference in 1859, 1861, 1866, 1867, 1875 and 1876. He was President of the Conference in 1878-1879. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. P. Church held in 1866, 1874 and 1880. Around 1870 he and RICHARD HENRY WILLS, his brother-in-law, held a protracted meeting near the residence of E. L. Lee in Halifax County and as a result "Lee's Chapel" was established.

Page served first as a private and later as chaplain in the Army of the Confederate States of America. In 1865, at the close of the war, he returned to Brinkleyville and in the following year was assigned to the Tar River Circuit of the North Carolina Conference. In 1867 and 1868 he taught again at Brinkleyville and from 1869-1871 he taught at "Whitakertown" near Enfield. During this period he also served the Roanoke Circuit. In 1871 he moved to Guilford County and taught until 1873 when he returned to his boyhood home, Cary, in Wake County and taught until 1877. In 1877-1878 he served the Halifax Circuit, which included Bethesda Church and Eden Church (which see), and in 1878 he was made President of the Conference. In 1880 he moved to Winston (now WINSTON-SALEM) and in 1881 he united with the M. E. Church, South. As a member of the North Carolina Conference of this branch of Methodism, he served the following circuits or stations: Lenoir, Rock Spring, Rockingham, Kinston, Concord, Statesville, Morganton, Aberdeen, Laurinburg. Page was "a man of strong individuality and lovable personality" and "one of the most able and distinguished ministers of the gospel in NORTH CAROLINA and one of her most beloved sons." He had an exceptional good pulpit voice and he was well-acquainted with the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages.

He was superannuated in 1899 and died in Henderson, N. C., on Dec. 10, 1903.

PAGE, JOHN (1766-1859), American pioneer preacher and presiding elder, was born in Fauquier County, Va., on Nov. 22, 1766. He married Celia Douglass in 1791.

Admitted on trial in the itinerancy, he was appointed to Livingston in 1792; Danville, 1793; Salt River, 1794; Limestone, 1795; Green (East Tennessee), 1796; Luckstone, 1797; Salt River and Shelby, 1798; Cumberland Circuit, 1799-1802.

On the Cumberland Circuit, John Page wrought mightily for four years and was peculiarly adapted to the work on that circuit. It was unusual in that day to continue a man on a circuit longer than one year. At the close of his four years he was appointed presiding elder of the Cumberland District. At the end of the first year he was broken in health and therefore located in 1804.

In 1800 Page had been placed on the Holston, Russell, and New River Circuit in VIRGINIA, but owing to dissatisfaction among the people of Cumberland Circuit at his removal from that circuit, he was recalled and his place supplied in Holston.

Page was one of the prime movers and one of the most important Methodist leaders in the historic Great Revival which came about in TENNESSEE and KENTUCKY in the early years of the nineteenth century. Out of it came many denominations, Christian organizations, and movements during the Revival.

Readmitted to the Conference in 1811, Page was appointed to Goose Creek Circuit; and Caney Fork, 1812; again he located in 1813. He was readmitted and sent to Stone's River, 1825; Nashville Circuit, 1826; LEBANON, 1827; Smith's Fork as supernumerary, 1828; Goose Creek, 1829-30; Fountain Head, 1831-32; and Smith's Fork, 1833. He was either a supernumerary or superannuate from then on until his death.

When Page entered Kentucky and Tennessee, there were in that territory nineteen traveling preachers. At the time of his death there were 681. A man of faith and power, John Page died June 17, 1859, at the age of ninety-three and in the sixty-eighth year of his ministry.

JESSE A. EARL

PAGE, RODGER CLARENCE GEORGE (1878-1965), Australian minister, was a member of a devoted Methodist family at Grafton, on the Clarence River, northern New South Wales. One of his brothers was the late Sir Earle Grafton Page, for a time Prime Minister, and for many years Treasurer in the Federal Government.

Rodger Page went to TONGA in 1908 and became chairman of the small Methodist Church from which the majority of Tongan Methodists (the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga) had seceded in 1885. With great patience and genuine affection for all Tongans he worked for re-union. Through the leadership of the late QUEEN SALOTE the hopes of re-union were largely realized. In 1924 the Methodists were legally united with the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga of which R. C. G. Page became President, 1924-46. It was regrettable that about one-third of the seceding body refused to unite and has remained outside union ever since.

Page's devotion to Methodism and the people's interests, his cheerful spirit, and his influence with the Queen brought him very great respect. Though a widower he continued to labor in Tonga until ill-health compelled his retirement in 1947. He died in SYDNEY in 1965 and his ashes were taken to Tonga at his request. The Queen, not long before her own death, showed the high regard in which she held Rodger Page by ordering that the Tongan word reserved for royalty should be inscribed on his tomb; no greater recognition, in the opinion of Tongans, could have been given.

PAGE'S MEETING HOUSE, near Radford, Va., was a log church built in 1774, some two and one-half miles south of Radford. The HOLSTON CONFERENCE Committee on History has erected a stone marker at this historic site. Edward Morgan, an Englishman by birth and reputed to have been licensed by JOHN WESLEY in England, is associated with Page's Meeting House. He preached there on Sundays and is said to be the first pastor of this earliest church within the bounds of what is now the Holston Conference.

FRANCIS ASBURY preached in this chapel several times, and David Morgan was ordained there, being the first man ordained in the whole area. Here also was held the first CAMP MEETING, which was one of the centers of a great revival. JOHN PAGE was a promoter of this revival in the Holston country at the close of the eighteenth century.

In 1874 Page's Meeting House was replaced by a frame building erected not far away by William H. Price. The old chapel disappeared and the land reverted to the original donors.

FEDERICO PAGURA

PAGURA, FEDERICO (1923-), Argentine bishop, was born in Arroyo Seco, ARGENTINA, and attended the Methodist-related Colegio Americano in Rosario in that country. He attended Union Theological Seminary in BUENOS AIRES, where he graduated in 1946. He is a former Methodist Crusade Scholar, having studied in that capacity at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, 1948-49.

Bishop Pagura entered the Methodist ministry in 1947. He served as pastor of the Church of the Resurrection in Rosario, and as district superintendent of the Central District of the Argentina Annual Conference. In 1960-61 he was on the staff of the World Student Christian Federation in GENEVA, SWITZERLAND, preparing a hymnal and a book of worship for students in SPAIN, PORTUGAL, and Latin America. He has been president of the Argentina Conference Board of Christian Education, vice-president of the conference's General Board, and president of the Evangelical Council on Christian Education and Curriculum in Latin America. He is married and the father of three children. He was elected bishop by the South America CENTRAL CONFERENCE, holding what was to be its last meeting in SANTIAGO, CHILE, in January 1969. The various Methodist annual conferences comprising the Central Conference of South America are expected to become autonomous Methodist churches during the 1968-72 quadrennium (see LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCHES, COUNCIL OF).

When elected bishop, Federico Pagura was professor of pastoral counseling and chaplain at the Union Theological Seminary in Buenos Aires. He was assigned the Methodist work in PANAMA and COSTA RICA.

N. B. H.

PAINE, ROBERT (1799-1882), American bishop, was born in Person County, N. C., on Nov. 12, 1799, the son of James and Mary A. Paine. The family went to Giles County, Tenn., in 1814, and Robert was educated in the neighborhood schools and at a private school near Culeoka, Tenn. In 1817 he was converted in a CAMP MEETING held at Pisgah campground and joined Bethesda Methodist Church under the ministry of THOMAS L. DOUGLASS, presiding elder of the NASHVILLE district. After he was licensed to preach, he spent one year as the colleague of Miles Harper on the Nashville circuit and was then admitted on trial into the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, meeting at Nashville on Oct. 1, 1818, Bishops MCKENDREE and GEORGE presiding. His first appointment was the Flint River circuit in TENNESSEE, followed by a year on the Tuscaloosa circuit in ALABAMA. After that he served successively Murfreesboro and Shelbyville, Franklin and Lebanon. In 1823 he was appointed presiding elder of the Forked Deer district. In 1824-25 he was pastor at Nashville, and in 1826-29 he was presiding elder of the Nashville district.

In 1829 he was appointed superintendent of a school at Tuscumbia, and from 1830 until his election to the episcopacy in 1846, he was president of LaGrange College in Franklin County, Ala. During this time he was awarded the D.D. degree by a college that is not known at the present time.

As a bishop, Robert Paine presided over all the conferences of Southern Methodism, serving as the presiding officer of the Tennessee Conference on six different occasions. He was the presiding bishop of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE for nine sessions. After his election as bishop he moved to Aberdeen, Miss., where he remained until his death on Oct. 19, 1882. His wife died at Aberdeen on Jan. 3, 1904. At the time of his death the following children survived him: Mrs. J. H. Scruggs, Mrs. S. F. Hamilton, William M. Paine, and George C. Paine.

At the request of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1854, Bishop Paine was requested to write the life of Bishop William McKendree, which he did with great effectiveness, due largely to his early association with Bishop McKendree.

PAINE COLLEGE, Augusta, Georgia, an institution historically related to the needs of Negro youth, was established in 1883 as Paine Institute, through the joint efforts of the M.E. Church, South, and the C.M.E. Church. The name was changed in 1903 to the present one. Bishops ATTICUS HAYGOOD, WARREN A. CANDLER, and CHARLES B. GALLOWAY were influential in getting the institution started and in securing financial support from the M.E. Church, South.

The school was named for Bishop ROBERT PAINE of the M.E. Church, South, who had been interested in plantation missions and organized the Negro members of his church into the C.M.E. Church. Southerners of both races planned for and supported the college from the beginning. It was the major concern of the M.E. Church, South, for Negro education and supported as such.

JOHN O. CROSS

PAISLEY, CHARLES HENRY (1843-1908). Canadian Methodist preacher and theologian, was born in Fredericton, New Brunswick, Nov. 15, 1843. After taking his M.A. degree at the University of New Brunswick in 1866, he was received on probation as a Methodist minister. Before and after his ordination in 1870 he was stationed on several circuits in the Maritime Provinces.

In 1879 he was appointed principal of MOUNT ALLISON Academy and professor of New Testament Greek at the university. He was also one of the examiners of the University of New Brunswick. He left these positions in 1884, and obtained leave to study at Edinburgh and Cambridge. Returning in 1885, he served on circuits until 1896, when he returned to Mount Allison as professor of church history and New Testament exegesis. In 1902 he became dean of theology, a position which he held until his death.

During his ministry Charles Paisley held many responsible positions in the church. He was President of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Conference in 1888, and a delegate to several General Conferences. At the time of his death he was a member of the General Conference Committee on Union with the Presbyterian and Congregational churches, and of its subcommittee on doctrine. He was honored by Victoria College with a D.D. in 1900.

Paisley made many contributions to The Wesleyan and other periodicals on both religious and scientific subjects. One of his papers, "Illustrations of the Harmony Between Scripture and Science," was published in The Canadian Methodist Magazine.

His sudden death at Sackville, Jan. 20, 1908, was a great loss to his church and to his university.

PAKISTAN. On Aug. 15, 1947 the British Crown Colony of INDIA was granted independence, and divided into two sovereign dominions according to religious predominance—India (Hindu) and Pakistan (Moslem). Both remained in the British Commonwealth, and also joined the United Nations. Pakistan decided in 1953 to become a Republic, in May 1955 adopted a new constitution, and in March 1956 inaugurated the new republic. The Moslems predominated in the west and that portion became West Pakistan. They also predominated in the east, and that became East Pakistan, separated by 1,000 miles of Hindu India. The name Pakistan was chosen because it means Holy Land.

A little more than one-fifth of prepartition India came into Pakistan, 365,529 square miles in all, of which West Pakistan had 310,403 square miles, the remaining 55,126 being in East Pakistan. The 1961 Census reports the population as follows: For all Pakistan 132,000,000, of whom Moslems are about eighty percent. Literacy figures for Pakistan total 15.9%; West Pakistan 13.6; East Pakistan, 17.6.

In West Pakistan the people are largely from the Aryan stock with some of Mongol and Central Asian ancestry. Very few Aborigines are in the land.

The ruins of Harappa, on the banks of the Ravi River 120 miles south-west of LAHORE, and of Mohenjo-Daro on the banks of the Indus 200 miles north of KARACHI belong to the Indus Valley Civilization of 5,000 years ago, and show their advanced culture (Dravidian).

The ruins of Taxila, some twenty miles north-west of Rawalpindi, reveal much early history, e.g. the coming of Alexander the Great in 327 B.C. and the lingering Greek influence. The beginning of the spread of Buddhism brought the famous Indian king, Asoka, 273-232 B.C., to Taxila and helped make a Buddhist Center in Taxila. Buddhist influence in India was great for several centuries.

The first Moslem invader of India came from the west, Persia, in 712. Through the following eight centuries frequent and incessant forays or invasions continued, ending in 1525 with Babar who set up the famous Moghul dynasty which ended with the death of Aurangzeb in 1707. Confusion reigned till the British era came after 1750. During the 200 years of Moghul domination the Moslems increased rapidly in numbers, particularly in the extreme east of India and even more in the west. South India remained very predominantly Hindu and the northern part of India was overwhelmingly Hindu, beginning from Amritsar and increasingly stronger to mid-Bengal.

In 1365 Firoz Shah, a Moslem king, imposed a poll tax on Hindus, with Moslems exempt, known as Jizya. Akbar, a Moslem, abolished the tax in 1569. In 1679 Aurangzeb, last of the famous Moslem kings of the Moghul dynasty, reimposed the Jizya tax. A few years later it was not enforced and has not been in force since.

The British control of India began in the 1750 decade, in the name of the East India Company. In 1857 the British Government took over the control of India, but Moslem majorities continued in the western sections and the eastern half of Bengal. After the first World War, the British Government came to the conclusion that India should get independence.

The rivalry between the Congress Party dominated by Hindus, and the Moslem League representing Moslems, led to the demand from the latter for separation at the time of independence. The nearer the promised day of independence came, the more adamant the Moslem League became. The British leaders feared the outbreak of civil war within all of India, particularly all of northern India, and so agreed to the separation. The Congress Party reluctantly accepted the plan. The Congress Party was never happy over the partition, and Moslem-established Pakistan was unwilling to accept India's action claiming the right to absorb Kashmir on the request of the ruler, a Hindu, ruling a nation predominantly Islamic. Fighting between India and Pakistan over Kashmir broke out in 1948, but was quickly muted into a cease fire urged by the United Nations. In September 1965, the fighting again broke out, and again the United Nations got a cease fire arranged and carried out. In January 1966, the Russian leader, Kosygin, arranged for a meeting in which the two leaders, Premier Shastri for India, and President Aiyub for Pakistan, signed the Tashkent agreement that eased matters considerably, but did not include a decision or agreement on Kashmir. The sudden death of Shastri, from a heart attack, an hour or two after signing the new agreement, brought a lull, and the election of another Premier, Mrs. Firoze Gandhi, nee Indira Nehru, daughter of Jawahir Lall Nehru. No definite agreement on the Kashmir issue was reached at Tashkent discussion. The Kashmir issue between India and Pakistan is still pending.

Important Towns in West Pakistan: (1969 population estimates shown). Karachi, (3,060,000); Lahore, (1,823,000); HYDERABAD, (434,000); Rawalpindi, (455,000); Multan, (225,000); Peshawar, (213,000); Lyallpur, (over 100,000); Sialkot, (over 100,000); QUETTA, (about 70,000); Murree (a Hill station in the Himalayas).

Methodism in Pakistan Prior to Partition. Methodist work began in Karachi in 1874 when a regiment of British troops had responded to the preaching of WILLIAM TAYLOR, later bishop to Africa. The regiment came to Karachi with summers in Quetta. D. O. Fox was the missionary sent to begin the organized work. The first church building was erected in Karachi for the English speaking group in 1874. Within a couple of years there was also an Indian congregation formed. A church building was also erected in Quetta. These two places were outposts of the BOMBAY CONFERENCE for almost fifty years, until the formation of the INDUS RIVER CONFERENCE in 1923.

The first Methodist congregation in Lahore was organized in 1881 by JAMES SHAW, and the first church building erected in 1883. The work in the Indian group was separated in 1886. The congregations continued, growing slowly until 1904. The North India Mass Movement quickened the work in and around Lahore, led by J. B. Thomas, then J. C. BUTCHER, followed by others. Miss Lily D. Greene was the first representative of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (M.E. Church, U.S.A.), to come to Lahore; she arrived in 1912. A primary school and hostel for boys had already been started, and Miss Greene soon got a primary school and hostel started for girls. The Urdu-speaking congregation had grown considerably and now grew more rapidly. Indian preachers and district workers were increasing rapidly in numbers, and local groups were organized in several towns. The boys' school was moved to Raiwind, twenty-five miles from Lahore, in 1922.

In 1922 the Indus River Conference was organized. It included from the BOMBAY CONFERENCE, Karachi and Quetta. From the NORTHWEST INDIA CONFERENCE, Lahore and Multan, together with other districts which in 1950, after partition since they were in India, joined the DELHI CONFERENCE. The Indus River Conference represented Methodism in all of West Pakistan.

The increasing numbers of poor people of the village coming into the Methodist Church in large numbers, and the need for securing land for many of them to settle made matters increasingly acute. The Government was then building an elaborate and intricate canal system to develop agriculture in the Punjab. CLYDE B. STUNTZ in 1924 was able to get permission for 200 Christian families to purchase land to settle on. A Christian village was formed, its official name being Chak No. 135/16/L. The grateful community gave it the name STUNTZABAD. Many other Christian families managed to secure land in neighboring villages, making possible the development of a fine rural church, composed of people who had come from a poor community, and had been unable to have schools to which their children could go.

Methodism Since Partition. Partition split the Indus River Conference, confining the conference to Pakistan. The leadership of the conference went with those on the India side. New leaders were needed in Pakistan. The conference that remained in Pakistan consisted of twenty-seven members of whom three were missionaries; one Pakistani member who had completed high school, eighteen Pakistani members who had not completed high school, and five retired Pakistani preachers. All Pakistani members had been through the seminary. The number of Methodists was a little over 25,000.

The latest figures show the number of Methodists to be 56,000. The conference members number fifty-five, of whom ten are missionaries; of the Pakistani members, eight are graduates; nineteen have passed high school; seventeen have not passed the high school; one is retired. All but two of the Pakistani members are seminary trained; both of the untrained are graduates.

New leaders have come to the front. There are nine districts in the area, all having Pakistani district superintendents. There are four high schools at work and one more expected to be fully accredited soon, making a total of five, two of whom are for boys, two for girls and one co-educational. Each high school has a qualified Pakistani principal, the two for girls having lady principals. Missionaries are helpers and associates, engaged in special work organizing new types of service.

Expansion of Work and Development of Conferences: The distance between Lahore and Karachi by train is 755 miles. Thirty-five miles from Lahore are considered Methodist fields; then a gap of 115 miles is served by other churches, followed by 120 miles more of Methodist field; another gap of work for other churches then comes and the last one hundred miles to Karachi are also in the Methodist field. These long distances made the work of conference committees expensive and time-consuming. The need for a separate conference to take care of Karachi and Quetta became evident. Up to 1954 the main effort had been in the Punjab section which included Lahore and Multan. The importance of Karachi as the first capital led to a strengthening of the Methodist force there.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1956 gave authorization for the necessary establishment of the Karachi Provisional Annual Conference which was duly organized in 1959. The General Conference of 1960 authorized the creation of the Provisional Central Conference of the Methodist Church in Pakistan, since membership in the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF SOUTHERN ASIA had become unwise. Episcopal leadership had been provided, first when the Indus River Conference was included in the Delhi Area, with J. WASKOM PICKETT as resident bishop until May 1952; then for four years as part of the Lucknow area, with CLEMENT D. ROCKEY as resident bishop. In November, 1956, the Central Conference of Southern Asia retired Clement Rockey who had reached the age of retirement. On the request of the Indus River Conference, approved by the COLLEGE OF BISHOPS of the Central Conference in India, he was given authorization by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of The Methodist Church to serve in Pakistan until the end of September 1964. By action of the Council of Bishops in Pittsburgh in 1964 the retiring bishop of South East Asia Central Conference, was authorized to take over. Thus on Oct. 1, 1964, retired Bishop HOBART B. AMSTUTZ served as bishop in Pakistan.

Centers of Methodist Work in Pakistan. Partition provided Pakistan with a good nucleus of workers and institutions in The Methodist Church. Expansion into new centers of work, and opening of new institutions, as well as further development of existing institutions, have resulted in the following: Lahore, Lucie Harrison Girls High School (800); Stuntzabad, high school (600), and ten primary schools; Quetta, primary school, Bethel Church; Karachi, Drigh Road Church, Drigh Road High School (over 600),

The Trinity Girl's High School of the Methodist Church (234), The Methodist Primary School (301).

Churches in Pakistan have found it helpful and stimulating to work together to meet the needs of the developing country. The West Pakistan Christian Council was speedily organized, and has grown steadily in efficiency thus producing better relations between the denominations at work in the country: Anglicans, Presbyterians (of four different branches), Methodists, Salvation Army, and Pakistan Lutherans. Headquarters are in Lahore. The W.P.C.C., as it is called, selects fields for new groups to work in Pakistan, and provides for the exchange of new ideas, also for organizing institutions of comity, smoothing out denominational differences, enforcing rules for comity, and for providing an agency to approach government when necessary.

Institutions in which Methodists are cooperating: Lahore: United Christian Hospital, Forman Christian College, Kinnaird College for Women, Kinnaird Teacher Training Center. Gujranwala: Theological Seminary—one Methodist missionary on staff; two Pakistani students in each year's class, training for the Methodist ministry; United Bible Training Center for Village Workers—for Christian women workers and the wives of seminary students; Boys Industrial School—for Technological Education; Christian Adult Literacy Center.

The Central Conference of Pakistan in 1968 on the first and only ballot for bishop elected John Victor Samuel. Mrs. Shirin Samuel, his wife, is capable and well qualified to help him provide able leadership for Methodism in Pakistan.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, PAKISTAN

In 1968 trouble in the Gujranwala Theological Seminary broke out. Methodism cooperates in the Seminary, providing staff and sending students, as other denominations also do. Staff members from other participating denominations, continued in teaching their classes. A few other Pakistani members of the United Presbyterian Church tried to control the Seminary. Failing to secure help as they wanted they applied to Dr. Carl McIntyre in America to provide finances and join in the effort to get village churches of rural groups, of any denomination, to join them. Dr. McIntyre gave money to enable weak rural churches to receive enough to pay their pastors three times as much as they had been getting. Very few of the rural ministers of other churches accepted the money and stayed with their congregations. The rebellious group continued to try to occupy their quarters and hold classes in the seminary buildings. The struggle to control continues. The classes of students of the main group and their teachers from other churches continue to receive their preparation for the ministry.

United Church Formed in Pakistan. In 1970 an epochal event for Protestantism came about in Pakistan by the formal consummation of church union and the birth of a new 200,000 member church in that land on November 1-3. The cooperative work of the different denominations in Pakistan has been described in previous paragraphs, but through historic ceremonies held in Lahore, the Pakistan United Methodist Central Conference, the Anglican Church of Pakistan, the Pakistani Lutheran Church, and the United Church of Pakistan became a united body. The new church encompasses both East and West Pakistan. Bishop John Victor Samuel took a prominent part in leading 60,000 United Methodists into this union.

The new Church was organized into five dioceses—four in Western Pakistan, each known by the name of its headquarters: Lahore, Multan, Sialkot, Karachi. Efforts at the time of this writing are being made to organize the northwestern part of the Lahore diocese into another diocese. Bishop Samuel became the chosen head of the Multan diocese.

CLEMENT D. ROCKEY

PALMER, EVERETT WALTER (1906-1971), American bishop, was born in Menomonie, Wis., on Jan. 25, 1906, the son of John Stephen and May (Sanders) Palmer. From DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, he received the B.A. degree in 1932, the D.D. in 1952; he was a part-time graduate student at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1935-39, where he received his B.D. degree in 1935; a graduate student at Oxford (England) University, summer of 1950; received the degree of S.T.D. from the UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND in 1961; also a LL.D. degree from MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE, in 1963.

On June 30, 1927, he married Florence Ruth Wales, and they had three daughters, Joanne (Mrs. Clifford C.

EVERETT W. PALMER

Cate), Elizabeth (Mrs. A. Ross Cash), and Ruth (Mrs. John P. McKean).

Everett W. Palmer preached his first sermon on Nov. 15, 1929, and from 1929-30 was pastor in Artesian, S. D. He was admitted on trial at the DAKOTA ANNUAL CONFERENCE (ME) in October 1930; ordained a deacon at Atlantic City, N. J., on Oct. 1, 1934; elder at Asbury Park, N. J., Sept. 22, 1935. His pastorates include: Artesian and Farwell, S. D., 1929-32; Silverton Circuit, N. J., 1933-34; Trinity Church, Highland Park, N. J., 1934-42; Centenary Tabernacle, Camden, N. J., 1942-46; First Church, Asbury Park, N. J., 1946-51; First Church, Glendale, Calif., 1951-60. He was elected bishop July 13, 1960 at the WESTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, and assigned to the newly created Seattle Area.

As a member of the GENERAL BOARD OF EDUCATION, he was chairman of its Department of Ministerial Education; vice-president of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs; and chairman of its Committee on Promotion and Interpretation of Ecumenical Affairs; he served also as a member of the Commission on Structure on Methodism Overseas; of the Commission on Interjurisdictional Relations; and was chairman of the 1966 Urban Life Convocation; also he was on the executive committee of the Methodist Educational Foundation. He was president of Pacific Homes Corporation, 1953-60.

Bishop Palmer was a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, of the Assembly of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and was a Methodist delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Uppsala, 1968.

He received the "Star of Africa: Grand Band," LIBERIA'S highest decoration presented to a citizen of another country. Presentation was made by President W. V. S. Tubman, president of the Republic of Liberia.

His books include: Spiritual Life Through Witnessing (Tidings Press), 1955; You Can Have a New Life (Abingdon), 1959; There is An Answer (Abingdon), 1962; and

The Glorious Imperative (Abingdon), 1967. He delivered the Jarrell Lectures at EMORY UNIVERSITY at the CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY (Atlanta, Georgia), in 1967. He travelled widely in carrying out various church-wide responsibilities including an episcopal visitation to South Asia in 1963; to Africa in 1967.

He served as resident bishop of the Seattle Area, including WASHINGTON State and Northern Idaho until his death in Palm Springs, Calif., on Jan. 5, 1971, of an apparent heart attack.

PALMER, FLORENCE (1904-), was a missionary in the GUJARAT ANNUAL CONFERENCE, 1930-59. In 1960, she became secretary for INDIA, Nepal, and PAKISTAN and in the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS in New York. In 1965 she returned to India and retired in 1968.

Miss Palmer was born in Carthage, Ill., April 8, 1904. She holds a B.A. degree from Carthage College, and has studied in Garrett Biblical Institute and SCARBITT COLLEGE. In India she was an effective evangelist and district administrator of primary schools. With the advantage of four years of secretarial service in the Board of Missions added to her previous fruitful experience, she assisted the church in India in a fruitful study of women's leadership training.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

PALMER, PHEBE (1807-1874), American lay evangelist and exponent of Christian holiness, was born in New York City, Dec. 18, 1807, the child of Henry Worrall and Dorethea Wade.

Her father was born in Yorkshire, England. As a boy of fourteen, he heard JOHN WESLEY preach, was convinced of the truth of his preaching, and soon became a member of Society, receiving a ticket certifying his membership from the hand of Mr. Wesley. About the age of twenty-five, Mr. Worrall came to America and settled in New York City. After some spiritual struggle, he became a member of the M. E. Church, as had his wife before him. Phebe was their fourth child. In later years, Phebe expressed gratitude for the influence Christian parents and a Christian home had upon her life. She was converted at an early age. In spite of this experience she seemed not to have been completely satisfied with her religious experience or the depth of her spiritual life.

Phebe married WALTER C. PALMER, a New York City physician, on Sept. 28, 1827. Their life together was happy. They shared many common interests—and none more than their desire to promote spiritual holiness. Both were greatly influenced by a revival which took place in the Allen Street Methodist Church in 1832.

In subsequent years, Phebe gave birth to, and lost, several children—one tragically. She, herself, passed through a critical illness and was convinced that her life had been miraculously spared. All of these experiences, along with her spiritual hunger, led her to search for further light and understanding. On July 26, 1837, she had an experience, following much inner spiritual wrestling, which convinced her that she had experienced perfect love and had been sanctified.

Her home soon became a meeting place for a group of women who had been meeting regularly for prayer for a number of years. These meetings gradually grew in numbers and importance until they attracted ministers and laymen from all corners of the world. In later years, when Dr. and Mrs. Palmer were away on evangelistic tours, the meetings went on in their home in their absence and even after Mrs. Palmer's death.

Mrs. Palmer quickly became the leader of this group and an outstanding leader in the holiness movement both in and outside of Methodism, in this country and abroad. She was invited to speak at many church conferences, assemblies, camp meetings, and other gatherings. With her husband, she conducted meetings in Great Britain and Ireland over a four year period. She wrote a number of books, many of which were published by her husband. Among them are: The Way of Holiness, 1850; Pioneer Experiences, 1868; Some Accounts of the Recent Revival in the North of England and Glasgow, 1859; and Four Years in the Old World, 1866 (with Dr. Palmer).

Excerpts from her letters and writings, published in The Life and Letters of Mrs. Palmer by Richard Wheatley, indicate that her interest in, and exposition of, holiness were not irrational or out of keeping with scriptural teaching. She may have been caught up in the tides of revivalism and perfectionism which dominated much of the religious life of the early nineteenth century in America. Yet her desire to love God with all her heart and mind and soul and strength was not divorced from her desire to love and serve her fellowman.

Mrs. Palmer took her stand against slavery; she worked for the liberation of women in the church and in society; she saw that just wages must be paid to domestic help; she recognized that a Christian must be a good and interested and active citizen; she opposed the liquor traffic and its degrading effects upon human life and the community.

Mrs. Palmer had her detractors and opponents. Yet the number and names of bishops and ministers who supported and encouraged her efforts read like a Who's Who of Methodism during the years of her lifetime. There can be no question but that her influence was great upon the people who were touched by her life. Indeed, she was one of the moving spirits in one of the important theological and doctrinal crusades of the nineteenth century.

Mrs. Palmer died Nov. 2, 1874.

C. WESLEY CHRISTMAN, JR.

PALMER, WALTER C. (1804-1883), American physician and lay evangelist, was born in NEW JERSEY on Feb. 6, 1804. After graduating from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City, he engaged successfully in the practice of medicine in that city. He was converted at an early age and joined the Methodist Church.

On Sept. 28, 1827, he married Phebe Worrall. They lived happily together for nearly fifty years. During many of these years, Palmer supported and encouraged his wife in furthering the teaching of scriptural holiness. Through most of their married life meetings, devoted to this cause, were held in their home on Tuesday afternoons. These meetings were exceedingly popular and became models for similar meetings held around the country.

Dr. and Mrs. Palmer were members of the Allen Street

Methodist Church in New York City and faithfully supported the work there. They later transferred their membership to the Norfolk Street Church in New York City because they felt their help was needed there to strengthen the work. This desire to help undergird the Christian cause motivated all of their living.

Palmer accompanied his wife on many of her evangelistic tours, both in this country, Canada and Europe. One of their most extensive tours through Great Britain and Ireland lasted for four years. They gave an account of their experiences on this tour in their book Four Years in the Old World.

For thirty-seven years, Palmer edited and published the Guide to Holiness, a magazine devoted to advancing the cause of holiness. In 1870, the magazine had over 30,000 subscribers. Palmer published many of the books written by his wife to explain and further the cause to which they were both devoted.

He was a man of wide sympathies and deep religious conviction. He was thoroughly committed to the advancement of the spiritual life as this was understood and practiced by the holiness advocates of the nineteenth century—especially within the Methodist Church.

Palmer's full and useful life came to a close at Ocean Grove, N. J. He died there on July 20, 1883.

C. WESLEY CHRISTMAN, JR.

PALMORE, WILLIAM BEVERLY (1844-1914), for twenty-four years was Editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, the organ of the three annual conferences of the M.E. Church, South, in MISSOURI. He was born in Fayette County, Tenn., and as an infant was taken to Missouri by his recently widowed mother to a farm near Malta Bend. There he grew up and received an elementary education. At the onset of the Civil War, he enlisted in the Confederate Army of General Sterling Price, and served in General John S. Marmaduke's Brigade throughout the war. At war's end he operated a general store in Waverly.

Palmore was deeply religious. He was active in the Waverly church as a Sunday school teacher. In this exercise he felt and responded to a call to the ministry. To prepare for this vocation he entered VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. Upon his return to Missouri he joined the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE. He quickly came to leadership, recognized for his intelligence and ability in "the practical affairs" of the Church as well as for his forceful preaching.

In 1887 Palmore was appointed financial agent of Central College For Women, Lexington, to raise a debt of $16,000. This he did in one year's time. His attachment to the college became permanent and was expressed by his many benefactions; particularly, while Editor of the Advocate, by raising $10,000 to endow a scholarship to aid the daughters of ministers and other "worthy girls."

While serving Walnut Street Church, KANSAS CITY (1890), he was elected assistant editor of the Advocate to relieve the drain upon the strength of aged Editor MCANALLY. Upon the latter's death in 1892, Palmore was elected Editor and Manager.

His personal financial resources, and his bachelorhood, enabled him to publish the Advocate at a small annual profit; to travel frequently to foreign mission stations throughout the world; and to give generously toward the education of young women. His gifts made possible the establishment of Palmore Institute, Kobe, JAPAN, and Colegio Palmore, Chihuahua, MEXICO.

Palmore often declared that he was led and guided by the Holy Spirit; that none of the changes and events in his life were of his planning. Perhaps the most startling instance he cited was fracturing his wrist by a fall upon the station platform as he was about to board the "boat train" to take passage on the Titanic. The delay enforced by the doctor caused him to miss the boat.

It was his editorial policy to cover events in social, political and economic affairs, local, state and national, in the perspective of the Christian religion. Articles and reports of missionary endeavors reflected his deep personal interest. He was notably successful in securing a wide coverage of local church news, often by attending district meetings and by preaching in local churches. He pushed the circulation of the Advocate to more than 20,000, with a large readership outside the state.

Palmore held moderate views on most of the contemporary social and economic issues, and was often a leader in reform movements in the state. But he was a steady and unintimidated foe of the "liquor traffic," the advocate of complete prohibition of all alcoholic beverages. He wrote many anti-tobacco articles. His articles on these subjects were generally without the smooth and polished style seen in his writings on other subjects. He wasted no fine rhetoric on them.

FRANK C. TUCKER

PALMYRA MANIFESTO, THE, is a 1,000-word document issued at Palmyra, Mo., in June, 1865, by ministers and laymen of the M.E. Church, South.

ANDREW MONROE, "the pioneer and patriarch of MISSOURI Methodism," called the meeting in Palmyra. Aware that the MISSOURI CONFERENCE (ME), meeting in St. Joseph in March 1865, had invited the Missouri Conference (MES) to unite with it, and mindful that many people north and south believed that the Church South, which had been closely identified with the Confederacy and which had suffered great losses during the war, would disintegrate when the conflict ended, Monroe felt that all should know that the M.E. Church, South was determined to carry on as an independent ecclesiastical body. Significantly his invitation said the purpose of the Palmyra meeting would be to ascertain the condition of the church and to consider means of advancing its welfare.

Twenty-four preachers and about half as many laymen convened at Palmyra in response to Monroe's call. Bishop HUBBARD H. KAVANAUGH of KENTUCKY, the only southern bishop who spent much time outside the Confederate lines during the war, arrived on the second day, and his presence inspired the group. Out of the meeting came the manifesto which declared that the M.E. Church, South claimed original paternity and coexistence as a Methodist Church with the other branches of the Methodist family, that the differences between the two episcopal Methodisms had not been swept away in the war, that the Church North was trying to gain by strategy what it failed to get by military order during the war, and that the Church South was determined to carry on as a separate and distinct ecclesiastical organization, while at the same time cultivating fraternal relations with other church bodies.

Quickly circulated over the South by both the religious and the secular press, the Palmyra Manifesto had an exhilarating effect on ministers and members alike in the region. Some said it was like life from the dead. The manifesto prompted the bishops of the M.E. Church, South, meeting at Columbus, Ga., in August 1865, to issue a pastoral address that was a trumpet call to action; it proclaimed that the M.E. Church, South still survived and that it would go forward with determination. The bishops called for a GENERAL CONFERENCE to meet in New Orleans the next year. That gathering, influenced directly and indirectly by the spirit of the Palmyra Manifesto, proved to be one of the most significant and forward looking General Conferences in the history of American Methodism.

PALO ALTO, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., population 55,413 (1970), about thirty miles southeast of SAN FRANCISCO on the Southern Pacific Railroad, was incorporated in 1894. The population more than doubled from 1950 to 1960. It was named Palo Alto (Spanish for tall tree), and is a residential city for Leland Stanford wished to have a residential community near Stanford University campus. It is a shopping center for some 160,000 people.

Methodist meetings in Palo Alto were held in the homes of pioneers by Wilbur W. Thoburn (a close friend of David Starr Jordan, first president of Stanford University), pastor of Mayfield Methodist Church, 1891-92. First Methodist Church was started as a mission church with twenty-four charter members by M. H. Alexander on Jan. 14, 1894. The site of First Church, on which three buildings have been erected, was assessed at $51. In 1896, despite the 1893 Panic, First Church erected a white-painted redwood church, with oil-skin windows and wood-burnings stoves costing $3,200 (the other two buildings were constructed in 1914 and 1963 on the original lot).

For the development of Palo Alto Methodism in a more complete way, see the accounts following of First Church, Aldersgate, St. Andrews, and Wesley. In addition to these, it should be added that the University A.M.E. Zion Church was established in 1918. Their present building was erected and dedicated in 1965 at a cost of $135,000.

Aldersgate Church has had three names (Japanese Methodist, Page Mill Methodist, Aldersgate Methodist) and eight locations.

In November, 1909, young Japanese immigrants felt the need of Christian faith and fellowship and ten of them organized in Palo Alto a Japanese Methodist Mission group in 1909, under the leadership of the superintendent, H. B. JOHNSON, and Katahide Yoshioka, pastor of the church in San Jose. Stanford students and a few Japanese families organized a mission church in 1911 in the basement of G. Lkazawa's boarding house. Early part-time pastors were Atsuiji Komuro and Otoi So.

In April 1940, a new $10,000 church building was completed and dedicated. Gifts included $1,500 from the Board of Home Missions, $2,500 from the Caucasian community and $6,000 from the Japanese community.

Church membership was thirty in 1933.

During World War II, all persons of Japanese descent were evacuated from the West Coast and placed in ten Relocation Centers, Palo Alto Japanese being removed to Harte Mountain, Wyo. During this trying period following 1942 Mr. and Mrs. Alon H. Wheeler, Sunday school teachers, kindly cared for their church and belongings until 1945. The church re-opened that fall. To help returned Japanese further at this time the Palo Alto Fair Play Committee was organized.

In 1950 the membership rose to seventy-four. The first full-time pastor, Sadao Masuko, was appointed in 1952 and served two years. In 1960 church membership was 171 and church school 162. The church was self-supporting in 1962.

Traffic and parking problems made it imperative that the church relocate and build new quarters. The congregation bought a three-acre site on Manuela Avenue. Groundbreaking took place on May 3, 1964. The new church, Aldersgate, was consecrated by Bishop DONALD HARVEY TIPPETT on Aug. 15, 1965.

THE JAPANESE PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE was dissolved May 15, 1964, and the thirty-one Japanese Methodist churches joined the various geographical Conferences, the Aldersgate Church joining the CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE. Since 1945 the Aldersgate Church has been a bi-lingual church. Membership in 1970 was 251, and 170 students attended church school. The hillside setting of the new sanctuary, facing mountain rim sunsets, adds to the beauty of the Japanese architecture for these Japanese-American Christians.

First Church, whose new $1,350,000 modern-Gothic church with dramatic stained glass windows is often called the "West Coast Cathedral of Methodism," has 2,472 members and continues leading the California-Nevada Methodist Conference in benevolences.

This pioneer church was during the ministry of J. F. JENNESS, 1901-03, the final home church for Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR. Its lamp-lighted pulpit was sometimes filled on Sunday nights by Stanford University's famed president, David Starr Jordan.

Just before the 1906 earthquake and fire swept San Francisco, and did damage locally, the church gained its first parsonage when Rev. H. E. Milnes was pastor, 1903-06. During the pastorate of Carl Melvin Warner the out-grown wooden church was moved across the street for temporary use until the second place of worship, the $36,000 white stucco church with belfry was completed. The financial struggle for this building was climaxed by Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES' three-hour fund rally and the church dedication before 900 people.

Layman fund drives under the ministry of R. MARVIN STUART during and following the second World War netted a $22,000 parsonage, a $55,000 sanctuary remodeling and the great cathedral church for the rapidly growing membership.

The church's physical plant today includes a small chapel and 14,000-square foot basement for the Edward D. Kohlstedt Memorial Hall, the Stuart Youth Center and choir, and church school rooms. Dedication day was June 2, 1963. This new building has been called a space-age decision to build a great "downtown church" at a time when other denominations were moving out into suburban neighborhoods. A future membership of 4,000 was then projected by this largest church of the Methodist California-Nevada Conference.

FIRST CHURCH, PALO ALTO, CALIFORNIA

GERALD KENNEDY was pastor in 1940-42, and awakened the congregation to needs in a growing and changing Palo Alto as this city was on the threshold of becoming the major western center of university and industrial laboratories for electronics, genetics, medical and aerospace research.

During and following World War II, Church school attendance doubled and re-doubled several times. "Family Night" was proved feasible for even a big congregation and the original Fireside Fellowship evolved into seven fellowships. In addition to organized fund raising, zealous laymen learned a way of raising the annual operational budget on one "Loyalty Sunday." Retreats for yearly planning and summer church camp were important developments.

Music, with noted choir directors over the years, has been significant at this church, which has the unique Merritt C. Speidel Memorial Organ (two co-ordinated organs).

There are eight Circles of the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE and the WESLEYAN SERVICE GUILD. The Men's Club and the Commission on Missions have sponsored eight refugee families (Latvian, Polish, German, Chinese and Dutch-Indonesian) in new homes and jobs in Palo Alto.

University A.M.E. Zion Church began in 1918 when a small group of Palo Alto residents met in the home of Mrs. Melvina McCaw at 330 Cowper Street. Their desire for a church home led to the establishment that year of the A.M.E. Zion Church Mission directed by J. W. Byers. Early meetings were held at Fraternity and Ostranger Halls on University Avenue. The little Christian flock with its eight original trustees was served by E. P. Bond its first minister.

By the fall of 1923 the twenty-two-member congregation, under the guidance of L. W. McCoy and Elder Byers, raised $1,254 for the church fund. Ground was broken for the $6,000 church on March 10, 1924, and in April 1925 the building, seating 200 worshippers, was dedicated. Church membership had increased to thirty-eight and average attendance was seventy-five.

The indebtedness through the Depression years of the 1930's was serious, but community efforts rescued the congregation from its distress. The church was helped by L. Offenbizer and Alexander Miller, associated with Stanford University, Dallas E. Wood, First Church layman, Oscar M. Green of All Saints Episcopal Church, Gerda Isenberg, president of the Palo Alto Fair Play Council, R. Marvin Stuart, pastor of First Church, authoress Kathleen Norris, and others.

The parsonage, an organ and a next door rental income property were acquired in 1945 when J. O. Hart was minister. By 1963 church membership had increased to 100 families and the congregation purchased the present site at 3549 Middlefield Road. The Ramona Street building was sold with final services held there on the Sunday of Aug. 9, 1964, prior to occupancy of the modern new $135,000 church which was dedicated in 1965.

Wesley Church. Earliest Methodism of the San Francisco Peninsula seems to have rooted this church, according to fragmentary records and yellowed newspaper files. The eleven-saloon town of Mayfield sprouted from the cattle trail and stage coach route long before Stanford University or Palo Alto were even anticipated. Yet there proved to be some few determined Methodists in the rough little Mayfield of the 1870's. The Alley-Bowen History of 1881 notes that a Methodist Episcopal Church was built in 1872, and a local paper refers to a Ladies' Aid Society of Mayfield Methodist Church in 1893.

By 1904 trustees of the Mayfield Methodist Church decided to tear down their old building at second and Sherman and build a new church and parsonage on lots in Evergreen Park. A white-painted wooden belfry church was completed the following May.

Since the pastorate of Thomas Bateman in 1924, the name Mayfield Community Church had designated this as the one Protestant church of the Town of Mayfield (South Palo Alto after 1925). In mid-summer 1941, the church trustees changed the name to College Avenue Church. Bishop JAMES C. BAKER was present for the church rededication on Nov. 22, 1942, following a $2,500 renovation of the building.

In 1959 First Church of Palo Alto gave a $30,000 debt-free adjacent building site to the College Avenue Church—soon to have its name changed to Wesley Church. The new $120,000 sanctuary and hall were dedicated in 1959.

CHARLES PAMLA

PAMLA, CHARLES (1834-1917), was one of the first four Africans ordained to the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in SOUTH AFRICA and the first African superintendent minister. His father, who belonged to a royal house in Natal, fled to Gcalekaland during the Shaka Wars and later migrated to the Peddie district. He was given the name Pamla—"a person of no fixed abode"—by the Gcaleka chief Hintsa. Charles was converted at an early age and accepted for the ministry in 1866. Almost immediately he became interpreter to Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR, accompanying him through the native territories and learning much by precept and example. In 1867 he was enrolled in the first class at the Theological College, HEALDTOWN, and in 1871 he was ordained. Pamla's most significant ministry was at Etembeni (1890-1909) where he built up the membership from 300 to 5,000 and survived several attempts upon his life. He subsequently served as connexional evangelist, giving special attention to the preparation of laymen for evangelistic work. It is estimated that he was instrumental in 25,000 conversions.

He was an active preacher until the day of his death on June 24, 1917.

PANAMA, a republic occupying the 400-mile long S shaped isthmus connecting South America with Central and North America, is a charter member of the United Nations. Panama City is the capital. Exclusive of the Canal Zone, Panama's area is 28,753 square miles; and the population (1969 estimate) is 1,417,000.

As in many other regions, Methodism in Panama is much older than Methodist missionary work. According to tradition, a Methodist called Mother Abel landed at Bocas del Toro between 1815 and 1821, with some English settlers. She gathered Colombian fisherfolk for worship, taught them Methodist hymns, and preached salvation by faith.

Methodist missionary work began in March 1877, when WILLIAM TAYLOR (later bishop) went there. He encountered a number of Negroes who had migrated from Jamaica, some of whom were members of the British Wesleyan Methodist Church. They had no pastor in Panama. On returning home Taylor appointed Charles W. Birdsall to Panama, and he departed in November 1878. Birdsall succumbed to malaria in four months. E. L. Latham followed him, remaining long enough to organize a Methodist Society and erect a combined chapel, school and parsonage at Panama City. In 1881 Richard Copp went to Colón, effectively developing the work in both cities for about ten years.

Meanwhile Methodists in Jamaica were becoming interested in their Negro members who had emigrated to Panama. In 1884 the British Wesleyan Methodist missionary, Thomas Geddes, spent four months in Panama. He was followed by other missionaries and agents of the newly autonomous West Indian Conference, including his son, Alexander W. Geddes, who worked in Panama from 1887 to 1902.

Two Panamanians were called to the Methodist ministry during this period: Edward A. Pitt, who became the first Methodist worker in COSTA RICA, and Clifford M. Surgeon, who returned to Panama in 1913.

American Methodist work, which had lapsed since the end of Copp's ministry in Panama, was renewed when, in 1903, Panama became independent, and the United States took over the Canal. The republic decreed the separation of Church and State, so that neutrality between religious groups was implied by the constitution. A conference on Protestant missions was held in Panama in 1916. Two years later, a mission to the Valiente Amerindians was begun by EPHRAIM S. ALPHONSE. Surgeon and Alphonse reduced the Valiente language to writing, and Alphonse became the first national chairman of the Central American sub-District.

In January 1967, Panama and Costa Rica became a full district, under its West Indian chairman Felmin B. Cockburn. Later in the same year, it became a founder district of the autonomous METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND AMERICAS. The district has a community of about 2,000. It has one secondary school in Colón, with 114 students. The district's youth work is reaching out into Spanish-speaking homes as well as the West Indian families who form the majority of the Church's members.

In early 1969 in the general reorganization of American-related Methodism in South America, several of the annual conferences became autonomous churches each to have its own bishop. The Central American Provisional Annual Conference was given this right, and FEDERICO PAGURA was accordingly elected bishop, and assigned to the Costa Rica and Panama area to be the President of the Provisional Conference there.

COLON CHURCH, PANAMA

The American United Methodist Church has congregations in Panama City, Colón and Cristóbal. The Panamanian Institute enrolls 1,500 students. A rural work center, in David, capital of Chiriquí Province. At Armuelles, a banana port on the Pacific coast, the United Fruit Company gave land for a chapel. Membership is around 600 with a much larger community.

Traditionally, American-related Methodism has worked mainly among Spanish-speaking Panamanians, and British-related Methodism with Negroes of Jamaican descent, and with the Valiente. The work of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas is now largely self-supporting, apart from the Valiente work which is a mission. The MCCA and the Central American Provisional Annual Conference have co-operative ministries, especially in Colón.

PANGGABEAN, WISMAR (1904-), head of the autonomous Methodist Church in INDONESIA, was born in Simasom, Pahae, Sumatra, Indonesia, March 15, 1904. His parents were first generation Christians and sent their son to the Mission School in the village. When he was sixteen years old he was called to become "help-teacher" in a small school. Two years later the Methodist Church asked him to go to Singkawan, BORNEO, to teach Indonesian in a Chinese school. From 1923 to 1927 he was a student in the Methodist Training School in Bogor, Java. After graduation he was appointed to do pioneer work among the jungle-dwelling Bataks in Asahan, Sumatra. His Annual Conference elected him for further training in 1941 and sent him to the Batak Seminary in Tarutung. On account of the war his ordination had to wait until 1949, when he was ordained deacon one day and elder the next. He served some large churches, became district superintendent in 1950, and also served as treasurer of the Home Missionary Society, Conference Treasurer, and later principal of the large Methodist School in Medan. His Church sent him as delegate to a number of Ecumenical Conferences such as The Prapat Conference and The Indonesian Council of Churches. When the political situation in Indonesia called for an Indonesian assistant to the bishop, Panggabean was appointed to that position, and when, in 1964, the Methodist Church of Indonesia became autonomous, he was elected their first Ketua (Bishop), to which position he was re-elected in March 1967.

PAPUA, comprising the southeastern part of the island of NEW GUINEA and certain nearby islands, was annexed by Queensland, AUSTRALIA, in 1883 and by the British Crown in 1888. It came under the control of the Australian Commonwealth in 1901 and became the Territory of Papua in 1906. JAPAN invaded Papua in early 1942, but in December of that year Australian control was restored. It is presently considered Australian territory and United Nations territory. The dependency is about 90,540 square miles and a population in Papua itself of 620,000.

The London Missionary Society commenced operations in the Port Moresby district of Papua in 1871. After Australian Government administration began the policy of demarcation of missionary areas in Papua, Methodists took responsibility for the islands to the south-east of the mainland (D'Entrecasteaux, Trobriand, Louisiade groups) together with a small district at the tip of the mainland known as East Cape.

In 1891 Methodist missionaries entered this area, with GEORGE BROWN the inspiration here as elsewhere. The leader was W. E. BROMILOW, previously a missionary in Fiji. Patient in his dealings with primitive people, equally gifted in administration and translating Bromilow served in this malarial district for twenty-one years.

One of the chief difficulties was travelling through the islands over long ocean distances and through reef-strewn seas; because of the narrow entrances only small craft could be used.

The homogeneity and the tribal structure that mark Polynesian people (e.g. in TONGA and SAMOA) had no counterpart in Papua or in New Britain and adjacent islands. The people differed widely in language and lacking either chiefs or a sense of nationhood.

The first Missionary Sisters came from Australia to Papua to found an orphanage and care for babies who would otherwise have been buried alive with their dead mothers, according to native custom.

Bromilow's successor was M. K. Gilmour, boat-builder and preacher who served for thirty-three years. In his term medical work was established in this district where there had previously been no doctor for 40,000 inhabitants.

During World War II the authorities ordered the evacuation of the missionaries from these exposed islands. The mission was left to the faithful care of South Sea Islands workers.

Since the war evangelistic, educational and medical work have made marked progress, enabling the district to take a worthy place in the United Church of Papua, New Guinea and the SOLOMON ISLANDS.

PARADISE, JOHN (1783-1833), American portrait artist, was born Oct. 24, 1783 in Hunterdon County, N. J., and died in September 1833, near Springfield, N. Y. Though modern critics regard him as an artist of limited talents, his drawings were correct in detail and he was popular as a portraitist of Methodist preachers of his day, his attachment to Methodism being further evidenced by naming his artist son, John Wesley Paradise.

John Paradise worked in PHILADELPHIA from 1803 until 1810 when he moved to NEW YORK, where he became a member of the National Academy of Design upon its organization in 1826. The History Society of New York owns his portrait of Henry Ten Brook. Other evidences of his art are held widely and many family portraits are believed to be unidentified as his work.

John Paradise painted an oil on canvas of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY during the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1812 in New York at the home of Mrs. Anne Grice (1760-1839), daughter of John Hammond, prominent Methodist at Annapolis. Bishop Asbury and HENRY BOEHM were her guests at the time. That portrait is believed to be the one for which the Board of Missions in 1844 paid John Paradise's widow $20, raised by private subscription. It now is on exhibition at the United Methodist Publishing House offices, in Nashville, Tenn.

LELAND D. CASE

PARAGUAY is an inland republic of South America. One of the smallest countries on the continent, Paraguay has an area of 157,000 square miles and a population of 2,303,000 (1969). It has extensive but undeveloped natural resources, and the economy is based upon farming and grazing.

Homeland of the Guarani Indians, the region along the Paraguay River received its first Spanish settlers in 1535. It became a part of the Spanish Empire in South America, until it gained independence in 1811. The Roman Catholic Church is established, but under law other religions are tolerated. The estimated Protestant community of 11,000 (1961) is considerably less than one percent of the population—as small a percentage as any country of Latin America except ECUADOR.

The first Methodist workers—and in fact the first Protestant ministers—to visit Paraguay were a Scotsman who came in from ARGENTINA, ANDREW M. MILNE, and a Uruguayan, Juan Correa, who were traveling together as colporteurs of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY and made a tour in Paraguay in 1881. Paraguay was visited again by Methodists in 1884, and in 1886, CHARLES W. DREES, superintendent of the South American Mission in BUENOS AIRES, Argentina, appointed a local preacher, Juan Villanueva, to establish a Paraguay Circuit. Because of anti-Protestant feeling, he was warned of the danger of assassins, but he proceeded boldly, making regular visits to Asuncion, Paraguari, and German colonies of Altos and San Bernardino. He was the only Protestant pastor in Paraguay. A girls' school was established in Asuncion, with Juana Villanueva as teacher. By 1891 the school enrolled more than 100 pupils. A boys' school was established in 1892 by Antonio Bandres.

When the South America Annual Conference was organized in 1893, there was a Paraguay District. Contacts during the first years were mainly with the European population, for none of the missionaries had learned the Guarani language, then spoken by most of the Paraguayan people. In 1894 and 1895, efforts to reach poor Paraguayan people in Asuncion and some small towns in the interior met with moderate success.

Following the Panama Congress of Protestant workers in Latin America (1916), comity agreements were signed between various mission boards in the United States. Under one of these agreements, the M.E. Church withdrew from Paraguay, leaving its work to the Disciples of Christ. The Disciples now have an important school, Colegio Internacional, in Asuncion.

The FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF NORTH AMERICA entered Paraguay in 1946. BYRON S. LAMSON, secretary of the General Missionary Board, visited Asuncion and purchased five acres and buildings that had been used previously as an orphanage by a nondenominational mission group. The Rev. and Mrs. HAROLD H. RYCKMAN were appointed, arriving in Asuncion in July of that year.

The orphanage building was remodeled for a Bible training school, which was operated for several years but then closed. A clinic was established in 1956 and carried on for ten years by Elizabeth A. Reynolds. The 1965 annual report listed two stations, ten outstations and five organized churches. They were organized as a provisional conference.

Colonies of Japanese have settled in newly opened agricultural regions. The Free Methodist Mission in BRAZIL, which has work among Japanese colonists there, has sent Minoru Tsukamoto to direct work among the Japanese in Paraguay.

In the summer of 1966, crusades sponsored by young people from the United States and CANADA were held in the Asuncion area. Two new churches have recently been opened here. Gospel distribution and cooperative evangelistic activity are recent developments. This still remains a provisional conference. Church growth has been slow.

PARIS, JOHN (1809-1883), distinguished M.P. minister and author, was the son of Henry and Mary Paris and was born in Orange County, N. C., on Sept. 1, 1809. He taught school for several years near Mount Hermon Church, Orange Circuit, of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH and at Mount Hermon Church in 1832 Paris was converted and decided to enter the ministry. In November of 1843 he was received into the North Carolina Conference and assigned to the Roanoke Circuit.

At the meeting of the Annual Conference in 1848, Paris was authorized to complete a history of the M.P. Church in North Carolina begun by WILLIAM BELLAMY, who had died in 1843. This history, a valuable record of the reform movement among the Methodists in North Carolina during the 1820's, was published in BALTIMORE in 1849. For several years, Paris was not assigned a pastorate in order that he might devote his entire time to writing. In addition to his History, Paris wrote several books, and the magazine, Our Living and Our Dead, carried a series of chapters in 1875 written by Paris entitled "History of the War by an Army Chaplain," based on his experiences during the Civil War. At the age of fifty-two he volunteered and served the Confederate Army for four years as a chaplain.

Paris served many M.P. churches in North Carolina. He was President of the North Carolina Conference of the M.P. Church in 1879 and 1880.

John Paris married first a daughter of William Bellamy of Edgecombe County, N. C., and on Dec. 19, 1849, he married Maria Yancey of Mecklenburg County, Va. He died near Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va., on Oct. 6, 1883, and was buried at Fairview Cemetery, LaGrange, N. C.

The three-volume diary which Paris kept during the Civil War is preserved in the Southern Historical Collection at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

PARIS, PERCY REGINALD (1882-1942), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister, was born in DUNEDIN, and at the age of twenty-one became a candidate for the ministry, and entered PRINCE ALBERT COLLEGE for training. He began his ministry at Otaki in 1906 and served in a total of nine circuits.

His ministry was marked by a deep concern to increase the beauty and significance of public worship, and by a passionate interest in social questions. Often the center of controversy because of his pacifist convictions and liberal political views, Percy Paris was none the less universally respected for his utter integrity, the graciousness of his personality and the warmth of his preaching. He was president of Conference in 1938, and was for ten years editor of the New Zealand Methodist Times.

He collapsed while conducting evening worship in Wesley Church, WELLINGTON, on Palm Sunday, March 29, 1942, during the seventh year of his ministry there, and died almost immediately.

PARK, WILLIAM HECTOR (1858-1927), American medical missionary to CHINA, was born in Catoosa County, Ga., on Oct. 27, 1858. He was educated at Emory College, Georgia, graduating in the class of 1880. He studied medicine at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, but the Mission Board of the M.E. Church, South, had him go to New York for further study in Bellevue Medical College, and he took further work at Edinburgh, Scotland. He went to Soochow in 1882 and in the following year, 1883, he and WALTER R. LAMBUTH established the Soochow Hospital, which Park continued to serve nearly forty-five years. Besides the hospital work, he and Dr. Margaret Polk trained many young men and women to become successful doctors.

He compiled the book Opinions of Over One Hundred Physicians on the Use of Opium in China. This was published by the Anti-Opium League in Shanghai, China, by the American Presbyterian Mission Press in 1899. When the book was presented in the British House of Commons, it helped to stop the British opium trade in China. It had been made possible by funds raised by missionaries and business men as well as certain wealthy Chinese friends.

Park was married to Nora Kate Lambuth, sister of Bishop Lambuth, who worked along with her husband, and was especially active in the Anti-Foot Binding Association. They had one daughter, Mrs Dwight Lamar Sheretz, the wife of a missionary to China and, within recent years, to RHODESIA. Park died in FLORIDA in 1927, but his ashes were taken back to Soochow for burial, and his wife, who died in Soochow in 1949, is buried beside him in the same cemetery.

FRANCIS P. JONES

PARK RIDGE, ILLINOIS, U.S.A., First Church well merits the tribute, "Church Undaunted." Actual construction of the first edifice began in 1857, only to be halted shortly afterward when a national money panic interfered with payment of subscriptions. A portion of the basement had been completed, however. Here the struggling congregation worshipped until the summer of 1859. Despite difficulties the pioneers did not lose sight of their goal. In October 1859 the first church was completed and dedicated at a cost of $6,000.

For a period of forty-two years, membership averaged fifty-one persons, not reaching 100 until 1912. During the same period the church had twenty-nine different pastors. The years between 1917 and 1936 saw remarkable improvement in the church's fortunes. Park Ridge grew; so did the church membership.

When it became evident in 1917 that a new church building was necessary, plans were made for a new edifice. After several years of discussion, committee meetings and attention to a volume of detail, work on the new church was ordered to proceed. A gift of $20,000 from F. C. Jorgeson was an important assist. Estimated cost of the new building was $120,000, of which it was necessary to borrow $60,000. Dedicatory services were Sunday, April 12, 1925, with Bishop E. H. HUGHES preaching the sermon. By 1947 a debt of $65,000 was liquidated.

The last twenty years mark an amazing growth in the church both in membership and property. Adult attendance soared; so did Sunday school membership.

New and enlarged facilities for the church school became necessary. Committees promptly made preparations. The building project was completed in 1952 at a cost of $250,000 and was consecrated Sept. 21, 1952.

In recent years a third floor was added to the church school.

Now the church officers and congregation have authorized a remodeling program to cost approximately $225,000, providing for a new chancel, new choir loft, new organ console, new offices and social quarters. Thus from a modest membership of fifty-one in the early days, the church has grown to 2,377 members and a property valuation of $1,044,000.

EDWARD D. AKERS

PARKER, ALBERT AUSTIN (1871-1949), was a missionary to INDIA from 1904 to his retirement in 1936. He was associated helpfully with the recruitment and training of ministers throughout his missionary career. He was first an instructor, and then principal of the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology at Baroda, and from 1928 was principal of the Leonard Theological College, Jabalpur. Between service in those institutions he gave dynamic leadership to the Council of Christian Education in all its varied service to the church and the nation. He was a forceful preacher, and many young people decided to accept Christ as Lord and Saviour as a result of listening to A. A. Parker's sermons. His presentation of the need for the preaching of the Gospel and of the sacred nature of the ministerial calling added significantly both to the number of candidates for the ministry, and to the Christian concern and purpose with which they asked for ministerial training.

He was born in Hamilton, Iowa, Jan. 27, 1871, and was educated at SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE, Winfield, Kansas. He married Luetta Oldham of Wichita in 1896, and joined the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE in 1897. He was pastor of St. Paul's Church, Wichita when he responded to the call for missionaries in India. Mrs. Parker shared in all his labors, and in his happy years of retirement. Parker died in LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA, July 6, 1949, and Mrs. Parker in the same city several years later.

PARKER, CHARLES EDWARD (1872-1933), American missionary to INDIA, became a fervent evangelist and perhaps the foremost minister of God in the "Mass Movement" that made possible the HYDERABAD and SOUTH INDIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. He was born in Robeson County, N. C., on Feb. 13, 1872. His father died when he was a small boy.

Because of the poverty of the family, he rarely went to school more than two months in any year. He worked hard on a hilly farm, and at the age of nineteen he was converted, and determined to get an education. By home study he managed to learn enough to obtain entrance to the local high school. He was inspired by the example of two NORTH CAROLINA men who had obtained college education after reaching adult life although they were barely able to read when they started.

In his first year in high school he worked on the farm from daylight until nine or ten o'clock, then went to his first class. He studied during recess, while others played. When he had learned enough to teach in a primary school, he took a county examination and received a license to teach. He taught for eighteen months, and then entered Trinity College—from which DUKE UNIVERSITY later developed. Sometimes he fasted because he had nothing to eat. Eventually he graduated from Trinity College and DREW SEMINARY, and in 1901 was appointed to India.

In 1911 he became superintendent of Hyderabad District. In 1904, he married Sarah R. Turner of Braddock, Pa., then a missionary of the M.E. Church in Gujarat.

At his funeral, all creeds and castes were represented. His selfless service had convinced multitudes that he had fellowship with God, and many had come to Christian faith and experience, drawn by his influence.

E. W. PARKER

PARKER, EDWIN WALLACE (1833-1901), was elected missionary bishop for Southern Asia by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in May 1900. He never presided as bishop over an Annual Conference. Until September 15 of that year he remained in the United States for a heavy schedule of preaching appointments and discussions with mission board secretaries. He was not well when he arrived in BOMBAY by ship on October 16, and there encountered a succession of problems.

He was warmly welcomed in his home at Shahjahanpur in LUCKNOW, which was to be his official residence, and also in every center he visited, but his health steadily worsened. On New Year's Day 1901, he arranged for Bishop F. W. WARNE to take charge of his conferences. He died on June 30 in Naini Tal, and is buried in the Kaladungi Cemetery near many other pioneer missionaries of Methodism in INDIA.

Parker was born in St. Johnsbury, Vt., Jan. 21, 1833. He was of old Yankee stock, his Scotch-Irish ancestors having arrived in MASSACHUSETTS early in the eighteenth century. His father was a farmer, and he worked full-time on the farm during most of his boyhood, never going to school more than three months in any year, until after his twentieth birthday, he entered Newbury Seminary. In the previous year he had been converted, and almost immediately felt that he must "preach the Gospel of the Son of God." Until then his ambition had been to become a farmer. In prayer in the woods one day a deeper experience came to him, and he began to sense that God wished him to become a missionary. He fearfully told his fiancée, Lois Lee, of this growing conviction, and she replied that from childhood she had felt that she might be a missionary. They were married in 1856.

In 1857, he accepted a pastoral charge at Lunenburg, Vt., and he and Mrs. Parker both taught school. The next year, they learned that the BOARD of MISSIONS wanted six married couples to go to India and they asked if they might go. Friends tried to dissuade them, but in December 1858, the appointment came; and early in March of 1859 they left Vermont for India. They arrived in Lucknow with three other couples and a single man, JAMES M. THOBURN, on Sept. 3, 1859.

Their first appointment was to Bijoor. Parker baptized his first convert, Guy Dayal, in June 1860. He was one of the first missionaries to contact the Mazhabi Sikhs, and of him it is said in the Minutes of the India Mission Conference, "No other missionary worked harder or longer for their uplift." His biographer, JAMES H. MESSMORE, says: "His capacity for work was exceptional. . . . He possessed the gift of leadership."

Throughout his forty-two years in North India, Parker was near the center of planning and direction for Methodist action. His counsel was invariably sought on all major projects, not only in his own church but in other, and in such interchurch activities as the British and Foreign Bible Society, the North India Book and Tract Society, and the United Missionary Conferences.

After Bishop Parker's death—he was sixty-seven when elected bishop—Mrs. Parker decided to continue to live in India. She was greatly honored and loved by Indian Christians and respected by people of all creeds, castes and races. She was a forceful public speaker with a strong voice that could be heard to the most distant corner of every assembly.

PARKER, FITZGERALD SALE (1863-1936), American pastor, presiding elder, editor, was born in Caddo Parish, La., March 16, 1863, the son of Bishop LINUS PARKER and Ellen Katherine (Burruss) Parker. Educated at University High School and University of Louisiana (now Tulane), NEW ORLEANS, La., he studied at the New England Conservatory of Music one year, not earning a degree. CENTENARY COLLEGE of Louisiana conferred upon him the D.D. degree in 1903. He was converted and joined the Felicity Street Methodist Church (New Orleans) about 1874, then entered the hardware business and for a time was clerk in the British and American Mortgage Company of New Orleans. Answering then the call to the ministry, he was admitted into the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE in January 1886.

His appointments were: Carrollton Avenue and Parker's Chapel, New Orleans, 1886-87; Santa Ana, Calif., one year; Trinity Church, EL PASO, TEXAS, 1889. Then again in LOUISIANA he served New Iberia, 1890-93; Dryades Street,

New Orleans, 1894-96; Lake Providence, 1897-98; Jackson, 1899; presiding elder, BATON ROUGE District, 1890-91; and Crowley, 1902-03. He went with the EPWORTH LEAGUE Board (MES) at Nashville, Tenn., in 1904, becoming the Board's General Secretary in 1910. Here he lived and worked until his death. He was secretary of the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE for twenty years, 1900-20.

Parker's pre-eminent and outstanding work was unquestionably his leadership of young people through the Epworth League. He was General Secretary for twenty years, 1910-30, and editor of the Epworth Era. Under him the League chapters practically trebled. After the merger of the Epworth League with the Board of Education in 1930, he remained editorial writer for the Board of Education, and for the BOOK EDITOR's office from 1930 until his death in 1936.

He was also a member of the BOARD of MISSIONS of his Church for twenty-four years, 1906-30; a representative of the Board of Missions for a time in the Orient; one of the trustees of Mansfield Female College in Louisiana; and a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1906 and 1914.

Parker rendered notable service to the life and worship of the Church on the Joint Hymnal Commissions in 1905 and 1935. JOHN W. LANGDALE of the M.E. Church said of him: "He was easily the most spiritual member of the Joint Hymnal Commission . . . To have come to know him, is one of the rich rewards of the hymnal association."

On April 17, 1901, Parker married Lucy Irwin Paxton of Vicksburg, Miss., and they had two sons, Fitzgerald, Jr., and William Paxton. He died in Nashville on July 21, 1936.

JESSE A. EARL

PARKER, FRANKLIN NUTTING (1867-1954), American pastor, theologian and influential teacher of ministerial students and ministers, was born in NEW ORLEANS, La., on May 20, 1867. He was the son of Bishop LINUS PARKER and Ellen Katherine Burruss Parker.

Franklin Parker attended CENTENARY COLLEGE of LOUISIANA (then at Jackson) in 1883-1884. Then he was a student at Tulane University in 1885. He never received an earned degree, but was the recipient of honorary degrees from Centenary College, and Trinity College (later DUKE UNIVERSITY in North Carolina). He married Minnie Greeves Jones of BATON ROUGE on Dec. 20, 1899, just as he concluded his tenure as a presiding elder on the Baton Rouge District, and on his move to be the pastor of Carondelet Street in New Orleans. To them were born two daughters, Mrs. Nell P. Stipe, and Mrs. Margaret P. Winn, both of ATLANTA.

Franklin N. Parker, although he greatly revered his father, made no profession of faith until he was seventeen years old. Then he joined the church under S. Holsey Werlein on Jan. 25, 1885, in the old Felicity Street Church in New Orleans. He was licensed to preach on May 11, 1885. His father, who had been elected a bishop in 1882, died between the time Frank Parker joined the church and the granting of his license to preach. He was admitted on trial in the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE on Jan. 6, 1886; ordained a deacon by Bishop KEY at Shreveport in 1888; an elder by Bishop DUNCAN in 1889.

After serving two or three small appointments, he was sent to Carrollton Avenue, New Orleans in 1888; then to Rayne Memorial, New Orleans, 1892-1895. He was then appointed to Baton Rouge, 1896-1898; to Carondelet Street, 1899-1901; put upon the Baton Rouge District 1902-1903; and from thence he served in Monroe as pastor, then presiding elder of the Crawley District for a year, and then was sent to take over the New Orleans District, which he served 1906-1909. In 1910 he was appointed to Alexandria, La., but left there in 1911 to become the Professor of Biblical Literature at Trinity College in Durham, N. C. There he taught for three years. In 1914 he was sought by Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER to come to the newly founded CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at EMORY UNIVERSITY, where he was to remain the rest of his life. He occupied the chair of Systematic Theology from 1915 to 1918, and then became Dean of the School in 1919. In that capacity he served for eighteen years until in 1938, when he became Dean Emeritus. He continued teaching, however, until 1952.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, seven times, usually leading the LOUISIANA delegation. In 1918 at the General Conference in Atlanta, he was elected bishop, but refused the election explaining that he did this "solely on the ground that he deemed himself not qualified to serve in the office to which he had been elected." His refusal to accept the episcopacy was not always understood, though his unimpeachable sincerity carried conviction with it.

Parker did his greatest work as a teacher in the School of Theology at Emory. Though not having a formally earned theological degree, he could nevertheless take a leading place in theological circles because of his own wide reading and study and great competence in that which underlies all theology, namely a spiritual understanding of God, and of sure and orthodox Christian teaching.

In his later years Parker's pupils contributed $100,000 to endow a chair of theology at the Candler School of Theology and named it for Franklin N. Parker. One of his contributions as a member of the 1930 General Conference (MES) was to serve on the sub-committee which provided for the retirement of a bishop automatically at, or near, seventy years of age. Parker's formulation of the resolution in this regard was accepted by the larger committee, and voted by the General Conference, and thus became a law in the Southern Church.

He died in the home which his wife had planned and which they both took pleasure in building in Atlanta. Mrs. Parker predeceased him by some few years. Parker himself died on March 1, 1954, his funeral being held in the Durham Chapel of the School of Theology.

PARKER, GEORGE DANIEL (1872-1958), American missionary in BRAZIL, was born in NEW ORLEANS, LA., on Aug. 17, 1872, and graduated from CENTENARY COLLEGE, then in Jackson, La. Though his mother was a Roman Catholic, George became a Methodist, but no information is available as to his ministerial training.

He went to Brazil in November 1901. His first appointment was to work in RIO DE JANEIRO. Later, he transferred to the Rio Grande do Sul Conference. On Feb. 10, 1908, during his first furlough in the United States, he married Ada Stewart, who had been seven years in Brazil as a missionary and who had proven herself a consecrated missionary. During a calamitous epidemic of yellow-fever in Ribeirão, Preto, she had left the classroom for the hospital rooms, earning among Brazilians the title of "angel."

Parker served as pastor, presiding elder, agent for the publishing house, and president of Colegio União, now the Instituto, in URUGUAIANA, Rio Grande do Sul. Wherever he went, he left fine churches and parsonages. Perhaps his greatest work was in helping educate several girls to become teachers for Methodist schools, and in influencing five or six young men to enter the ministry, one of these being JOAO AMARAL, who in time became a bishop. Failing eyesight forced his retirement to JACKSONVILLE, FLA., where he died on Feb. 13, 1958, and was buried there. In memory of his wife who had died on July 12, 1948, he left a substantial bequest for the Gloria Church in PORTO ALEGRE.

LINUS PARKER

PARKER, LINUS (1829-1885), American editor and bishop, was born on a farm near Vienna, Oneida County, N. Y., April 23, 1829, the son of devout Methodists, John and Alvira (Wadham) Parker. From six to sixteen he attended school six months each year and became an avid reader. Later he studied three months at Mandeville College, NEW ORLEANS. CENTENARY COLLEGE (Louisiana) awarded him the D.D. degree.

In 1845, young Parker went to New Orleans and worked in a store operated by an older brother. In 1846, he enlisted and served as a soldier in the Mexican War. Soon afterward he began the study of law, but his pastor, HOLLAND N. MCTYEIRE, later bishop, and Richard Deering, the presiding elder in New Orleans, guided him toward the ministry. In March 1849, he began to supply Good Hope Chapel in Algiers, and two months later he abandoned the study of law and was licensed to preach. The following December he joined the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, and was ordained DEACON in 1851 and ELDER in 1853. He rose rapidly, going to SHREVEPORT, the strongest church in the conference outside New Orleans, at twenty-one, and to Carondelet Street Church, the ranking congregation in LOUISIANA Methodism, at twenty-six. His appointments, all in Louisiana, were: Lake Providence, 1849; Shreveport, 1850-51; Felicity Street, New Orleans, 1852-54; Carondelet Street, 1855-57; New Orleans District, 1858; Felicity Street, 1859-61; Shreveport, 1862-63; Caddo Circuit (because of the war), 1864-65; Felicity Street, 1866-69; New Orleans District and editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, 1870-73; and editor, 1874-81.

On June 7, 1853, Parker married Sallie F. Sale who died of yellow fever three months later, September 13. His second marriage, Jan. 20, 1858, was to Ellen K. Buruss. They had three sons, John B., Fitzgerald S., and Franklin N. The latter two joined the Louisiana Conference and became distinguished leaders in the church, the one as editor of the Epworth Era and the other as dean of Candler School of Theology.

As a young preacher, Parker was greatly interested in the New Orleans Christian Advocate which was established in 1851. Encouraged by McTyre, the editor, he began contributing articles which showed marked journalistic ability. Later as editor of the paper, he was widely recognized as an able religious journalist. He wrote rapidly, easily, and with little need for revision or emendation. His polished, limpid style won him fame and made him known throughout the connection and beyond. As time passed his friends felt that he did his best and most lasting work with his pen.

Though born and reared in the North, Parker became southern in his viewpoint and sympathies. After the Civil War he agreed that slavery was evil and that it had to go. However, he believed that out of the sordid traffic had come good to the Negro and to Africa in that it brought both into contact with Christian civilization.

Parker was a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1866, '74, '78, and '82, and the latter elevated him to the episcopacy. For two years he gave episcopal supervision to the TEXAS conferences, and then was assigned to the conferences in MISSOURI, MISSISSIPPI, NORTH CAROLINA, and MARYLAND. He died rather suddenly in New Orleans, apparently of a cerebral hemorrhage, March 5, 1885, and was buried there.

PARKER, RICHARD JOSEPH (1878-1960), an American missionary to CUBA, was born Feb. 14, 1878. He was married to Lottie Lee Barnes Dec. 21, 1904. They had five children. In 1908 he was accepted as a missionary to Cuba where he served efficiently as pastor and district superintendent for fourteen years. Because of health reasons he retired from Cuba in 1922 and for a number of years was superintendent of Latin work in FLORIDA. His last work was assistant pastor of Hyde Park Church, TAMPA, Fla. His evangelistic spirit characterized his work wherever he went, even when retired. In Cuba it was common for him to search out the cane workers and hold services for them when they would be resting in the fields at noon.

GARFIELD EVANS

PARKER, SAMUEL (1774-1819), American preacher, was born in NEW JERSEY about 1774 and became a member of the Methodist Church when he was fourteen years old.

In 1800 he received his license as a local preacher and in 1805 became a travelling preacher. In 1809 he received ELDER's orders and was appointed to serve as the first presiding elder in the Indiana district. He continued in this appointment for four years, at which time the district was divided. In 1813 he rode the Deer Creek circuit, in 1814 was appointed presiding elder of the Miami District, and in 1815 the presiding elder of the KENTUCKY District. He was then sent to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, where on Dec. 20, 1819, he died. His funeral sermon was preached on the Sunday following his death at WASHINGTON, Miss., by WILLIAM WINANS who had earlier preached at Vincennes, Ind.

ROBERT S. CHAFEE

PARKER, WHITE (1887-1956), American Indian minister, was born Oct. 20, 1887 near Cache, Okla., son of the famous Quannah Parker, last of the great chiefs of the Comanche Indians. He attended Cook Christian Training School in PHOENIX, Ariz. He was admitted on trial in the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE in 1934, and served in some of the leading appointments of the INDIAN MISSION. He married Laura Esther Clark, daughter of M. A. Clark, early missionary among the Comanches. He was killed in an automobile accident on March 2, 1956, while returning home from the annual Indian Mission Pastors' School. He was a man of commanding appearance and gentle demeanor, greatly loved by those he served.

PARKERSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A., a city of about 43,000 in 1970, is located at the confluence of the Little Kanawha and Ohio Rivers. The Methodists were the first denomination to enter the region and later they were the first to build a church in Parkersburg. In 1790, Jacob Lurton and Thomas Boyd, Methodist circuit riders, were appointed to the Kanawha Circuit which included the region in which Parkersburg is located. It is believed that the first church in the area was built of logs near Fort Neal. The fort itself was erected in 1785 near the confluence of the rivers. Sometime before 1817, the Methodists constructed a brick church on Avery Street in Parkersburg, and the building was used as a school during the week.

In 1832, J. H. Power and B. L. Jefferson were appointed to the Parkersburg Circuit; it was the first time the name of the town which was chartered in 1820 appeared in the OHIO CONFERENCE minutes. The next year the circuit reported 812 members. In 1836 Parkersburg became a station, and in 1837 it reported 162 members. At that time a new church was built opposite the city hall. Asbury Academy, with Gordon Battelle as principal, flourished in Parkersburg, 1840-43.

In 1845, the church in Parkersburg, which had reported 207 white and nine colored members in 1844, cast a majority vote for adhering South, and the M.E. Church, South retained control of the building. A wealthy citizen gave lumber to the members who desired to adhere North, and in fourteen days they built a frame church on Fifth Street. The next year the new church reported 100 white and ten colored members, while in 1846 the congregation which adhered South had 129 white and no colored members.

In 1857, the trustees of the M.E. congregation in Parkersburg brought suit and recovered the building from the Southern Methodists. In 1862 the structure was torn down and a new and larger church was erected. That edifice was destroyed by fire in 1873, and another was built. The present First Church building was completed in 1911 when there were 642 members. Before and after the division of 1845, First Church had some distinguished pastors, such as PETER CARTWRIGHT, ASA SHINN, JACOB YOUNG, H. B. BASCOM (later bishop), and T. B. Hughes who was the father of Bishops E. H. and M. S. HUGHES. John L. Wolfe, who was reared in Parkersburg, served as pastor eighteen years, 1945-63.

After losing the church property in 1857, the Southern Methodist congregation worshipped for a time in the City Building. In 1858 the body, which then had 225 members, bought a lot at Seventh and Market Streets and at a cost of $10,000 erected the largest church building up to that time in Parkersburg. For nearly half a century thereafter it was the strongest congregation in the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES). In 1895 the building was sold and a new one, thereafter known as St. Paul's Church, was erected on Market and Eleventh Streets. Six of St. Paul's pastors were, or became, college presidents, and one of the six was elected bishop. They were U. V. W. DARLINGTON, R. T. Webb, Paul S. Powell, W. B. Campbell, T. S. Wolfe, and Roy McCuskey. The latter had previously been a minister in the M.E. Church. Darlington (later bishop) had two pastorates at St. Paul's, and he also led in building the Johnson Memorial Church in Huntington.

In 1900, First Church had 494 members to 421 for St. Paul's. At unification in 1939 the figures were 839 and 766, the difference being exactly seventy-three members in both years. In 1939 the M.E. Church had eight churches and 4,085 members in Parkersburg to five congregations and 2,073 members for the M.E. Church, South.

In 1872 the West Virginia Conference of the M.P. Church started a mission in Parkersburg with Benjamin Stout in charge. He conducted a revival in an abandoned schoolhouse near Lynn Street, and on Christmas Day organized a congregation of twenty-two members. They bought the schoolhouse and fitted it up as a place of worship. Within four years the church had 100 members. In the next three decades, Bethany Church, as it was called, experienced financial difficulties, but it carried on. In 1936 it reported 236 members and property valued at $27,000. It came into The Methodist Church at unification in 1939.

In 1970, there were fifteen United Methodist churches in Parkersburg proper, three of them being former E.U.B. congregations with an aggregate membership of 2,002. The fifteen churches had a combined membership of 7,949 and property valued at approximately $5,130,000, and they raised for all purposes during the year about $428,000.

PARKS, WILLIAM J. (1799-1873), pioneer American preacher, was born in Franklin County, Ga., on Nov. 30, 1799. He was the son of Henry Parks, one of the first converts to Methodism in GEORGIA. Reared in the backwoods, unpolished, and with skin as dark as an Indian's, he was licensed to preach under the venerable ISAAC SMITH on the Athens District, Georgia. In 1822, Parks was admitted on trial into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE which then served Georgia. Few men have left behind them such an impressive record of long and varied service to the Methodist Church. He was a missionary two years, presiding elder fourteen years, four years on a station, ten years agent of church institutions, and twelve years on circuits, a total of forty-two years of effective service.

Parks was elected a member of all GENERAL CONFERENCES of undivided Methodism from 1832 to 1844. He was elected to the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION in 1845, but was unable to attend. After the formation of the M.E. Church, South, Parks was chosen for every General Conference from 1846 to 1870, but he was not able to attend in 1846 and 1870. In 1836 he became a member of the first board of trustees of WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE at Macon, Ga.

Parks was married three times. He was widely loved and became affectionately known as Uncle Billy. He helped officiate at the funeral of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW in Oxford, Ga., in 1871. On Dec. 16, 1873, Parks died at Oxford, Ga., just a few days before the meeting of the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE.

PARLIN, CHARLES COOLIDGE (1898-), American lawyer, financier, and a president of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, was born on July 22, 1898, in Wausau Wis., the son of Charles Coolidge and Daisy (Blackwood) Parlin. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, received the LL.B. degree at Harvard in 1922, and has subsequently been the recipient of many honorary degrees. He served as a private first-class in the U. S. Army in the first World War. He was admitted to the New York Bar in 1923, and has since practiced law in NEW YORK CITY. He is the director of numerous corporations. He married Miriam Boyd on Oct. 11, 1924, and their children are Charles Coolidge, II, Camilla, and Blackwood Boyd.

Parlin was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1940, '44, '48, '52, '56, '60, '64, '68, and '70. In 1944 he led the debate presenting a minority report from the Committee on the state of the Church calling for prayer for victory in the war then raging, which was against the majority report of that Committee presented by ERNEST F. TITTLE, its chairman. This great debate featured that General Conference, the minority report being substituted for the majority by a close vote in a vote by orders.

Parlin has served on the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL (was president, 1970-71); was the secretary of the COMMISSION ON CHURCH UNION, 1948-64; chairman of the Committee to Study Jurisdictional System, 1956-60; chairman of the Committee on Interjurisdiction Relations, 1960-64; on the Ad Hoc Committee on the Union with the E.U.B. Church in 1964, at which General Conference at its adjourned session in 1966 he presented the report of the Committee calling for union. He has been a member of the General Board of NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since 1950, and the first vice president from 1958-61. He was chairman of the committee in the U.S.A. which raised the money for the founding of the World Council of Churches; attended the founding Amsterdam Assembly in 1948 and the succeeding Assemblies of 1954, 1961 and 1968; was a member of the Finance Committee, 1948-68; of the Central Committee 1954-58; and of the Presidium 1961-68. He was honored in October 1969 at the Citation Dinner of The Upper Room receiving on this occasion its annual award. He was especially honored at the General Conference of The United Methodist Church in St. Louis in 1970 by a testimonial dinner attended by almost all the conference.

PARR, WILLIAM DAVID (1855-1918), American minister, was born near Jolietville, Ind., Nov. 10, 1855. He was admitted on trial in the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1878. He was pastor of several churches and was elected four times to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1896, 1900, 1904 and 1908. He was active in civic and business affairs and became widely known as the "dedicator of new churches," being extremely efficient in raising money on the day of dedication. It is said that he dedicated more churches than any other Methodist minister during his lifetime. He married Cora Walton on Jan. 11, 1883. He died at Kokomo, Ind., Aug. 12, 1918.

PARRAMATTA, New South Wales, Australia, was the second place of importance in the Colony when SAMUEL LEIGH visited it in 1815. Religious services were first held in the Government schoolroom. One of his converts was James Watsford, whose son, JOHN WATSFORD, became a notable missionary to Fiji.

WALTER LAWRY who had arrived from England in 1818 to become Leigh's colleague, may be regarded as the father of Methodism in Parramatta. He became the first minister there when it became a separate circuit in 1820. A chapel was opened on Good Friday, 1821, on a site granted by Governor Macquarie. When a new church was built by DANIEL DRAPER in 1839, this chapel was incorporated as the vestry. On the day of the opening of the church, the foundation stone of the Centenary Church at North Parramatta was laid. The present church, known as Leigh Memorial, was opened in 1887.

Several strong circuits have been formed from the original Parramatta Circuit which is now the head of a connexional district and the center of active church enterprises.

PARRISH, JOSEPH LAMBERSON (1806-1895), American Indian missionary, U. S. Indian Agent, and leader in Christian education in the Pacific Northwest. Joseph L. Parrish heard the call to the Indian mission in OREGON in 1839. As JASON LEE, the mission superintendent, had filled his quota of ministers, Parrish, a conference member, reverted to his early trade and went to Oregon as the "mission blacksmith." He went with the mission reinforcement which had made the long voyage around Cape Horn, reaching Oregon in 1840.

After two years as blacksmith working at the main mission station, located in the Willamette Valley, Parrish was given charge of his own station to work among the coast Indians. After the close of the Indian mission in 1846, Parrish worked as a preacher among the white settlers, first as a lay preacher and later as a conference member in full connection.

From 1849 to 1854 he was a government Indian agent during the years the government was seeking to establish the Indians of the Pacific Northwest upon reservations. Among the Indian tribes, with whom he worked as missionary or Indian agent, he was known as "The Man of Peace." It was the kind of peace which resulted from great courage and faith that his own purposes were in harmony with God's will.

Parrish was keenly interested in public affairs and during his early years in Oregon he joined the other settlers in establishing the Provisional Government of Oregon which was to be the only government the settlers had until the United States established the Oregon territorial government in 1846.

In 1854 he was again a missionary to the Indians, this time being appointed by the OREGON CONFERENCE, but ill health forced his retirement in 1856.

His home, when he could be there, had been for many years on his Donation Land Claim in what is now Salem, Ore. In his retirement years he served for sixteen years as the volunteer chaplain of the state prison. These very active retirement years permitted him to perform his greatest service to Methodism. He had been a member of the original board of trustees of the Oregon Institute (1840) which was chartered as WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY in 1853, and is the oldest university of the Pacific Northwest. He was continuously a member of the board until his death in 1895. For twenty-six years, he gave courageous leadership to the little band of men who struggled and succeeded, in keeping their Christian university a living institution despite the poverty of the pioneer community. Upon his death, his fellow trustees inscribed upon their official minutes, "He has been a continuing and constant factor in the planting, nurturing and rebuilding of Willamette University, faithful in service, loyal in purpose, and helpful in executing, his name goes into history as the friend of Willamette University."

PARSONAGES, a term that originally came from the rentals, or amount due to the parson (from "person") in England, and then came to mean specifically his house, was the name brought over early into American Methodism to represent the dwelling place of the preacher. Parsonages were never mentioned in the records of the earliest years after the organization of the M.E. Church in America, since most of the preachers were unmarried, and all of them moved so continually that the matter of a permanent dwelling place—as is needed for an extended pastorate—was not an issue. However, by the time of the General Conference of 1800, the question of renting or building houses for the preachers came under discussion, and that Conference recommended that the friends or people of any congregation purchase a lot of ground in each circuit, and build a house upon it for the preacher and furnish it with at least “heavy furniture.” By 1816, a provision relating to the duty of the presiding elders concerning parsonages was added to the above provision. The part that the stewards or trustees should play in this was put in by the General Conference of 1828. By this time the ministry, while still itinerant and moving as frequently as every two years, was becoming “settled” enough to need a house in which the pastor and family could live while he was upon that special appointment.

In time the need of such a house was seen everywhere, and it became the duty, and eventually the pride of each quarterly conference to see that a parsonage was provided for their preacher. Sometimes such houses were furnished, quite often they were not—a condition that lasted through the better part of the nineteenth century. Eventually parsonages as well as the local churches were covered by the Trust Clause as directed by the Discipline in order to insure the unchallenged occupancy of the minister when properly appointed to each special charge.

The present Discipline—and the disciplines of most Methodist churches—has quite a few regulations having to do with parsonages and their care. In time special regulations have had to be drawn up for seeing that the equities in a particular parsonage, which is jointly owned by several churches on a circuit, shall be secured to each such church if they are put upon other circuits, or made into a station. The number of parsonages and their value must be reported at each session of the Annual Conference, and made a part of the General Minutes of that body. Present day parsonages are commodious and well equipped homes, and some of them vie with the better homes in any community.

FIRST CHURCH, PASADENA, CALIFORNIA

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. First Church, was established in 1874 in a city now of 111,826 on the west coast and noted for wealth and culture. For several years, including the current one, it has been among the top two or three churches of the nation in benevolence giving.

In 1875 at its beginning the church took a lead in ecumenicity—an unknown word then—in the form of union services with the Presbyterians, as the two denominations met jointly in the school house with the Methodist and Presbyterian ministers preaching on alternate Sundays. In 1888, when the church's parking space for horses and buggies proved to be inadequate, the church paid $10 a month to a neighboring rancher to allow members to park their buggies in his orange grove and tie their horses to the orange trees. By 1890 more churches were needed in the Pasadena area, and First Church took the lead in establishing them.

All seven churches in Pasadena today received all or part of their initial support from First Church. The present Lincoln Avenue Church was built by First Church in 1898 at a cost of $13,000, and First Church made its investment secure by transferring 200 of its members to the new congregation. In 1924 First Church gave to the Methodists on the east side of the city the beautiful stone church building it had outgrown. Then its members raised $25,000 to help them buy a lot, and assisted them in numbering and moving the stones one by one to the new location, so that the building could be reconstructed just as it had been. The Holliston Avenue Church still stands in that location today, the second largest Methodist Church in the Pasadena area.

The present First Church building was erected in 1924, and is an impressive Gothic structure with a sanctuary seating 2,000. It provides a setting for the preaching and outstanding music for which the church has become known on the west coast. Among the preachers whose ministry has brought distinction to the Pasadena pulpit have been MATTHEW S. HUGHES (later a bishop), Merle Smith, Albert Day, Harold Case and Morgan Edwards. At one time so many retired Methodist bishops resided in Pasadena and attended First Church that a special pew was reserved for them, which pew still bears the metal plaque that reads simply, “The Bishops.”

In 1886 First Church engaged in a nine-year fight to establish strict liquor laws, and to prohibit the sale of cigarettes to minors. Feelings became so intense that patrols had to be stationed both outside the church and in the back pews to maintain order. Ministers were hung in effigy on the front of the church, and a big hostile sign was once placed by the front door: "This Is A Saloon. Come In."

The Pasadena Methodist Foundation, established by the leading members of First Church in 1939, has current assets in excess of $2,000,000. Largely through the foundation the church was able to purchase and equip a fine mountain camp in the San Bernardino mountains. Also through generous gifts First Church was able to do much for the establishing of The SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT CLAREMONT, Calif.—a rare instance where a Theological Seminary was largely established by a local church.

Now showing some of the battle scars of a downtown city church, First Church of Pasadena continues its work with a current expense and benevolent budget at present of over $345,000. It maintains a large staff, including five ministers some of whom are engaged in counseling, crisis intervention, youth work and in giving a ministry to the inner city. While continuing its world-wide mission interests, the church has also within the last year built a new parsonage, and launched a campaign to raise $500,000 for the purchase of adjoining property for parking and expansion, and for assisting the work of other Methodist churches in the city. It currently lists a membership of 2,587.

FIRST CHURCH, PASADENA, TEXAS

PASADENA, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church is the oldest church in Pasadena, being organized in 1896 at the then-thriving community of Deepwater by Peter E. Nicholson, a local preacher. The church was organized with twenty-five or thirty charter members, and the first pastor assigned by the annual conference was S. W. Warner, who remained for three years.

In the autumn of 1896 the organization was moved to nearby Pasadena, since most of the members had moved from Deepwater and a number of them had settled in Pasadena. This church became a part of a circuit composed of Harrisburg, La Porte, Seabrook, and Pasadena. A Sunday school was organized in 1900 with J. W. Collins as the first superintendent. Mrs. W. F. Weeks and Miss Maggie Guinn joined the church in 1903, and are still very active members.

For the first nine years after organizing in Pasadena, the congregation met in the school building since the first church building was not erected until 1907, during the pastorate of O. F. Zimmerman. This first church building was of frame construction, and was truly a credit to the small town. The original property for the church was bought in 1904 by W. B. Bailey, R. M. Guinn, and H.

Plum, each of whom paid for one lot, and then decided these lots to the church.

Among the early twentieth century ministers who served the church full time were the young John Mills and the older H. B. Smith. In 1935 the original educational building was erected under the chairmanship of A. G. Whitman, during the ministry of George J. Evans. In 1937, under the ministry of Marvin Vance, the movement for a new church began, and in 1938 a stone church was built. This is the building which now is used as Wesley Chapel, and is very popular for weddings.

Richard S. Marshall served the church for four years after Marvin Vance, and proved effective in leadership and Sunday school organization and classification. An addition to the educational building was erected in 1948 while D.D. McGaughey was pastor. It was during the pastorate of Rev. Nance B. Crawford that the present, fully air-conditioned, sanctuary seating approximately 900 persons, was built, and it was first occupied during the summer of 1955.

The membership of First Church has grown to the present enrollment of 2,411. A new educational building has been added at a cost of $300,000.

PASCOE, JUAN NICANOR (1887-1962), first bishop of the Iglesia Metodista de México, was born in San Telmo Ranch, Edo. de MÉXICO, Aug. 18, 1887. He studied at Colegio Palmore in Chihuahua and graduated from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in 1916. GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in Evanston conferred on him the honorary D.D. degree in 1932.

Juan Pascoe experienced trying and difficult times during his childhood. His father had many controversies with Roman Catholics. Pascoe was member of the M.E. Church, South, ordained in 1908. He served churches in Torreón, Durango, and Laredo, Texas. He then studied at Nashville. Upon his return, he was pastor of Balderas, Chihuahua, Saltillo Allende, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, Monterrey, and then to México City.

The First General Conference of the Methodist Church of México, upon consummation of the union of the two branches, was held in the Iglesia "La Santísima Trinidad." It opened its sessions on Sept. 16, 1930. Juan N. Pascoe was elected bishop Sept. 19, and consecrated on Sunday, Sept. 21, by the five presiding elders already elected. The term of office was four years. Difficult, of course, was the first period. Time and effort were devoted to organization and interpretation, seeking understanding among ministers as well as among the congregations. He also had to do much deputation work in the country and abroad.

Pascoe married Elisa Steel and they were parents of four children. Mrs. Pascoe has also been active in women's organizations and was Vice-Chairman of the WORLD FEDERATION OF METHODIST WOMEN for one term. Together, Dr. and Mrs. Pascoe undertook the ministry of translating The Upper Room to Spanish. For twenty-five years they did that work which has been a blessing for the Spanish-speaking Methodist churches as well as other denominations in many countries. Pascoe asked for voluntary location from the Conference in 1943 to co-operate in the lay movement of the church. For three years he was Secretary for the Y.M.C.A. A few years later he returned to the itinerant pastoral ministry and even after retirement continued to be secretary of Social action in the Church.

He died Nov. 6, 1962.

PASTORAL VISITING. From the beginning Methodism has urged its ministers to visit the people. The early CLASS LEADER was a sub-pastor who was required to see each member of his class once a week to inquire into his spiritual condition. One of the questions asked of a preacher when he seeks admission into full connection in the conference is, "Will you visit from house to house?"

Today pastoral visiting is more difficult than in former times. Both parents may work away from home, and members of the family may eat and sleep at varied hours. Extracurricular school activities, community meetings, and motoring and numerous other forms of recreation may take people away from home during hours that a minister might normally be expected to call. If the pastor tries to visit while some persons are viewing their favorite television programs, he may not receive a warm welcome.

But even so, visiting continues to be one of the pastor's duties. The 1968 Discipline says that the pastor is "to visit in the homes of the parish and community, especially among the sick, aged, and others in need." He "is responsible for ministering to the needs of the whole community as well as to the needs of the people of his charge," and "he shall give an account of his pastoral ministry to the charge and annual conference." The very name pastor originally meant shepherd, and the pastor is still the spiritual leader of his people.

Pastors still find ways and times to minister to the people. They use the telephone and the mails, and they make it known that they are available for counseling when anyone wishes to come to them. They are alert to the times when sickness, sorrow, and other crises strike in homes and in individual lives. At such times they are needed and their ministry is welcome.

In Methodist circles the reputation and work of a preacher as a pastor counts heavily in the total evaluation of his ministry.

PATERSON, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A. (1970 population 142,641), is an industrial city situated on the Passaic River. Incorporated as a city in 1851, it is the seat of a state teachers college and branches of Rutgers State and Seton Hall Universities.

Paterson first appears in the M.E. Church Minutes in 1825, when J. Creamer was pastor. He reported 126 members the following year. By 1857 the city had two stations—Cross Street and Prospect Street, with a total of 1,647 members and $18,000 worth of property. In 1876 Paterson had five churches and "the Paterson Circuit." The membership of the six charges was 2,263, property appraised at $121,000.

Market Street Church, the largest Methodist church in that city, had 710 members and property estimated at $65,000.

Calvary, built in 1895, was razed by fire on Jan. 2, 1967.

Christ Church began in the home of Mrs. Louise Bosshardt, a converted German, in 1881, and later became a part of the Newark German charge. Antipathy to the German language church during World War I caused the EAST GERMAN CONFERENCE to be dissolved in 1940. The German Church then became a part of the NEWARK (now NORTHERN NEW JERSEY) CONFERENCE. Services continued in German, and in English, in this church until 1957. Calvary and Christ Churches held joint services in Christ Church after the Calvary fire, but due to the prevalent erosion of city churches, ceased to hold services until 1968. The Calvary trustees continue to exist, pending property settlement, and Christ Church has asked to disband as of this writing.

East Side Terrace was built in 1893. The first parsonage for this church was built in 1925. LLOYD C. WICKE, now bishop, was the first pastor to move into the parsonage.

Embury Church began in 1869. Its building was dedicated in 1886. In 1904 the present property was purchased. It was remodeled in 1955.

Epworth Church began around 1891, becoming a regular conference appointment in 1908. A new church was built in 1914. It merged in 1968 with the former Christ E.U.B. Church.

Grace Church, one of whose pastors, J. W. FITZGERALD, became a bishop, moved to Wyckoff after its property was taken for public housing. Madison Park (a former METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH) began in 1895.

Paterson Avenue is in the Totowa section of Paterson, and came out of a cottage prayer meeting in 1866. The present edifice was dedicated in 1928. Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD as a young man belonged to this church.

The Church of the Saviour began under Italian leadership when Signor Vincenzo Barrecchia gathered a group of new Americans in his home and organized an Italian Bible class. Beginning in 1908 the group used a room in the Prospect Street Church, but after 1914 took over the whole church. When the building was condemned in 1922, the people met for a time in the home of Nicola Bruno and also with the Salvation Army. The present Church of the Saviour was erected in 1924.

Simpson Church originated in South Paterson with the old Market Street Church people helping to organize it in 1889. The church building was destroyed by fire on Jan. 10, 1969. It had become a yoked parish with Madison Park in the late 1960's.

Union, the Totowa Borough Church, had its building destroyed by fire on Jan. 11, 1967. It had its first official board chosen in June 1911, and was built in 1913, adding Sunday school and meeting rooms in 1940.

Trinity, another church founded by Market Street Church, was organized on Feb. 21, 1889, and dedicated on July 6, 1890. Many of the first families in Paterson began to attend this church, and a new brick structure was dedicated on Thanksgiving Day, 1905. Trinity became the Spanish-speaking church, and following a fire in the early 1960's was sold to Negro Baptists. Its congregation as of 1969 was worshipping in Wesley Church.

Wesley Church was built around November 1891. In the private home of Francis Huntington the first meetings of the congregation were held. The group finally organized a year later as the Wesley M.E. Church and built a chapel which later became Eastside Terrace. The present building was dedicated in 1907. Wesley and Eastside Terrace became a yoked parish in 1967.

Westside Church was started by Sunday school teachers from Cross Street Church; and became part of a circuit in 1890. It became West Paterson M.E. Church in 1893; and was made a separate charge. A new building dedicated in 1905 had three fires, the last of which in 1941 destroyed it. Around 1918 the Borough of West Paterson was established, the site of the present church, built in 1941, remaining within Paterson, and the name was changed to Westside. The church is not to be confused with the present West Paterson Community (Methodist) Church, which came into being later, in West Paterson Borough.

In 1970 Paterson had seven churches. The church with the largest membership is Embury with 426 and estimated value of its building, equipment and land $660,690. Total membership reported by the seven churches was 1,246. Their property was valued at $1,486,945.

PATTERSON, DONALD STEWART (1897-), lay leader of WASHINGTON, D. C., and the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and executive secretary of the Methodist Commission on CHAPLAINS, 1943-1956, was born on May 20, 1897, in Anderson, Ind., and served with the U. S. Army from 1917-19. He became assistant to the president of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY in 1942, and thereafter continued to live in Washington, where he took an increasingly prominent part in the work of The Methodist Church. During World War II he was elected executive secretary of the Commission on Chaplains of The Methodist Church and served as such until 1956. From 1956 to 1965, he was the chairman of the Commission on Camp Activities of The Methodist Church. He was president of the COUNCIL OF SECRETARIES of the Church, 1954-55; the vice-president of the General Board of LAY ACTIVITIES, 1944-52; the lay leader of the Baltimore Conference, 1938-52. He has served as a trustee of American University and of the Asbury Methodist Home at GAITHERSBURG, MD. WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE awarded him the Churchmanship Award in 1951, and he was named Layman of the Year by the Methodist Union in Washington in 1965. He is the author of A National Strategy for Temperance Education, 1940; Methodist Men at Work, 1943; and Be Ye Doers, 1958. He has been a member of successive GENERAL CONFERENCES for a number of years. He continues to reside in Washington, D. C.

PATTON, JOHN (1823-1897), American lumberman, merchant, banker, philanthropist and layman of the M.E. Church, was born Jan. 6, 1823 in Tioga County, Pa. He was reared in Curwensville, Clearfield County, Pa., by poor but pious and industrious parents whose backgrounds go back to Colonial days in America. His grandfather, Philip Antes, founded Methodism in Centre and Clearfield Counties. With limited educational advantages himself, John Patton became an ardent advocate and supporter of schools and colleges.

A pioneer lumberman, he became the founder of the First National Bank at Curwensville, promoter of mining resources and land development, director of a railroad and a patriotic, public spirited citizen. Active in politics, he helped to select Abraham Lincoln as Republican candidate for President at the Convention of 1861. A congressman during the Civil War, he earnestly supported the war measures and generously contributed funds for the relief of suffering soldiers. His land company founded the town of Patton, Pa., and named it for him.

General Patton was for many years known as the leading layman of the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, and was president of its Layman's Association. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in WASHINGTON, D. C. He was a director of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary and a trustee of DICKINSON COLLEGE and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

His generous benefactions to religious and educational objects were remarkable for his day. His local church and the Patton Public School at Curwensville are monuments to his generosity. Methodist educational institutions and the Church Extension Society received large donations from him.

He was held in highest esteem because of the depth of his Christian character and his loyalty to Christ and his Church. He died at Curwensville, Dec. 23, 1897.

CHARLES F. BERKHEIMER

PATTON, SAMUEL (1797-1854), American pioneer preacher, was born in Lancaster District, S. C., on Jan. 27, 1797. In his career he served in three Methodist Conferences. First the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (1819-1821), where he was ordained traveling deacon by Bishop MCKENDREE, and served effectively the Sequatchie and then the Clinch circuits; next he was enlisted to serve the Tuscaloosa Circuit (1821-1823) in the newly organized MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, where he had a most successful ministry. On November 27, 1823, he was married to Nancy Morrison of Sullivan County, Tenn., and applied for the transfer of his membership to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE in 1824. He was received into this Conference, meeting in Jonesborough, Tenn. and in it he served as an effective leader until his death.

Fourteen of his first nineteen years in Holston Conference were as a presiding elder. In this role, he was most effective, manifesting a spirit of modesty and humility with a deep sense of responsibility and efficiency in pastoral care. Though not highly trained, Patton was self-educated beyond his early elementary schooling. EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE conferred the honorary D.D. upon him. As pastor of the First Church in KNOXVILLE, at the urgent suggestion of leaders in the Conference, he single-handedly published The Methodist Episcopalian, which became The Holston Christian Advocate, and evolved into the official organ in the Southern Methodist Church after 1848. Originally of Presbyterian background, Patton was capable of answering the attacks of Frederick A. Ross, eminent Presbyterian divine and editor of The Calvinistic Magazine published in Rogersville, Tenn. Patton's serious nature, combined with regular habits of reading and study, and his natural ability in logical reasoning, especially in doctrinal matters, qualified him eminently to champion Wesleyan doctrine and polity. Serving his church at all of the GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1828 until his death, he proved an invaluable interpreter of the position of the Church, South, before and after the eventful year of 1844.

Patton suffered an illness in youth that impaired his lungs, and this deficiency along with periodic and serious dejection inherited from "Miss Nichols" (suffering mental afflictions) whom his father married, impeded his joy of living and serving his Lord throughout his life. He was a man of five feet, eight inches in height, slender and a bit stooped, with keen, deep-set gray eyes, who leaned a bit forward in the pulpit, using few gesticulations, but always well-prepared and thoughtful in his utterances. He was respected and loved throughout his ministry, which was full of well-deserved honor and noted for effectiveness, as is attested by his friend, W. G. BROWNLOW, editor of The Knoxville Whig, with whom Patton roomed; his family, which included four children, lived at the Spring Place Home in Sullivan County. During most of his ministry, he received between one and two hundred dollars per year as salary. Frugal living, hard work, and consecrated devotion characterized this leader of early Holston Methodism, whose converts and accessions in the church ran to multiplied thousands.

He died Aug. 1, 1854, in Knoxville, Tenn.

PAUL QUINN COLLEGE, the oldest Negro liberal arts college in TEXAS, was founded by the A.M.E. CHURCH at Waco in 1872. It was granted a charter for operation by the State of Texas in 1881. The first president of Paul Quinn College, as well as its organizer, was Bishop JOHN M. BROWN. The GEORGE B. YOUNG Theological Seminary is related to Paul Quinn College, which was named for the famed A.M.E. missionary, Bishop L. H. McClooney is president of the college, while B. L. McCormick is dean of the seminary.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

JOHN PAWSON

PAWSON, JOHN (1737-1806), British minister, was born at Thorne, near Leeds, in November 1737. He became a Methodist preacher in 1762, and in 1785 he was ordained by JOHN WESLEY for SCOTLAND, where he said that he became "fully satisfied that it requires a far greater degree of Divine influence, generally speaking, to awaken a Scotchman out of the dead sleep of sin than to awaken an Englishman." He sympathized with the popular request for the Methodist preachers to administer the SACRAMENTS to the societies in their care, though he accepted John Wesley's ruling, when he left Scotland in 1787, that he must not himself administer the Sacraments in England. He exercised a mediating influence in the controversies on this subject which followed Wesley's death, both in 1792, when Pawson suggested drawing lots on the question, and again in 1793, when he was President of the Conference. He was also one of the sponsors of the Lichfield Plan, which proposed a form of episcopal government for British Methodism, a scheme which the Conference of 1794 rejected.

Pawson's revision of Wesley's Large Minutes in 1797 was accepted by the Conference as the authoritative statement of Methodist discipline. He was elected President again in 1801, a mark of the high respect in which his brethren held him. ADAM CLARKE called him an "upright and downright man" (Lives of Early Methodist Preachers, ed. T. Jackson, London, 1846, i, 392), and a strain of severity and narrowness is implied by Pawson's expurgation of Wesley's library: it was he who burned John Wesley's annotated copy of the plays of William Shakespeare. The autobiography which Pawson contributed to the Arminian Magazine (q.v.) and which may be found in Lives of Early Methodist Preachers, is similarly a solemn, rather unrevealing production. Letters of his which survive, however, suggest a rather crisper character in everyday life. He died on March 19, 1806.

JOHN NEWTON

PAYNE, DANIEL ALEXANDER (1811-1893), distinguished churchman and the first American Negro college president, was born in CHARLESTON, S. C., on Feb. 24, 1811 of free parents. He migrated to the North and attended the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Gettysburg, Pa., 1835-38. Payne, who later received two honorary doctorate degrees (D.D., LL.D.), was licensed to preach and ordained in the Lutheran Church. He was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference of the A.M.E. CHURCH in 1843. Earliest advocate of a trained ministry in the denomination and its first historiographer, publishing one of the earliest pieces of historical research among Negroes, History of the A.M.E. Church (Nashville, 1891), Payne was elected to the episcopacy in 1852. In that office he organized the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1852, the MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1855, and the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1868; negotiated the purchase of WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY for the A.M.E. Church (1863); rendered yeoman service in re-establishing the denomination in his native SOUTH CAROLINA and introducing the connection in the South after the Civil War. He claimed the longest episcopal tenure of his denomination, forty-one years.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

PAYTON, JACOB SIMPSON (1884-1963), American minister and publicist, was born at De Soto, Iowa, March 24, 1884, and was educated at Fort Worth University (A.B. 1908) and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D. 1911). He joined the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE and served Christ Church, the Army YMCA in France, Ben Avon, Sewickley, Beaver, and Asbury, Pittsburgh, besides superintending the Allegheny and Pittsburgh Districts, 1926-31. From 1936-41 he was editor of The National Methodist Press, then assistant editor of The Christian Advocate and during the war, acting editor of The Chaplain. He closed his career as Washington correspondent for The Christian Advocate. He was the author of Our Fathers Have Told Us, a history of the Pittsburgh Conference, 1938, and with E. T. CLARK and J. M. POTTS edited The Journal and Letters of Francis Asbury, 1958. Rose Marsh, whom he married June 16, 1917, survived him. He died Oct. 4, 1963, at Falls Church, Va.

PEACE FELLOWSHIP, METHODIST, is the association of pacifists within the British Methodist Church. It was founded on Nov. 3, 1933. Following a letter by HENRY CARTER to The Methodist Recorder earlier that year, over 500 ministers covenanted together "to renounce war and all its ways and works, now and always, God being our helper." In January 1934, laity took the same covenant; and by 1939 the membership had risen to over 4,000, of whom 900 were ministers. The present membership is 5,000. Methodist Peace Fellowship is part of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the ecumenical pacifist body.

JOHN STACEY

PEACH, JOHN S. (1810-1891), was born in England. He was received on trial in 1840 and came to Newfoundland in the same year. He was ordained in 1844 and served several of the larger charges in the Newfoundland district. He was financial secretary from 1856 to 1862, and was chairman of the district from 1863 to 1870. He was a delegate to the General Conference, Montreal, in 1878, the year of his retirement. A delegate to the Ecumenical Congress in 1881, he was elected President of the Newfoundland Conference in 1882. He gave valuable leadership in the Newfoundland District and Conference.

PEAKE, ARTHUR SAMUEL (1865-1929), British biblical scholar of international reputation, was born at Leek, Staffordshire, Nov. 24, 1865. He entered St. John's College, Oxford, in 1883. In 1887 he became Casberd Scholar and took First Class in the Honours School of Theology. In 1889 he became Denyer and Johnson Scholar and the next year gained the Ellerton Essay Prize. In the same year he was appointed lecturer at Mansfield College, Oxford, and was elected to a theological fellowship at Merton College. He was greatly influenced by the work of Cheyne, Driver, Sanday, Fairbairn, and Hatch.

In 1892 through the foresight of WILLIAM P. HARTLEY, he was appointed tutor at the Primitive Methodist Theological Institute, later named Hartley College, MANCHESTER (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES) and remained in this post for thirty-seven years until his death. He was also lecturer at Lancashire Independent College (Congregational) and at the United Methodist College in Manchester. In 1904 he became the first Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis in the University of Manchester, and was the chief formative influence in the newly founded faculty of theology.

His tremendous literary output included: commentaries on Job, Jeremiah, Hebrews in "The Century Bible" (1902-12); Colossians in the "Expositors Greek Testament" (1903); The Problem of Suffering in the Old Testament (Hartley Lecture, 1904); The Religion of Israel (1908); A Critical Introduction to the New Testament (1909); The Bible: Its Origin, Its Significance, and Its Abiding Worth (1913); The Revelation of John (Hartley Lecture, 1919). His most notable achievement was the editing of A Commentary on the Bible (1919), for which by his wide influence he secured contributions by the most eminent scholars. A successor to this work still boasts the title, Peake's Commentary (1962).

From 1919 he was editor of the Primitive Methodist Holborn Review and in 1925 coeditor of An Outline of Christianity. A man of wide ecumenical understanding as church leader, he helped to save England from a fundamentalist controversy. He was the first nonconformist layman to receive the Oxford D.D. (1920); he also held the D.D. of Aberdeen. He died August 19, 1929.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

PEARCE, WILLIAM (1862-1947), American FREE METHODIST bishop, was born in Hayle, Cornwall County, England, Oct. 15, 1862. He was converted in a revival similar to the Welsh Methodists. Called to the ministry, he joined the California Conference, and served as pastor and district elder until 1901. He transferred to the Oregon Conference and to Genesee in 1904 where he served as pastor and district elder. He was a bishop, 1908-47. Except for the training in the common schools of England, he was self-educated. He had one of the finest minds in the church; by instinct he was a scholar. He mastered New Testament Greek without a teacher. For sixteen years he was chairman of the Board of Administration and the Board of Directors of the Free Methodist Publishing House. He was the author of Our Incarnate Lord and numerous articles in The Free Methodist, all of high merit. An unusual preacher, unique in every way, his great sermons were the poetic overflow of a rich mind and soul. His influence was wide and long-continued. He served as bishop longer than any other.

BYRON S. LAMSON

PEARNE, THOMAS (182?-1901), American Indian minister. The Conference Journal of the COLUMBIA RIVER CONFERENCE in 1901 carried this note, "He was born about 65 years ago." He married Kate McKay in 1869. JAMES H. WILBUR performed the ceremony. Both Thomas and Kate attended the Fort Simcoe Indian School in the early 1860's under "Father" Wilbur. Thomas then attended the Chemawa Indian School near Salem, Ore., and later returned to his home near Fort Simcoe to be taught Bible and other pastoral skills by Wilbur.

He was admitted on trial in the OREGON CONFERENCE in 1869, was admitted to full membership and ordained deacon by Bishop E. S. JAMES in 1871, and appointed that year to Simcoe Indian Mission. He became a charter member of the Columbia River Conference when it was formed in 1874.

Besides preaching in the churches on the Yakima Reservation, he conducted and assisted in many revival meetings among the Indians of WASHINGTON, OREGON and IDAHO. Notable among these meetings was the great revival among the Nez Percés when over 300 were converted and became members of the church.

Pearne owned and operated a large ranch in Medicine Valley near Fort Simcoe, the first irrigated ranch in Yakima Valley, much of the proceeds from which he used to help those in need.

Death came to him in September 1901, and he was buried in the White Swan Methodist Cemetery. (This Cemetery was a part of the land donation of Chief White Swan to the Methodist Church for church, campground, and revival meetings for the Indians.) He preached, visited among them and ministered to their every need. His death was regretted by his own people and by hundreds of his white brethren.

PEARSON, BENJAMIN HAROLD (1893-), an ordained elder of the Arizona-Southern California Conference of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, is a retired missionary. He was born at Los Angeles, Calif., and holds the A.B. and Th.M. degrees from the University of Southern California. The Litt.D. degree was conferred on him by SEATTLE PACIFIC COLLEGE in 1942. He was superintendent of the Pacific Coast Home Missions, 1919-39 and General Superintendent of the Young People's Missionary Society, 1935-43. He served as Superintendent and Director of the Colombia, South America field, Oriental Missionary Society, 1943-50; and of the Brazil field, 1950-55. He was executive secretary, World Gospel Crusades, 1955-59; and President, 1960-65. He is now president emeritus. He is the author of Mexican Missions; Off to Panama; The Lost Generation Returns; Wings Over Aztec Land; The Monk Who Lived Again; Next; Adventures in Christ-like Living; Don Pedro; The Headhunter's Bride; and The Vision Lives. Dr. and Mrs. Pearson reside in Los Angeles, Calif.

PECK, GEORGE (1797-1876), American clergyman, educator, editor, and author, was born in Middlefield, Otsego County, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1797. The son of Luther and Annis Collar Peck, he and four brothers became Methodist ministers, one being Bishop JESSE T. PECK. A Christian at fifteen, he joined the GENESSEE CONFERENCE in 1816, continuing in effective service fifty-seven years. He became a member of the ONEIDA CONFERENCE when organized (1829), and of the WYOMING CONFERENCE when organized (1852), being a member of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE during his editorial years (1840-1852). He served seventeen pastorates, was presiding elder seven times, and a member of thirteen sessions of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1824-1872.

From 1840 for eight years Peck was editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review; then four years as editor of the Christian Advocate. He was Principal of Cazenovia

GEORGE PECK

Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., 1835-1838. Shortly afterward he proposed that a seminary be established at Kingston, Pa., which materialized in 1844. He also was the proponent of the General Conference course of studies for preachers. Peck published several books, including History of Wyoming, History of Methodism within the Bounds of the Old Genesee Conference, and The Life and Times of Rev. George Peck, D.D.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY granted George Peck the M.A. degree and AUGUSTA COLLEGE that of D.D. In 1846 he went to LONDON as a member of the Evangelical Alliance.

George Peck married Mary, daughter of Philip and Martha Myers, of Forty Fort, Pa., June 10, 1819. Of their four children George M. and Luther W. became members of the Wyoming Conference, Wilbur F. became a physician, and a daughter became the wife of T. J. Crane of the NEWARK CONFERENCE.

Peck died in Scranton, Pa., May 20, 1876, and was buried at Forty Fort.

PECK, JESSE TRUESDELL (1811-1883), American bishop, was born at Middlefield Center, Otsego County, N. Y., the son of Luther and Annis (Collar) Peck, and a descendant of Henry Peck, one of the founders of New Haven, Conn. He was the youngest of five brothers, all of whom became ministers. Educated at Cazenovia Seminary, he married Persis Wing, Oct. 13, 1831; they had no children.

Peck joined the ONEIDA CONFERENCE in 1832, was ordained DEACON in 1834, and ELDER, in the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE, in 1836. He served several pastorates, and in 1837-40 was principal of a high school which later became Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary. From 1841 to 1848 he was principal of the Troy Conference Academy, Poultney, Vt., after which he had four years as president of DICKINSON COLLEGE, Carlisle, Pa. In 1852, he went to Foundry Church, WASHINGTON, but left after two years to become editor and secretary of the Tract Society. In 1856 he was appointed to Greene Street Church, NEW YORK, and two years later, because of his wife's health, transferred to CALIFORNIA, where he served pastorates in SAN FRANCISCO and SACRAMENTO and was presiding elder of the San Francisco District for one year. While in the west he was a trustee of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC and contributed to its support. In 1866 he returned east, supplied St. Paul's Church, Peekskill, N. Y., for a time, and in 1867 was appointed to Hudson Street, Albany, where he served three years. From 1870 to 1872 he was pastor at Syracuse where he led in founding SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY.

Peck was a delegate to five GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1844-48, and 1864-72. Though only thirty-three in 1844, his speech in the debate over the status of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW brought Peck into wide and favorable notice in the north. He believed himself capable of doing great things, and he manifested great energy and persistence. Though he weighed over 300 pounds, his body was seldom at rest and his mind was always on the alert. When others doubted that Syracuse University could succeed, he was confident. When the school began he pledged $25,000, a sum greater than all his possessions, and paid it. In 1883, he gave $50,000 to the institution and had nothing left. He published several books, including The Central Idea of Christianity, The True Woman, and the History of the Great Republic. In addition, he wrote tracts and pamphlets and contributed to Methodist periodicals and holiness magazines.

In 1872, Peck was elevated to the episcopacy and in the next eleven years manifested zeal and vigor in the work. He presided over eighty-three conferences, including those in GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, DENMARK, SWEDEN, and NORWAY. He participated in the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1881. He died in Syracuse, May 17, 1883, and was buried there.

W. W. PEELE

PEELE, WILLIAM WALTER (1881-1959), American bishop, was born at Gibson, N. C., on Nov. 26, 1881. He graduated from Trinity College, DURHAM, N. C., in 1903 and was awarded the D.D. degree by the same institution in 1928. The LL.D. degree was conferred upon him in 1941 by RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE. He was married to Elizabeth Lytch of Laurinburg, N. C., on Aug. 2, 1911.

From 1903 until 1938, Peele served as an educator and pastor in NORTH CAROLINA Methodism. He was professor of Mathematics at Rutherford College, 1903-1906, and from 1906 to 1909 was president of that school. He was headmaster of Trinity Park School from 1911 to 1915 and from 1915 to 1918 was professor of Biblical Literature in Trinity College.

As pastor Peele served important appointments in North Carolina Methodism such as Edenton Street Church, RALEIGH, 1918-1923; Trinity Church, Durham, 1923-1928; First Church, CHARLOTTE, 1928-1937; presiding elder, Greensboro District, 1937-1938.

He was elected a bishop at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, in 1938 and from 1938 to 1952 he served as bishop of the Richmond Area which comprised the VIRGINIA, BALTIMORE and NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCES. He retired as bishop at the South-eastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1952.

Bishop Peele gave dynamic leadership to the Richmond Area, and in addition his work influenced many phases of World Methodism. During World War II, he was chairman of the Methodist Commission on CHAPLAINS and directed the work of nearly 3,000 Methodist Chaplains. He was also chairman of the Methodist Commission on Camp Activities, which agency gave special attention to the program of local Methodist churches located near military bases for the military personnel and their dependents.

Bishop Peele was very active in the field of Methodist higher education, serving as a member of the Board of Trustees of DUKE UNIVERSITY, Randolph-Macon College, RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, LOUISBURG COLLEGE, FERRUM JUNIOR COLLEGE, and RANDOLPH-MACON ACADEMY. He also served as president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS and vice-chairman of the BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Upon retirement in 1952, Bishop and Mrs. Peele made their home at Laurinburg, N. C. He died there on July 1, 1959 and was buried in the Lytch Cemetery at Laurinburg.

PAUL N. GARBER

PEEPLS, BENJAMIN (1797-1883), American preacher, was born in Carter County, Tenn., April 3, 1797. He professed religion and joined the M.E. Church when but a boy, felt the call to preach early, and was licensed to preach when eighteen years of age. He was admitted on trial into the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in October 1816, ordained deacon in 1818, and elder in 1820. He had traveled several circuits and in 1820 the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE was organized. He and Hezekiah Holland were appointed to the Dover Circuit as co-pastors.

He was later sent as missionary to that portion of the Jackson Purchase lying in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE along with LEWIS GARRETT. The two met at McLemoresville, Tenn., and agreed to divide the territory, Garrett taking the southern portion and Peeples the northern. A group of people led by John Manley, a local preacher, had been holding services in a community a few miles east of what is now Paris, Tenn. Shortly after the arrival of Peeples, he organized this group into a church and it was named MANLEY'S CHAPEL. This church is believed by many to have been the first Methodist church organized in the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE. This was in 1820. With this church as a base, the Sandy River Circuit was organized.

In 1822 Peeples married Martha Davidson Randle, a sixteen-year old girl with three younger brothers looking to her for care. At the Conference that year he located, feeling that with his responsibilities and his meager allowance from the church he could not support his family. He settled in the wilderness three miles east of what is now Henry, Tenn., and from this home as a base he carried on the work of the church, preaching, organizing churches and otherwise ministering to the territory. He practiced medicine, served as judge of Henry County Court several years, and was one of the commissioners who surveyed the Kentucky-Tennessee line on the north. His wife's three brothers and five of their sons became traveling Methodist preachers.

In 1869, having reared and supported the family, he was readmitted to the Memphis Conference and served several years with success. He died on Aug. 22, 1883. Peeples and Garrett are regarded as fathers of the Memphis Conference.

PEGLAR, GEORGE (1799- ?), an American WESLEYAN METHODIST pastor and church leader, was born in LONDON, England, on Oct. 11, 1799, and spent his early life as a sailor and world traveler. For a time he belonged to the Methodist Protestant Church, but severed his connection with that body over the slavery issue. He was pastor of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in UTICA, N. Y., where the convention met in May 1843 and perfected the organization of the new church. At the sixth General Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection held in ADRIAN, Mich., in 1864, the new West Wisconsin Conference was represented by the doughty sailor-preacher George Peglar. Interesting to note, only twelve of the persons present in the organizing conference twenty-one years before were in attendance at this one. George Peglar presided in the anniversary celebration. He was the first president of the Rochester Conference of his church, being named to that office in 1844. After the 1867 General Conference authorized the union of the two conferences in WISCONSIN, Peglar was elected the first president of the united conference. He had emigrated from NEW YORK and was active in the work there. He held this office still in 1869.

PEHIAKURA, on the Manukau Peninsula, NEW ZEALAND, was the site of an early mission station. The local chief, baptized as Epiha Putini (Jabez Bunting) attended training school at Mangungu and became teacher and preacher to his own people, first at Pehiakura and in later years at Ihumatao, from 1838 until his death in 1856. Missionaries, traveling from Mangungu to stations in the south, frequently called at Pehiakura and conducted services in the large church Putini had caused to be built. Membership grew by 1844 to seventy-two, with a total of 150 attendants to worship.

William Woon was appointed to be resident missionary at Pehiakura in 1845, but was unable to take up his appointment because of tribal warfare in the area. The work continued to be supervised from Auckland by H. H. LAWRY, until it was entirely disrupted by the Maori Wars of the 1860's.

PEKIN, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church, is the oldest congregation in Tazewell County. It began in the cabin of Jacob Tharp in "Town Site," later called Pekin, when JESSE WALKER, the founder of Methodism in both St. Louis and Chicago, preached there in 1826. The first building, a brick structure, was later referred to as Foundry Church because it was then used as a foundry.

Pekin first appears in the conference minutes in 1842 when Warner Oliver was appointed pastor. The Pekin Circuit reported 232 members in 1843. Pekin became a station in 1857; it then had sixty-four members and its property was valued at $2,500. A Sunday school was organized in 1846.

The congregation erected a second building at Capitol and Margaret Streets about 1846, and another costing $12,000 was constructed at Fourth and Broadway in 1867. The latter structure was remodeled in 1905 and was used by the members until 1954 when the present edifice was consecrated.

When the SOUTHWESTERN GERMAN CONFERENCE was organized in 1865, there was a German-speaking congregation of 104 members and property valued at $5,000 in Pekin, and by 1876 it outnumbered First Church 187 to 154. Now called Grace Church, it reported 1,533 members in 1970, property valued at $852,597, and a total of $108,562 raised for all purposes. The statistics for First Church in 1970 were 1,762 members, property valued at $553,554, and $87,962 raised for all purposes.

PEKIN, NEW YORK, U.S.A., Centenary Park near Pekin marks the site of the Layman's Convention where the FREE METHODIST CHURCH was organized, Aug. 23, 1860. It is located on Hoover Road, one and one-half miles south of Pekin, adjacent to Schenck's Grove where laymen and ministers adopted a Constitution and Book of Discipline for the new denomination. The park is bounded by a substantial rail fence. There is a bronze marker affixed to a fifteen-ton granite boulder, and the grounds are appropriately landscaped. The creation of Centenary Park was a joint venture of The International Light and Life Men's Fellowship, in cooperation with the denomination. The park was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies in connection with the Free Methodist Centennial General Conference of 1960.

PELAGIANISM, a heresy advancing unacceptable views concerning sin and GRACE particularly referred to in the seventh ARTICLE OF RELIGION of The United Methodist Church. The "father" of Pelagianism was Pelagius (d. around 420). Of Pelagius' life little is known definitely. Even his birthplace is not certain, although it seems likely that his native home was Britain. Pelagius was a monk of learning and moral earnestness. He came to Rome around 400 and became popular as a preacher. He was shocked at the low point which Roman morals had reached, and sought to raise ethical standards. He was concerned to stir up moral endeavor among lax Christians who stressed the weakness of the flesh and the impossibility of fulfilling God's commands.

The famous "Pelagian controversies" (over sin and grace) began when Pelagius visited North Africa where Augustine was bishop. Among the first literary efforts of Augustine after he became bishop of Hippo had been a treatise, Ad Simplicianum, addressed to Simplicianus the successor of Ambrose as bishop of Milan. The work is important in the development of Augustine's thought because it is generally regarded as a significant stage in his understanding of St. Paul and the theology of grace. In this writing Augustine denies the possibility of human merit before God and stresses man's sinfulness. Indeed he provoked Pelagius by his statement "... all men are a mass of sin..." (Augustine: Earlier Writings. The Library of Christian Classics, Vol. VI. Edited by J. H. S. Burleigh. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, pp. 398, 402, 404.) Pelagius felt that Augustine's view of human nature was faulty and lay in part behind the evident decline in morals.

Of the writings of Pelagius little is extant. However, much can be learned from what remains of his work and from his opponents, especially Augustine. Pelagius regarded it an affront to God to insist that man could not help sinning. To him this seemed to be a fatalistic view of man. Others shared his doctrine (e.g. Celestius and Julian of Eclanum), and developed a "Pelagianism" which not infrequently went further than some of the teachings of Pelagius himself. The main concern of Pelagianism was to emphasize that man is a responsible being, and that his actions depend entirely upon himself. Any form of predestination is rejected by Pelagianism; man in his own freedom determines how he will develop. The argument used to support this doctrine of the freedom of the will is that God does not command man to do what man is unable to do. The unassisted human will is regarded as decisive in the matter of salvation. Man is completely free to choose good or evil because there is no internal or external pressure on him—no internal pressure because native depravity is denied; no external pressure because predestination is rejected.

Pelagianism insists that there is no ORIGINAL SIN which has been inherited from Adam. Man's flesh is not regarded as evil, and death is not seen as a result of the fall. Neither sin nor virtue is inborn in man, and any concept of the transmission of sin from parent to child by generation (peccatum ex traduce) is rejected. Each soul is seen as a new creation from God and completely untainted with original sin. Pelagianism did recognize that the mass of men are indeed bad, but only so because they have been ready to follow the bad example of Adam's sin.

Because all men have followed a bad example they are culpable and must change their manner of living. But this change is not to be accomplished in the traditional way by relying upon grace. Grace is not regarded as a divine influence upon man's soul, nor a divine work done in behalf of man. Grace is regarded as the enlightenment of man's reason. Enlightenment comes through the law, especially the law found in the New Testament given by Christ in precept and example. This enlightenment enables man to see the will of God so that he may use his own natural powers to choose the good. Grace is not the direct work of God, it is comprised of the natural endowment given to men as they are enlightened.

A corollary of this teaching of Pelagianism is man's perfectibility. If man wills, he can observe God's commandments without sinning. Pelagius argues that God commands perfection (Lev. 19:2; Matt. 5:48), and man can fulfill the requirement. This perfection comes about by man's diligent effort and the continuous exercise of the will. When men use the resources at hand, they can reach a perfection. Many Pelagians teach that man can live without sin if he so wills.

Pelagian tendencies from time to time have reoccurred in the Christian Church. Schools of thought which have placed primary emphasis upon education and a social transformed environment to the relative neglect of conversion and regeneration by the grace of God have been regarded by many as a near, if not a total, Pelagianism. Many saw a movement toward a modern Pelagianism in the rise of theological Liberalism during the mid-nineteenth century. Liberalism, sometimes called "Modernism," stressed man's free will, human moral endeavor, character development, and man's rational powers. This movement was called "Culture Protestantism" by Karl Barth; and he criticized, among other things, the notion that man could find God or attain salvation through human effort. This reaction gave rise to a movement often called "Neo-Orthodoxy" or "Crisis Theology." This rejection of "modern Pelagianism" by Barth and others stressed the sovereignty to God in initiating any Divine-human encounter.

Methodist theology has sometimes been accused of having "Pelagian tendencies." This is because of three emphases of Methodism: (1) The emphasis upon free grace for all men which implies the possibility of SALVATION for all. (2) The rejection of double predestination. (3) The emphasis upon CHRISTIAN PERFECTION. However, it may be fairly claimed that traditional Methodist theology is free from Pelagianism. Indeed, Methodism, along with other branches of the Church, has from its beginning rejected Pelagianism, regarding it as too extreme. Wesley and other early Methodist leaders have always insisted upon man's sinfulness and the necessity for God's grace in the life of man. For example, Wesley, in the Preface to his work on The Doctrine of Original Sin, strongly repudiates a Pelagian position. Elsewhere (e.g. sermons "Salvation by Faith" and "Justification by Faith") Wesley emphasizes the necessity for the grace of God in salvation.

Methodism, in harmony with historic Christendom, has criticized Pelagianism at the following points: 1. The nature of sin. Pelagianism sees sin as a series of separate acts with no basis in a depraved nature. Sin is regarded as an action which does not have any connection with an inherited sinful condition of the soul. Methodism regards man as sinful, both racially and individually. The notion that certain men may have been without sin is rejected, and the doctrine of original sin is maintained. 2. The nature of grace. Pelagianism sees grace as the enlightenment of the natural capacities of man and fails to see any direct work of God in the life of men. Methodism views grace as something quite outside of man.

Grace is from God alone, and it is the result of God's direct activity in the life of man. 3. The tendency of legalism. Pelagianism interprets the relationship between God and man in a legal fashion. Good works are the basis for salvation. Methodism insists that salvation is sola gratia (by grace alone) and that man's justification is based upon the grace of God, not on the works of the law.

Pelagianism has been condemned by the Church as a heresy. It was rejected at Carthage (418) and at Ephesus (431). A later modification of Pelagianism called semi-Pelagianism was also condemned at Orange (529).

PEMBERTON, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., population 1,341, a town in Burlington County, in which was erected the third Methodist meeting house in New Jersey and the fifth in the U. S. A. It was originally known as New Mills, but the name was changed to Pemberton in 1828.

The exact date of the organization of the Methodist Society at New Mills is indefinite. However, Methodist itinerants preached here as early as 1769. THOMAS COKE visited the Society in 1785 and wrote, "This place has been favored with a faithful ministry for sixteen years."

Captain THOMAS WEBB preached here, perhaps as early as 1768 or 1769. An early leader in the New Mills Society was William Budd who preached here before Bishop ASBURY's first visit in 1772.

The first church structure was begun in 1775. It was a frame building, twenty-six by thirty-six feet, with galleries around three sides and a high pulpit.

Bishop Francis Asbury visited New Mills on numerous occasions: 1772, 1776, 1782, 1783, 1786, 1789, 1800, 1802, 1806, 1813. During the 1806 visit, he preached a funeral sermon for Bishop WHATCOAT who had died earlier in the year.

Among the early pastors were JOHN KING, WILLIAM WATERS, PHILLIP GATCH, THOMAS RANKIN, WILLIAM DUKE, FREEBORN GARRETTSON, BENJAMIN ABBOTT, and HENRY BOEHM.

There have been three church edifices in Pemberton. The first, built in 1775-76, was sold in 1833, and is still in use as a dwelling. The second, built in 1833, was destroyed by fire in 1894. The present sanctuary, built in 1894, continues to serve a growing congregation.

PEÑARANDA, NESTOR (1889-), was the first Bolivian Methodist minister. He accepted the Bolivian Missionary Conference of the M.E. Church in 1916, its first year. He and his wife, Angelica, soon felt the need to study the Aymara language so they could work more effectively in schools and churches among the Aymara Indians. Within six months Peñaranda was preaching in their language. Later, with another man, he translated the four Gospels and the Book of Acts from Spanish into Aymara. He also compiled an Aymara hymnbook. He retired from the ministry in 1948, but continued to work in retirement.

EDWARD J. PENDERGRASS

PENDERGRASS, EDWARD JULIAN, JR. (1900-), American bishop, was born in Florence, S. C., on Sept. 24, 1900, the son of Edward Julian and Eula Ethel (Smith) Pendergrass. He did his college work at the University of North Carolina, receiving the A.B. degree; his seminary studies at EMORY UNIVERSITY'S CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and additional work at GARRETT SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. He also holds an honorary D.D. degree from FLORIDA SOUTHERN. He married Lois Mae Sheppard on June 26, 1929. They have three children—Amy Katherine (Mrs. John Miller), Edla Ethel (Mrs. Burton Barnes) and Edward Eugene.

He has been a minister of the FLORIDA CONFERENCE since 1929. He was ordained deacon in 1932, elder in 1934. His first pastorate was at Fort White, 1930-31; followed by High Springs, 1931-32; Cross City, 1932-34; Fort Pierce, 1934-38; College Heights at Lakeland, 1938-39; Seminole Heights Church, TAMPA, 1939-43; superintendent of the Tallahassee District, 1943-46; pastor of First Church, Tampa, 1946-52; First Church, ORLANDO, 1952-64—all of these in FLORIDA. He was elected bishop in 1964, and assigned to the JACKSON (Mississippi) Area.

He was secretary of the Conference BOARD OF MISSIONS and secretary of Evangelism, 1960, '63; delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1948, '52, '56, '60, and '64; Southeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1944, '48, '52, '56, '60, and '64. He is a trustee of MILLSAPS COLLEGE, RUST COLLEGE, WOOD JUNIOR COLLEGE, and LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY. He is an ex-officio trustee of the Methodist Children's Home, Methodist Home Hospital, Seashore and Traceway Manor.

Bishop Pendergrass is now assigned to the following boards and committees of The United Methodist Church: General Board of EDUCATION, General Board of EVANGELISM, Interboard Committee on Town and Country Work, and the Quadrennial Program, 1968-72. He resides in Jackson, Miss.

PENINSULA CONFERENCE which superseded the Wilmington Conference of the M.E. Church was organized by the Uniting Conference in 1939. Its territory includes the state of DELAWARE and the counties of MARYLAND east of the Susquehanna River and Chesapeake Bay. The first session of the conference was held at WILMINGTON, Del., May 15-20, 1940, with Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES presiding. At the time the conference had 244 ministers, 241 pastoral charges and 68,891 members.

Captain THOMAS WEBB preached the first Methodist sermon in Delaware at Wilmington in 1769. The first Methodist society in the colony was organized at New Castle in 1770. The record shows 150 members in Delaware in 1773 and 1,714 in 1783.

From the beginning Methodist work on the peninsula was a part of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. In 1868 the GENERAL CONFERENCE organized the Wilmington Conference to include Delaware and the parts of Maryland and VIRGINIA east of the Susquehanna River and Chesapeake Bay. At its last session in 1939 the Wilmington Conference reported 183 ministers, 180 pastoral charges, and 53,438 members.

When organized the Peninsula Conference included all the ministers and churches in its territory belonging to the three branches of Methodism which united to form The Methodist Church, except the Negro ministers and churches which continued in the DELAWARE CONFERENCE of the Central Jurisdiction until 1965. Though it covered a little less territory than the body it superseded, the Peninsula Conference immediately showed an increase of over sixty ministers and some 15,000 members. These came from the former MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH and the former BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South.

When the Delaware Conference was absorbed by the conferences of the Northeastern Jurisdiction in 1965, the Peninsula Conference at once showed another increase of some sixty ministers and about 15,000 members.

Peninsula Methodism established a paper in 1875 and maintained it for thirty-five years. Called the Conference Worker, the paper was first published at Easton, Md.; soon afterward it moved to Chestertown, Md., and then to Wilmington. From 1884 to its demise in 1910, the publication was called the Peninsula Methodist.

The Peninsula Conference supports Wesley College, a two-year coeducational school at Dover; two homes for the aged—Methodist Country House at Wilmington, and Methodist Manor House at Seaford, Del.; and Drayton Manor, Worton, Md., a retreat center or camp primarily for adults. The conference cooperates with the Baltimore Conference in the support of the Board of Child Care at Rockdale, Md., giving some $18,000 to the organization in 1968.

Aware of the importance of history, the Peninsula Conference has an active historical society. The society has erected a museum and a home for a curator adjacent to BARRATT'S CHAPEL, near Frederica, Del., one of the historic SHRINES of American Methodism.

In 1970 the Peninsula Conference had 324 ministers, 240 pastoral charges, 64,901 enrolled in church school, 100,600 church members, and property valued at $66,109,683.

PENNINGTON, CHESTER ARTHUR (1916-), American minister, was born in Delanco, N. J., on Sept. 16, 1916, the son of Chester Arthur and Emily (Lush) Pennington. He was educated at Temple University where he received the A.B. degree in 1937 and at DREW UNIVERSITY, receiving the B.D. in 1940, the Ph.D. in 1948. He did postgraduate work at Oxford in England. Ohio University gave him the L.H.D. degree in 1961. McKENDREE COLLEGE awarded him the D.D. degree in 1968.

He married Marjorie Elizabeth Bruschweiler, on Sept. 13, 1941, and their children are Celeste Ann and Lawrence Arthur. Dr. Pennington joined the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE in 1938, was ordained elder in 1940. He served as pastor in Neptune City, 1938-41; then in Spring Lake, N. J., 1941-43, and was chaplain in the U.S. Navy, 1943-46. He became assistant minister Calvary Church, EAST ORANGE, N. J., 1946-47, and thereafter was professor of philosophy at CENTENARY COLLEGE in New Jersey and the pastor in HACKETTSTOWN, N. J., at the same time, 1947-51. He then transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE and became pastor of St. Paul and also St. Andrew Churches in New York City, 1951-55, and in that year was transferred to the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE and put in charge of the large Hennepin Avenue Church in MINNEAPOLIS. He is a member of the Commission on CHAPLAINS, a trustee of HANLINE UNIVERSITY, a member of the American Theological Society, and is a director of the Ministers Life and Casualty Union of Minneapolis. He is the author of Ecen So . . . Believe (1966); and With Good Reason (1967), both published by Abingdon Press.

PENNINGTON SCHOOL, Pennington, New Jersey, a secondary school for boys, was founded in 1838 by the New Jersey ANNUAL CONFERENCE. Included among its long list of graduates are many influential leaders of Methodism, such as J. M. BUCKLEY, editor of the New York Christian Advocate; BORDEN P. BOWNE, distinguished professor of Boston University; and the late Bishop ADNA W. LEONARD, who was killed in a plane crash in Greenland during the Second World War. In the 1880's it was said that a third of the ministers of New Jersey were graduates of Pennington School. The governing board has twenty-four members elected by the New Jersey Annual Conference on nomination of the board of trustees.

JOHN O. GROSS

PENNSYLVANIA, called the "Keystone State" because of its central location among the thirteen original colonies, is thirty-third in size but third in population, according to the 1970 census (11,669,565). It was settled by the Swedes in 1638, by the Dutch who conquered the Swedes, and by the English who overpowered the Dutch in 1644. In 1682 Charles II granted the land to the Quaker William Penn who named it Penn's Woods or Pennsylvania. Noted for its agricultural and dairy products, Pennsylvania is also one of the largest mineral producing states; it supplies all of the anthracite and much of the bituminous coal for the nation. Industries include iron and steel, foundry and machine works, printing, knit goods, electrical supplies, and railway manufactures.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD was the first Methodist to visit Pennsylvania, preaching in PHILADELPHIA as early as 1739. A major influence in the Great Awakening, Whitefield nevertheless failed to organize his converts into societies. However, he made the word "Methodist" well known in the colonies.

Several of Whitefield's converts in Philadelphia began meeting informally in a sail loft on Dock Street. The loft belonged to Samuel Croft; the leaders of the meetings were James Emerson and Edward Evans. In 1767 Captain THOMAS WEBB came to Philadelphia and formed the sail loft group into a Methodist society which eventually became St. GEORGE'S CHURCH, now one of the historic SHRINES of American Methodism.

In 1769 JOHN WESLEY sent his first two Methodist missionaries to America—RICHARD BOARDMAN and JOSEPH PILMORE. They arrived in Philadelphia October 21 and discovered that the society organized by Webb was meeting at 8 Loxley Court; it then numbered about 100 persons. Pilmore remained to minister to the group in Philadelphia while Boardman went on to New York. About a month later the Philadelphia society purchased the shell of the church building named St. George's from a German Reformed group.

Between 1769 and 1773, Wesley sent eight official missionaries to America, and on landing all of them came first to Philadelphia. FRANCIS ASBURY arrived in 1771 and THOMAS RANKIN and GEORGE SHADFORD in 1773. In 1773 and in the two succeeding years the first three Methodist conferences held in America were conducted at St. George's Church by Thomas Rankin, John Wesley's General Assistant for America. By 1800 numerous societies and circuits had been organized in Pennsylvania. Some of the early circuits and the dates of their beginning were: Chester, 1774; York, 1781; Lancaster, 1782; Redstone, 1784; Juniata, 1784; Ohio, 1787; Huntingdon, 1788; Pittsburgh, 1788; Bristol, 1788; Wyoming, 1791; Northumberland, 1792; Tioga, 1792; Carlisle, 1794; Shenango, 1800; and Erie, 1800.

In 1803 Pennsylvania was divided between two conferences, the Baltimore and Philadelphia. The BALTIMORE CONFERENCE had three districts, Alexandria, Pittsburgh, and BALTIMORE, which covered western MARYLAND and western Pennsylvania and extended into OHIO and western VIRGINIA. The conference reported thirty appointments and 18,927 members. The PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE had six districts, Delaware, Chesapeake, Jersey, Albany, Genesee, and Susquehanna, and it covered eastern Pennsylvania, NEW JERSEY, a part of New York, and the eastern shore of the Chesapeake including DELAWARE. It had forty-three appointments and 33,187 members.

Not only was Pennsylvania one of the mother regions of American Methodism, it was also the place where the evangelical movement began among the Germans. The religious zeal kindled by PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN, MARTIN BOEHM, and JACOB ALBRIGHT and which eventually produced the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, took its rise in Pennsylvania.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at Meadville, founded in 1817, has been under Methodist control since 1833. DICKINSON COLLEGE at Carlisle, established in 1783, has been Methodist since 1834. LYCOMING COLLEGE at Williamsport was started as an academy in 1812, came under Methodist patronage in 1848, was elevated to a junior college in 1929 and a four-year college in 1948. Title to Lycoming is held by the Preachers' Aid Society of the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. The Methodists started several academies or seminaries which were in reality secondary schools before the rise of public high schools. A number of hospitals, homes for children, and homes for the aged were also established.

Other Methodist bodies arose in Pennsylvania, some of them offshoots of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The A.M.E. CHURCH was organized in Philadelphia in 1816, and presently has two conferences in the state, Philadelphia and York. Part of the Philadelphia-Baltimore Conference of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH is in Pennsylvania. The PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH which came from England in 1829 has a conference extending from MASSACHUSETTS to the midwest and some of its churches are in Pennsylvania. The Methodist Protestant Church developed considerable strength in western Pennsylvania. Its PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE was one of the strongest in the connection. The WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, organized at UTICA, N.Y., in 1843, merged with the PILGRIM HOLINESS CHURCH in 1968 to form the Wesleyan Church. Before the union the Wesleyan Methodists had the Penn-Jersey Conference operating partly in Pennsylvania. The FREE METHODISTS, organized in 1860, have four conferences in Pennsylvania, Oil City, Pittsburgh, and parts of the New York and Susquehanna Conferences. Several smaller Methodist bodies have a few congregations in the state.

After the Philadelphia and Baltimore Conferences, which were original conferences, the M.E. Church developed four more conferences in Pennsylvania which continued until unification in 1939 and after. The PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE (ME) was formed in 1824 from parts of the Ohio and Baltimore Conferences. The ERIE CONFERENCE, composed of territory in Pennsylvania and New York, came in 1836 by dividing the Pittsburgh Conference. The WYOMING CONFERENCE was formed in 1852 by dividing the ONEIDA CONFERENCE (New York). The Wyoming Conference has always been made up about half and half of territory from Pennsylvania and New York. The Central Pennsylvania Conference was formed in 1868 from parts of the Philadelphia and East Baltimore Conferences. In 1962 the Erie and Pittsburgh Conferences combined to form the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. After 1960 the Baltimore Conference had no Pennsylvania territory within its bounds.

About five per cent of Pennsylvania's population belonged to The Methodist Church in 1968. While this does not compare favorably with 10.7 per cent in Iowa, nevertheless the total number of Methodists in Pennsylvania, 540,201 in 1968, make it numerically one of the largest Methodist states in the nation. In 1968 there were 1,936 Methodist churches in Pennsylvania and they were valued at $345,248,677. At the time Pennsylvania Methodism was divided among three episcopal areas, Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, and Philadelphia, with a resident bishop in each of the cities named.

PENSACOLA, FLORIDA, U.S.A., is an important harbor city on Pensacola Bay, off the Gulf of Mexico. It was settled in the early 1500's by the Spanish, has been under the rule of five flags: Spain, France, England, Confederate States, and the United States. Pensacola was the site of the formal transfer of the FLORIDA territory to the United States in 1821, and now is headquarters for the Pensacola Naval Air Station.

Methodism was the first Protestant denomination to establish a mission in Pensacola. From 1781 to 1821, Protestant denominations were not permitted in the territory of Florida, but upon purchase of Spanish territory by the United States this restriction was removed and in 1821 the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE established the Pensacola Mission and appointed Alexander Talley as missionary.

Thus First Methodist Church, mother church of Protestantism in northwest Florida, was organized and although burned twice and moved several times, it was finally located in 1881 on its present site in downtown Pensacola.

Thirteen years later Navy Yard Mission was added to Pensacola Mission, and Green Malone became pastor. Navy Yard was later to become Warrington.

The Civil War years from 1861-1866 show no statistics nor appointments, for Pensacola was occupied by Federal troops; however, in 1861 there were sixty-six white and nine colored Methodists, with fifty-three white and six colored on probation. Post war years reflect in 1866 sixty-five white Methodists only.

The year 1891 marked the phenomenal spread of Methodism in Pensacola after years of yellow fever epidemics, hardships, and the Civil War interruptions. Now a group of preaching places were named: Malaga Square Mission, Muscogee Wharf Mission, Reed's Chapel, and Warrington. In 1902 Gadsden Street Church was built in East Pensacola. Reed's Chapel later became the present Richard's Memorial in West Pensacola.

Prior to 1861 the records show that Negro and white Methodists worshipped together. In March 1885, First Presbyterian sold its old building to "the M.E. Church (colored) for $2,500." This was the beginning of St. Paul Church which retained its M.E. connection. In 1904 St. Paul was to be host to the Annual Conference but, destroyed by fire and too late to notify delegates, Tolbert's Chapel A.M.E. Zion (now Big Zion) loaned its church for the session to be held.

The St. Paul congregation bought its property for a new start, worshipped for a time in an old dance hall, later in a tabernacle of rough boards and sawdust floors, until the present handsome brick church was finished with the cornerstone laid in 1908. Bishop MALLALIEU who was of great inspiration to this congregation, bought for the church a gift of a large brass bell which still hangs in the belfry. As a member of the Central JURISDICTION, St. Paul was in the CENTRAL ALABAMA CONFERENCE, while her sister churches belonged to the ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA CONFERENCE, Southeastern Jurisdiction.

In Pensacola proper, United Methodism is now represented by sixteen churches with a membership of 10,525. Primary churches are: First Methodist, Gadsden Street, Myrtle Grove, St. Mark, Richard's Memorial and Warrington. First Church in 1970 reported 1,646 members.

PENSIONS, BOARD OF. The care of retired ministers has been a concern of Methodist Churches since the organization of the M.E. Church in 1784. There was at first provided a CHARTERED FUND—which even today continues to bring in modest returns; subsequently, showing that this matter was on the mind of the Church, the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1808, by the RESTRICTIVE RULES drawn up then, was forbidden to give the "produce" or profits of the PUBLISHING HOUSE to any cause other than that of the "superannuated and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows and orphans." This was at best but meager support for "worn-out" preachers, and through the years there came to be an increasing call for something better than this early penurious effort had proved to be. Various annual conferences after a time began to set apart out of their own funds monies for the support of their retired brethren, and philanthropic laymen provided retirement homes for ministers of their respective conferences. After a time the whole matter was taken over by the separate General Churches whose union came about to form what is now The United Methodist Church.

In the M.E. Church, South, there was created in 1866 in each annual conference a powerful committee known as the Joint Board of FINANCE. This became an institution in each annual conference, and these conference committees exerted great power in collecting and distributing monies for the conference claimants, as well as for other needed causes. Each annual conference came to depend heavily upon its Board of Finance to look after this matter.

In the M.E. Church eventually the Church itself created a Board of CONFERENCE CLAIMANTS and began to build a "Connecational Fund" which was administered by its central agency. In 1916 the Board of Conference Claimants became the Board of Pensions and Relief of the M.E. Church, and all the general funds were put under the control of that Board. It was thus enabled to correlate in a better way the whole matter of caring for the superannuates.

In the M.E. Church, South, as it became increasingly clear that a better integrated overhead organization was needed to care for all conference claimants, the General Conference in 1908 created a General Board of Finance and directed that it should be incorporated under the laws of MISSOURI. This Board a bit later promoted a churchwide Superannuate Endowment Fund, which added to its holdings appreciably.

The M.P. Church cared for its retired ministers in the same way as the M.E. Church did, that is chiefly through local conference collections and appropriations. But in time a general Superannuate Fund was created and the executive committee of that Church was given control of the Fund.

In 1939 at the organization of The Methodist Church, this whole matter of supporting the conference claimants was put under a Board of Pensions. This was organized as the Board of Pensions of The Methodist Church, incorporated in ILLINOIS, but it continued to carry on for a time the work of the boards and agencies of the separate uniting churches in order not to lose the funds which already had been devised by will and otherwise to the respective agencies looking after this matter.

Through the years 1939-1968, a better correlation was worked out by the separate boards and continuing agencies, and in 1968 at the organization of The United Methodist Church, there was created a General Board of Pensions to take over and look after this whole matter for the new and greatly enlarged Church.

The E.U.B. Church. As early as June 10, 1836 The Charitable Society was formed for the relief and support of "the itinerant superannuated and worn-out Ministers and Preachers of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION (in the United States of America), their Wives and Children, Widows and Orphans" (Articles of Incorporation). In these early years in the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST many annual conference pension programs were rapidly coming into existence.

This benevolent ministry had its beginning in the twentieth century, however, when Bishop S. C. BREYFOGEL decided that the Church should do something for the retired ministers and ministers' widows.

A legislative act of the 1911 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Evangelical Association in session at CLEVELAND, OHIO, brought the SUPERANNUATION FUND into existence. In preparation for church union with the Evangelical Association in 1922, the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH raised $312,750, thus making it possible for ministers of The United Evangelical Church to participate in benefits of the Superannuation Fund.

On Jan. 1, 1943, the Ministers Reserve Pension Plan came into existence. This plan became available for ministers of The Evangelical Church who were ordained after Jan. 1, 1943. A Pension Plan for Lay Employees of the Church was also inaugurated on Jan. 1, 1943.

Leaders in the denominational pension program of the Evangelical Association and since 1922 in The Evangelical Church were: Bishop S. C. Breyfogel, 1911-1935; George Johnson, 1911-1920; J. R. Niergarth, 1920-1938; and A. H. DOESCHER, 1934-1958.

While many worthy annual conference pension programs existed at a very early date in the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, it was not until 1921, when the General Conference was in session at INDIANAPOLIS, that the denominational Ministerial Pension and Annuity Plan was legislated into existence. This pension plan was the result of a study authorized by the 1917 General Conference.

Leadership in the Ministerial Pension and Annuity Plan was provided by H. H. Baish (1921-1939) and George A. Heiss (1939-1948).

The union of The Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ brought all the assets and liabilities of the two former pension programs under the direction of the Board of Pensions of The E.U.B. Church on Jan. 1, 1947. Offices of the Superannuation Fund at 1900 Superior Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, and the Ministerial Pension and Annuity Plan at 16 East Eighth Avenue, YORK, Pa., were moved to the U.B. Building, Fourth and Main Streets, DAYTON, OHIO, at that time. The Board of Pensions in July of 1960 was relocated in the new Administrative Offices Building, 601 West Riverview Avenue, Dayton, Ohio.

Pension legislation at the 1962 General Conference united the Superannuation Fund and the Ministerial Pension and Annuity Plan into the Senior Pension Plan. These two former ministerial pension plans had been closed to new entrants on Jan. 1, 1947.

Men who have served in various places of leadership in the Board of Pensions of the E.U.B. Church since 1947, are: A. H. Doescher (1947-1955), George A. Heiss (1947-1948), JOHN H. NESS, SR. (1948-1962), H. E. HULLER (1959-), G. L. Fleming (1961-), and Sherman A. Cravens (1967-).

During the long history of this benevolent enterprise the Board has gained added financial strength by grants from the PUBLISHING HOUSES, the BOARD OF PUBLICATION, gifts and bequests, as well as appropriations from the denominational Christian Service Fund.

The 1966 General Conference placed the assets of The Printing Establishment of the United Brethren in Christ in excess of $2,000,000 under the supervision of the Board of Pensions of The E.U.B. Church. The income from this Printing Establishment Fund is distributed annually for pension purposes in the annual conferences.

On Jan. 1, 1967, the assets of the Board of Pensions of The E.U.B. Church were in excess of $25,000,000. There were 3,166 ministers and lay persons enrolled in The Senior Plan (for ministers), The Ministers Reserve Pension Plan, and The Pension Plan for Lay Employees. In 1967 over $1,000,000 were distributed to over 1,200 annuitants.

The Discipline may be referred to at any time to ascertain such matters as the organization and membership of the Board, and the rules and procedures which govern the administering to the needs of the conference claimants are also set forth in detail. This particular section of the Book of Discipline has grown larger and larger through the years—necessarily so, as all manner of different cases affecting the claims and interests of various claimants must be ruled upon in an equitable way, thus establishing precedents which eventually become law.

The Board is directed to "compile and maintain complete service records of ministerial members in full connection, associate members, and probationary members of the Annual Conferences of The United Methodist Church and of lay pastors whose service may be related to potential annuity claims" (Discipline, 1968, P. 1377.10). While it is admitted that the General Church and annual conferences have yet to do much more than they are doing for their claimants—men worn out in the service of the Church, men compelled to retire at seventy-two years of age, and the widows and orphans of preachers, much has been accomplished to date. Efficient offices manned by able executives and secretaries with present headquarters at EVANSTON, ILL., are depended upon to look after this matter as it should be.

PENZOTTI, FRANCISCO G. (1851-1925), was a prodigious distributor of the Bible, whose evangelistic work touched almost all of the countries of South and Central America. During his lifetime he personally distributed 125,000 copies of the Bible. Under his direction more than 2,000,000 copies were distributed, and under his influence churches distributed another million.

Born in Italy, he emigrated as a boy to MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, where he established a carpenter shop of his own. At nineteen he married Josefa Sagastilbensa, his warmth toward the Roman Catholic Church having been cooled in a quarrel with the bishop over papers and fees connected with the wedding. He stopped going to Mass and dedicated himself to his carpentry, to study, and to his new home. However, he felt ill at ease. While he was trying to cheer a mood of despondency at a public dance hall, somebody gave him a copy of St. John's Gospel. This was in December 1875. The gift stirred anew a childhood interest in the restricted book, and he hurried home to read it with his wife.

Hearing that the whole Bible could be had at the Protestant chapel, he went and there met the man who had given him the book and two great Methodist preachers with whom his life henceforth was to be interwoven: John F. Thomson and ANDREW M. MILNE.

Penzotti became a regular attendee and brought his friends to the Protestant chapel. Yet he failed to feel the joy he saw in others, so he sought a pastoral interview with Milne. As they were talking, they were joined by THOMAS B. WOOD, who talked and prayed with them. During the prayer, Penzotti suddenly felt "a ray of divine light penetrate my soul." He called out: "I feel that Christ has entered my heart. I want to sing a hymn of gratitude to the Lord." The three rose and sang.

Penzotti became one of a team of fourteen young people who went from door to door in Montevideo, distributing Bibles and talking about Christ. The church grew as a result, but the greatest outcome was to prepare the young Penzotti for the work that was to immortalize his name. While he was trying to combine preaching with carpentry, someone one night set fire to his shop—his only source of support. Turning to prayer and the Bible, he found comfort in the words of John 13:7: "What I am doing you do not know now, but afterward you will understand."

The Methodist Church at Colonia Waldense needed a pastor, and Thomson and Milne saw that Penzotti was the person to fill the vacancy. At first he refused because of his lack of preparation, but he came to feel that it was the will of God and accepted.

He was in charge of the church there from 1879-87, but early he felt life too comfortable in the Waldensian colony and resolved to become a missionary to the entire continent. In 1883, at the age of thirty-two, he interrupted his pastoral work to make his first missionary journey, going to BOLIVIA with Milne. The eight-month journey was made by way of northern ARGENTINA and included travel into CHILE. The pair distributed 8,000 copies of the Scriptures. They were not the first Bible Society colporteurs to enter Bolivia, but they went knowing that a predecessor, Joseph Mongiardino, had been murdered by a fanatic crowd.

On his second journey, Penzotti was the leader, with two assistants. This was a thirteen-month trip reaching hundreds of villages in northern Argentina, Bolivia, and Chile. Events included a celebrated debate on the Scriptures with the Archbishop of Cochabamba (Bolivia), in which Penzotti came off the hero of the liberals and Masons. He returned to Uruguay exhausted.

Milne saw Penzotti's need for rest, and persuaded him that they should go together to LONDON. In November 1885, they set out, and in London conferred with officials of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY about Scripture distribution in Latin America. Then they returned home on a long circuit through South America, spreading Bibles all the way. They visited Trinidad and Curacao in the Caribbean, then landed in VENEZUELA. They preached and distributed Scriptures there and in Colombia, then visited ECUADOR where in a famous incident their books were confiscated at the customhouse. Entering PERU, they were welcomed and preached freely, perhaps unnoticed by the authorities. They also worked in Chile and Argentina before at last returning to Uruguay in December of 1886.

In a few months Penzotti had completed his pastoral work at Colonia Waldense, and then he was a pastor briefly at Rosario, Argentina. But at this point he took up the work of Bible distribution permanently, entering the service of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

He was sent to open a new Bible agency in Peru. Arriving with his family at the port city of Callao in July 1888, he began to distribute the Bible and preach in Spanish. So successful was he that the Anglicans (who were allowed to hold services in English) put a vacant chapel at his disposal. But the Roman Catholic clergy threatened to have the site dynamited, so he rented a house instead. As he moved about Peru, his services were often attacked, and persons who received his books were persecuted, excommunicated, and finally even imprisoned. At Arequipa in 1890 he was apprehended, charged by the local clergy with "clandestinely introducing immoral and corrupting books [Bibles]." His books were confiscated, and he had to spend two weeks in jail. He made the jail into a church, and under his preaching one of the guards was converted. He was released through personal intervention by the president of the Republic, General Cadenas.

After a trip into Bolivia, Penzotti was arrested on July 26, 1890, as he arrived at his home in Callao. He now had to spend eight months in Casas Matas, called the most frightful prison in America. But this time the consciences of liberal people were astir. In Peru and all over America and Europe the "Penzotti Case" was known as a case for religious liberty. The Peruvian constitution did not allow other faiths besides the Roman Catholic, but diplomatic pressures were applied. Worldwide distribution was given to a snapshot taken by a North American reporter, showing Penzotti behind the iron gate of Casas Matas. The widespread interest succeeded in opening the prison door for him on Easter Eve, March 28, 1891.

The next year he was appointed to open a new Bible agency in Central America. After visiting PANAMA, he entered COSTA RICA, where he organized a party of six to visit all the Central American countries. Disease overtook the party, and by the time they reached Managua, Nicaragua, all but Penzotti were sick, three actually dying. After burying the dead, Penzotti sent the two survivors back to Costa Rica and continued alone to GUATEMALA. At Guatemala City he established the Bible agency and was joined there by his family.

In 1906 he received an appointment to supervise the Bible agency at BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, succeeding his old friend, Andrew Milne. By the time he could take up the appointment, in January 1908, Milne had died.

Penzotti continued his work in the Rio de la Plata area until 1921, when he retired as executive secretary, to be succeeded by one of his two sons. (The son, Pablo Penzotti, served the agency from 1921-46.) Though no longer secretary, Francisco Penzotti continued to be the evangelist until his death, July 27, 1925.

He has been variously described as "a hero of the evangelical cause in Latin America" and "apostle of liberty and truth." Others have seen parallels with JOHN WESLEY in his personal conversion experience, his evangelistic spirit, and the thousands of miles he covered on foot and muleback. A fitting memorial was given to him when, in 1956, the Bible Society gave the name "Penzotti Institute" to the training program it set up to prepare men for the work of Bible distribution, two by two, from house to house.

PEOPLE'S METHODIST CHURCH was formed in NORTH CAROLINA by members of the M.E. Church, South, who did not wish to join the Methodist merger of 1939. They are a conservative and holiness group with approximately 1,000 members in twenty-five congregations. They operate a school, John Wesley Bible College, in GREENSBORO, N. C.

PEORIA, ILLINOIS, U.S.A., with a population of 125,736 (1970), is beautifully situated along and above the west bank of the Illinois River, in the heart of rich farm land.

Methodism began in Peoria as early as 1824, when JESSE WALKER was appointed "Missionary to the Indians" in the vicinity of Fort Clark. He had moved westward from VIRGINIA in 1806 with WILLIAM MCKENDREE (later bishop), first to Southern Illinois, then to the Peoria territory. In 1825 he started First Methodist Church of CHICAGO. The first permanent class was formed in 1833, with seven members. Stephen R. Beggs came as pastor in 1839 and held meetings in Daniel Brestel's carpenter shop. He led the settlers in erecting the first church building, made of logs, and travelled as far as St. Louis to raise $65 toward the costs. Shortly an addition was necessary, making the building 40 by 43 feet.

The second building was completed in 1849—a brick structure, 60 by 90 feet, at Fulton and Madison Streets. PETER CARTWRIGHT was an official preacher here. In 1856 Peoria ceased to be a part of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE and became a member of the new CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. The third building, a two-story brick, costing $35,000 (including the site) was completed at Sixth and Franklin Streets in 1884 and enlarged in 1891. This now and since early days has always been called First Church.

In 1910 WILLIAM E. SHAW was appointed pastor of First Church. Two long talked-of events matured under his leadership. First, Madison Avenue Church (started as a missionary project in 1855) merged its membership of seventy-five with First Church in 1914. Second, a splendid new building was erected of Bedford Stone at the corner of Perry Avenue and Hamilton Boulevard at a cost of $133,762 (for lot, building and equipment) and dedicated June 18, 1916. The twenty-two years of Shaw's ministry were years of large growth, for he was an able preacher, and a leader with sound judgment, tact, diplomacy and untiring zeal. The influence of his life was wide-spread, then and even today.

Many distinguished men have served First Church in its long years and its membership and staff and spiritual influence have increased accordingly. In 1957, under the leadership of Robert Harvey Bodine, a fine, new administration building was erected adjoining the main structure at a cost of $894,325. Appropriately, it is named The William E. Shaw Memorial Church House.

The First German Methodist congregation erected a building at Fifth and Monson Streets in 1854. A second building, costing $7,000, was built between 1865-68. This congregation helped organize and build a church for the Sanger Street Mission in 1889, and this had regularly appointed pastors until it disbanded in 1921, with its members uniting with the German Church. A third building was completed in 1890 at a cost of $20,000. In 1918 the name of the church was changed to the St. John's, and in 1925 this went into the Central Illinois Conference, (MEC), the German Conference being dissolved. In 1950 the congregation moved to the East Bluff, with services being held in a public school until the first part of a three phase building program was completed. In this same year the name of the church was changed to Forrest Hill. In 1952 one section was formally opened, and presently other units make provision for worship, education and administration, at a cost of over $100,000.

Grace Church started as a Sunday school in 1963 or 1864 at the outskirts of town. The first building was dedicated in September 1897. It was known for a time as the Forrest Hill Church, but in 1939 the name was changed to University Avenue Church. Other structures were erected. The present sanctuary was begun in 1951, and an educational unit, costing $147,000, called Cartwright Hall, was completed in 1960.

Hale Memorial Church was organized by members of First Church in 1868 and dedicated its first building at Main and High Streets Jan. 14, 1869. In 1901 a new stone structure replaced the old building. The congregation changed the name to Epworth Church in 1953 and completed a new building in 1954 on Columbia Terrace in a residential section, nearer Bradley University.

Wesley Church was begun as a mission in 1870 in the south end of the city. Its members affiliated with First Church in 1926.

The Averyville Church (organized in the north end of town in 1894) built a lovely edifice in 1930, under the pastorate of T. Reighton Jones, and took the name of Madison Avenue Church.

Bethel Methodist was begun in 1911 and has long been a part of the community, serving the Negro people. It is now a member of the Central Illinois Conference.

Membership in Peoria United Methodist churches, according to the 1970 Minutes, is: Bethel—235; Epworth—399; First—4,340; Forrest Hill—863; Grace—347; Madison Avenue—589; and University Avenue—2,202, a total of 8,975. First Church has long been the largest Methodist church in the North Central Jurisdiction. Its total budget in 1970 was $275,000, $55,000 of which was for benevolences. There are five ministers on the church staff.

Peoria District, in the Central Illinois Conference, reported 37,092 members in 1970. Methodism in Peoria observed its centennial in 1924 and looks forward to its one hundred and fiftieth year in 1974.

Methodist Hospital of Central Illinois is a general hospital of 550 beds, with great new construction presently underway. The hospital's early years were precarious and uncertain. The move that began the hospital was prompted in 1898 by three deaconesses of the M.E. Church who at first saw the need for a home for deaconesses, and later were persuaded by Peoria doctors to combine this project with a small hospital of eighteen-bed capacity. Until 1917 it carried the name "The Deaconess Home and Hospital." As the deaconess' effort waned, the need for full hospital services in Central Illinois grew. The small hospital was increased in capacity by additions in 1910, 1918, 1924, and 1953.

The Methodist Hospital is under the sponsorship of the Central Illinois Conference of The United Methodist Church, and is governed by a Board of Trustees of thirty-six members. As provided in the by-laws, eighteen trustees must be ministers in active relationship to the Conference. The lay members come from many denominations although at least nine are required to be members of The United Methodist Church. These trustees serve without pay or remuneration of any kind.

Methodist Hospital is classified as a "base hospital" and as such has full facilities and a staff competent to perform a full range of delicate and intricate surgical procedures. There are eighty-four physicians and surgeons on its active staff, and the courtesy staff numbers 240 men and women. More than sixty percent of the hospital is of the most modern construction, fully air-conditioned, this section being opened in 1953 and 1960. There are fifteen operating suites which offer every convenience to surgeons.

The hospital is fully accredited by all proper accrediting agencies. It maintains a series of schools as a part of its responsibility, including a School of Medical Technology, School of X-Ray Technology, School of Surgical Nursing, training for practical nurses, a fully accredited School of Nursing, and a school for resident physicians in various specialties. Located near downtown Peoria, the hospital properties occupy more than two square blocks and are valued at more than $11 million. A full-time chaplain, an ordained Methodist minister, gives spiritual oversight to more than 1,000 employees, several hundred students and approximately 480 patients.

JOHN R. PEPPER

PEPPER, JOHN ROBERTSON (1850-1931), American merchant and Sunday school administrator, was born in Montgomery County, Va., on April 6, 1850, and was educated in the public schools and Christiansburg Commercial College. In early manhood he entered the wholesale grocery business in MISSISSIPPI and was president of companies in Greenville, Greenwood, Yazoo City, and Rosedale. He then went to MEMPHIS, Tenn., and became president of the Memphis Machine Works.

A leading layman of the M.E. Church, South, Pepper was especially interested in Sunday school work and was for nearly fifty years a Sunday school superintendent. He was a student of methods of religious education and wrote and published five books between 1885 and 1929. These were Modern Sunday School Superintendent, Quiver Tips for Lovers of Sunday School Work, Tried Plans for Sunday School Work, Thirty Years at the Superintendent's Desk, and Well-Nigh Fifty Years at the Superintendent's Desk.

Pepper was one of the founders of the Southern Assembly at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., and was one of the original thirteen cottage owners in 1913. In 1923 and again in 1928 he was chairman of the Board of Trustees. In the days of financial difficulty he made large contributions to the Assembly; he purchased stock and loaned money, and in 1929 he donated the stock and notes for $10,500 to the institution.

Pepper died at Memphis on March 31, 1931.

ELMER T. CLARK

PEREZ, CARLOS (1911-), Cuban pastor and college president, was born at Cardenas, CUBA on July 24, 1911. He married Juana Maria Sardiña in April of 1935. He studied at "La Progresiva," at CANDLER COLLEGE in HAVANA and SCARRITT and Peabody Colleges, NASHVILLE, Tenn., and in the Methodist Seminary (Havana); and received the Ph.D. degree from Havana University in 1934. He served several pastoral charges in Cuba and PUERTO RICO and was a district superintendent twice in Cuba. He was director of Colegio Pinson, 1935-38; of Havana Central School, 1940-46; and of Candler College, 1946-60. He organized Candler University, 1958, which was the first Protestant university in all Latin America. He was a clerical delegate from Cuba to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in 1964 and also to the special General Conference of 1966. At present he is serving in Ponce, Puerto Rico.

GARFIELD EVANS

ASUNCION PEREZ

PEREZ, ASUNCION A. (1893-1967), Filipino social worker and first woman cabinet member was born in Casan, Marinduque, on Aug. 15, 1893. She was educated at the MANILA High School (1915), the University of the PHILIPPINES (B.A. in 1917), the San Francisco Training School, and received honorary degrees from the Philippine Women's University (doctor of laws in human welfare), the Central Philippine University, the University of Wisconsin and the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER (doctor of humanities). She also received the Presidential Merit Award. She was married to Cirilo Perez on Aug. 18, 1918, and they had three children: Ernesto, Rebecca, and Edwin.

Returning from the United States in 1920, she joined the Far Eastern College where she taught until 1924 when she started as a social worker in charge of civilian relief for the American Red Cross (Philippine Chapter). She received her first presidential assignment from Senate President Manuel L. Quezon who sent her to America to make representation with American leaders to convince them not to send Filipino workers back to Manila during the depression. In 1925 she was named the executive secretary of the Associated Charities of Manila (Family Welfare Agency) which was absorbed by the government in 1941 and named the Bureau of Public Welfare. She was made chief of the Public Assistance Office and, after six months, director of public welfare. When World War II ended she was appointed superintendent of the Relief Office for the Greater Manila Area, supervising the rehabilitation of war victims. With the re-establishment of the Philippine Commonwealth in 1945, President Sergio Osmeña designated her as the director of public welfare, a position which she held until 1947. In the following year (1948) President Manuel Roxas appointed her the social welfare administrator where she sat in the president's cabinet, a position she held under four succeeding presidents. Also in 1948, President Elpidio Quirino made her the chairman, with cabinet rank, of the President's Action Committee on Social Amelioration which was entrusted with the physical, social, and economic welfare of the displaced individuals arising from the Hukbalahap activities.

Together with her husband she joined Marking's Guerillas on Oct. 20, 1942, to fight the Japanese invaders of the Philippines. They were captured by the Japanese on Feb. 3, 1944, and incarcerated in Fort Santiago. Her husband was executed by the Japanese and after enduring severe torture she was set free on May 25, 1944.

After her retirement from government service Mrs. Perez continued her social work in various fields. She became president of the Philippine Wesleyan College in Cabanatuan City and served actively in several humanitarian and civic organizations including the Philippine Mental Health Association, Children's Garden (an orphanage), Friendship, Inc., and the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

E. BENSON PERKINS

PERKINS, ERNEST BENSON (1881-), British Methodist minister, was born July 14, 1881 in Leicester, and was educated at Alderman Newton's School there. Accepted for the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1903, he served in Jersey for a year before going for theological training to Handsworth College, BIRMINGHAM. He early distinguished himself by his forceful advocacy of social reform, which found wide scope both in his superintendencies of city missions in NOTTINGHAM (1916-20), Birmingham (1925-35), and SHEFFIELD (1935-39), and also in his five years of service as Assistant Secretary to the Temperance and Social Welfare Department (1920-25). In 1939 he was appointed one of the Secretaries for the Department of Chapel Affairs. He retained that office until 1952, a crucial period during which he exercised a very important influence in directing the post-war reconstruction of Methodist property. His indefatigable labors were recognized by his election as President of the METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1948.

Benson Perkins was always active outside as well as within his own church. He was a prominent member of many national organizations, such as the Churches' Committee on Gambling, the National Federal Free Church Council (of which he was elected Moderator in 1954), and the BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, of which he was

Vice-President 1952-54. In 1952 he superannuated after almost fifty years in the active ministry, but until 1961 he ably fulfilled his duties as Joint Secretary (with ELMER T. CLARK) of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, to which he had been appointed in 1951. His best known writings include With Christ in the Bull Ring [i.e. at Birmingham] (1935), The Methodist Church Builds Again (with Albert Hearn, 1946), Gambling in English Life (the Beckly Lecture, 1950), Methodist Preaching-Houses and the Law (Wesley Historical Society Lecture, 1952), and his autobiography, So Appointed, which appeared in 1963. He was awarded an honorary LL.D. by CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA in 1956.

FRANK BAKER

PERKINS, JOE J. (1874-1960), and LOIS CRADDOCK PERKINS (1887-), American Methodist churchmen and philanthropists, who have made significant contributions to Texas Methodism. Mr. Perkins was born on a farm in Lamar County, Texas, on March 7, 1874. In early life he moved to the cattle raising part of the state, in 1910 reaching Wichita Falls, his home for the remainder of his life. Mrs. Perkins was born in China Springs, Texas, on Feb. 8, 1887. She attended SOUTHWEST UNIVERSITY, and went to Wichita Falls in 1913 as a teacher. She married Mr. Perkins in 1918. Perkins' first business effort was a department store in Decatur, which eventually led to a chain of stores in North Texas. Later he engaged—usually with others—in mining activities, in ranching, in banking, and in the development of oil leases and property. Mr. and Mrs. Perkins' first loyalty, however, was to Methodist causes and projects. They have served their local church in many capacities, he as trustee and steward, she in educational and missions work. Both have been delegates to annual and GENERAL CONFERENCES. They have helped support many civic enterprises and especially youth character-building agencies. They have contributed generously to many Methodist agencies, such as the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE pension fund, DALLAS Methodist Hospital, Methodist Children's Home at Waco, ALASKA Methodist Church, Anchorage, WESTERN METHODIST ASSEMBLY at Fayetteville, Ark., Southwestern University, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and most of all to PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at Southern Methodist University. The latter gift has amounted to about $12,000,000 including a new plant and an endowment. Giving by Mr. and Mrs. Perkins was always a joint action by husband and wife, and it was a natural outpouring of their concern for the cause involved, and never a mere financial contribution, as evidenced by their giving much of their time as trustee, board and committee member, and chairmen to various causes. Bishop PAUL E. MARTIN, for many years pastor of Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, called Mr. Perkins "the greatest layman I have ever known." Mr. Perkins died on Sept. 15, 1960. Mrs. Perkins has continued the same concern for Methodist enterprises. She has been awarded an honorary L.H.D. by Southwestern University and the LL.D. degree by Southern Methodist University. She was a member of the executive committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, 1961-68. Dean JOSEPH D. QUILLIAN, JR., of Perkins School of Theology, has written that Mr. and Mrs. Perkins have given more to Texas Methodism than any other two persons—not simply of their means but also of their spirit. The Perkins heritage of churchmanship and philanthropy continues to the third generation through their daughter Elizabeth (Mrs. Charles N. Prothro), and the Prothro sons and daughter.

PERKINS, WILLIAM CHRISTIE (1868-1955), American lay leader and business executive, was born Sept. 27, 1868 in BALTIMORE, Md.

Starting to work at the age of twelve, Perkins spent his entire life in the hardware business. In 1917 he became associated with the American Chain and Cable Company in PITTSBURGH, where he became a prominent participant in the work of the M.P. Church.

His outstanding service was as President of the Board of Publications of the M.P. Church. He was a delegate to many annual and GENERAL CONFERENCES. In 1943-44 he was President of the Methodist Social Union of the PITTSBURGH ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

In 1947 Perkins retired after thirty years service with American Chain and Cable and moved back to Baltimore, where he died July 28, 1955. He is interred in Woodlawn Cemetery, Baltimore.

PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, Dallas, Texas, grew out of a desire for a Methodist theological school west of the Mississippi. Ministers serving that region had received their education at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas. When Southern Methodist University opened in 1915, as the official university for the church west of the Mississippi, a school of theology was included. In 1945, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. PERKINS made provision for gifts exceeding $10,000,000, and the school moved from its original location to a sixteen-acre tract on the Southern Methodist campus. In 1951, seven new buildings, including the Perkins Chapel, classroom buildings, library, and dormitories, were dedicated. Later another classroom building and dormitory were erected. This stands out as one of the most significant developments in the history of Protestant theological education. The Bridwell Library, given by J. S. Bridwell, is part of the theological campus.

The seminary's degree program includes the B.D., M.R.E. (Religious Education), S.T.M. (Master of Sacred Theology), and M.S.M. (Sacred Music) degrees. The Ph.D. degree is available in cooperation with the university.

PERKS, ROBERT WILLIAM (1849-1934), British Methodist, industrialist, and politician, was born on April 24, 1849, at Brentford, London, qualified as a solicitor, and from 1876-1901 was in partnership with HENRY FOWLER. Specializing in railway law, he became associated with a firm which built railways and docks in many parts of the world. From 1892-1910 he was Liberal M.P. for Louth, Lincolnshire, and a firm supporter of Lord Rosebery's liberal imperialism. Perks was originator and, from 1906-8, chairman of a group of 200 Nonconformist M.P.'s in the House of Commons.

From 1902-6 he was chairman of the Metropolitan District Railway. He was created a baronet in 1908. In 1878 he was one of the first group of laymen admitted to the Wesleyan Conference. He was an originator and the senior treasurer of the TWENTIETH-CENTURY FUND. He worked for METHODIST UNION and was the first vice-president of the united Methodist Church in 1932. He died on Nov. 30, 1934, in London.

PERRILL, FRED MAXSON (1882-1946), American missionary to INDIA and noted editor there, was born at Mentor,

PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, DALLAS, TEXAS

Kan., Dec. 4, 1882. He attended KANSAS WESLEYAN and BAKER UNIVERSITIES, graduating from Baker in 1903, and from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1906. He came to India in October 1906, and joined the BENGAL CONFERENCE. He was ordained deacon and elder before his twenty-fourth birthday. His appointments were missionary to Muzaffarpur; missionary in Arrah; superintendent of Ballia District, superintendent of Cawnpore (now Kanpur) District; and editor of The Indian Witness. He married Mary Voigt (sister of Bishop EDWIN VOIGT) May 5, 1911.

From his earliest years in India Perrill was a popular correspondent for The Indian Witness and for the church papers in America. He became editor of The Indian Witness in 1929, and continued for seventeen years at the helm of that official organ of Methodism in Southern Asia. He suffered a heat stroke on a railway journey in North India while en route to the mountains after exhausting labor, and died at the Clara Swain Hospital in BAREILLY, June 12, 1946. He is buried in Bareilly. His only son, Charles Voigt Perrill was then, and for some years before and after, superintendent of that renowned institution, and is now superintendent of the Creighton-Freeman Hospital in VRINDABAN which he is relocating between Vrindaban and Matruura.

PERRONET, CHARLES, EDWARD, and VINCENT, were British Evangelicals. Vincent Perronet (1693-1785), vicar of Shoreham, Kent, first met JOHN WESLEY in 1746. Both John and CHARLES WESLEY visited him and preached in his church. He became their friend and adviser. He attended the Conference of 1747, and it was to him that John Wesley addressed A Plain Account of the People Called Methodists. Not for nothing was Perronet called "the archbishop of Methodism."

Edward Perronet (1721-1792), the hymn writer ("All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name"), was the eldest son of Vincent Perronet, and itinerated for Wesley until he joined the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON and her connection. His open antipathy to the Established Church led him finally to become the pastor of a dissenting congregation in Canterbury. It was at Edward Perronet's house that Charles Wesley met MRS. VAZEILLE, who had aroused the interest of his brother John. When Perronet told Charles that his brother was thinking of marrying the lady, Charles "refused his company to the chapel and retired to mourn with my faithful Sally."

John Wesley had great admiration for Edward Perronet and wanted to hear him preach, but Perronet seemed determined that he should not. Seeing Perronet in his congregation one day, Wesley calmly announced that the former would preach the next morning. Perronet, feeling he could not go against Wesley's wishes, appeared in the pulpit at the proper time, announced the hymn, led in prayer, and then explained that he had not been asked to preach and had not consented to do so, but would deliver at that service the finest sermon that had ever been preached. He then read the Sermon on the Mount with no word of comment, after which he brought the service to a close!

Edward Perronet and his brother Charles, both Methodist preachers, favored separation of their group from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND when that question was under discussion. This movement was opposed by the Wesleys.

Perronet had written The Mitre, a Sacred Poem, in 1757, sharply criticizing the Church. At Wesley's protest, he discontinued selling it, but continued giving copies of it away. This caused a break between Perronet and the Wesleys, and also led to an estrangement between Perronet and the Countess of Huntingdon, whose chaplain he had been at Canterbury. He then served an independent dissenting church in that city until his death, Jan. 2, 1792.

Charles Perronet (1723-1776), the second son of Vincent Perronet, also itinerated in Methodism until in 1754 his advocacy of separation from the Church incurred Wesley's displeasure.

MRS. J. W. PERRY

PERRY, CLARA TUCKER (1870-1964), American missionary leader, was born at NASHVILLE, Tenn., on Jan. 4, 1870, and was educated at the Nashville College for Young Ladies. On Oct. 19, 1893, she was married to JOHN WILEY PERRY, member of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE and secretary of the Home Department of the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South.

Mrs. Perry became a leader in the Woman's Missionary Society of her Church. In 1907 she was elected Vice President of the Woman's Board of Home Missions and in 1910 became a Vice President of the Woman's Missionary Council, which was formed by the union of the Home and Foreign Boards. In 1931 she was elected President of the Council and remained in this office until the unification of the three large branches of American Methodism in 1939.

She was President of the Holston Conference Home and Foreign Missionary Societies in 1911 and again in 1920. She was the only woman member of the Commission on Methodist Union, a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1922, the Uniting Conference in 1939, and the first General Conference of The Methodist Church after unification in 1940. Her other Church activities included membership in the ECUMENICAL METHODIST COUNCIL, delegate to the Foreign Missions Conference, president of the Board of Managers of the Woman's Christian College in CHINA and EWAH COLLEGE in KOREA, member of the board of Ginling College in China and of the executive committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America.

After the unification of American Methodism, Mrs. Perry was for four years a member of the Board of Missions and Church Extension, serving on the Woman's Division and also the Division of Foreign Missions.

Mrs. Perry died on Aug. 4, 1964, at Chattanooga, Tenn., at the age of ninety-four. She was survived by one son, Wiley Perry, and one daughter, Katherine Perry.

ELMER T. CLARK

J. W. PERRY

PERRY, JOHN WILEY (1866-1954), American minister and missionary administrator, was born in Scott County, Va., on Feb. 8, 1866. He studied in the public schools and in a small private school called Shoemaker College. He served one year as a supply preacher on the Erwin Mission in 1886 and then went to VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, from which he graduated in 1891.

In 1892 he joined the HOLSTON CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and was sent to West Radford for two years. His other appointments in order were Centenary Church in KNOXVILLE, Highland Park in CHATTANOOGA, Sweetwater, Abingdon, Church Street Church in Knoxville, Morristown, presiding elder of the Chattanooga District, Conference Missionary Secretary, presiding elder on the Morristown District and the Knoxville District.

In 1922 he was elected by the General Conference as secretary of the Home Division of the Board of MISSIONS, in which office he remained for twelve years. During this period he rendered important service in connection with PAINE COLLEGE, an institution for Negroes at Augusta, Ga. When he relinquished the position of missionary secretary in a reorganization of the Board of Missions he returned to the Holston Conference and served four years as presiding elder of the Chattanooga District and five years as pastor at Abingdon, Va. He retired in 1942.

As a leader of his Conference Perry was ten times elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, including the Uniting Conference in 1939 and the first General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940.

On Oct. 19, 1893, he married Clara Tucker of Nashville, Tenn., who later became the president of the Woman's Missionary Council. They had two sons and one daughter.

Perry died at Chattanooga, Tenn., on March 5, 1954, and was buried in Emory, Va.

Journal of the Holston Conference, 1954. ELMER T. CLARK

PERSECUTION OF METHODISTS IN ENGLAND. It was inevitable that Methodism should be persecuted because it was opposed to so many aspects of eighteenth-century religious and social life. Dishonest tradesmen found that their livelihood was threatened; the gentry resented criticism by the Methodists and feared revolution; the clergy was enraged by the rebukes of the Methodists and feared a revival of "enthusiasm."

The Mobs. Usually "King Mob" was the tool used by Methodism's opponents. Mobs were easily hired, made drunk, and then directed to plunder Methodist homes, destroy meeting houses, and wound Methodist men, women, and children. The preachers bore the worst of the mobs' attacks and some of them were actually martyred by the rabble.

The Law. Many magistrates were furiously hostile toward Methodism and were prepared to lead the mobs. Methodists were frequently denied legal redress by the courts, and many of them were sent to prison or pressed into the armed forces. The law, far from repressing persecution, became another tool of the persecutors, although Methodism was never officially suppressed as a matter of government policy.

Literary Persecution. Methodism was satirized in pamphlets, while clergymen thundered anti-Methodist sermons from their pulpits and published their attacks as broad sheets. The press, the stage, and the pulpit became weapons in the hands of the persecutors.

Later Persecutions. This general pattern of persecution persisted after Methodism became divided. In the nineteenth century, many of the social and religious conditions against which Methodism had first protested still remained, and both the Bible Christians and the Primitive Methodists were persecuted, especially in the villages.

D. D. WILSON

PERSEVERANCE, FINAL. The doctrine of the Final Perseverance of the Saints, often popularly expressed in the maxim, "Once saved, always saved," is a natural part of the strict Calvinist system, and was a subject of controversy in the times of Wesley, and since. Clearly, if Election to salvation is unconditional, if a man once finds himself in a state of salvation he is bound to continue in it to the end of his life, and to arrive in heaven. He may appear to stumble upon the path of life, but he cannot finally fall. Wesley called this position in question, "... The Calvinists hold . . . that a true believer in Christ cannot possibly fall from grace. The Arminians hold, that a true believer may 'make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience;' that he may fall, not only foully, but finally, so as to perish forever." (John Wesley The Question, 'What is an Arminian?' Answered, 1770) (See also ARMINIUS.)

In his opposition to Calvinism's syndrome of sovereign election, irresistible grace, and the final perseverance of the elect, we see one of the properly "Arminian" emphases of John Wesley. The position that the elect believer cannot ultimately fall away from his condition of grace was considered an item for assurance within Calvin's theology. To John Wesley such a position could only contribute to gross carelessness on the part of the believers and there was such a thing as "falling from grace." Profoundly true though it was, that "God is at work" enabling the believer both to will and to do of His good pleasure, it was equally true that the believer must "work out" his salvation "with fear and trembling."

Indeed, continued Wesley, "a believer need never again come into condemnation," need never "come into a state of doubt, or fear, or darkness. . . ." (Minutes for the Conference of 1744, question 10 for Monday, June 25). Nevertheless, "a man may forfeit the free gift of God, either by sins of omission or commission." (Ibid, question 11) How important, therefore, for every believer to beware, "lest his heart be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin; . . . lest he should sink lower and lower, till he wholly fall away, till he become as salt that hath lost its savour: for if he thus sin wilfully, after we have received the experimental 'knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins' . . ." (Sermon on the Mount, IV, i, 8, 1747). Wesley contrasted that "heaviness through manifold temptations," which is the common experience of believers with the possible return to the "wilderness" state characterized by the absence of any vital communion with the living God.

John Calvin had based his confidence in the final perseverance of the elect on Scriptural promises; such "assurance," in the case of the individual believer, was Scripturally-derived. Wesley felt the testimony of Scripture, however, included circumstances wherein true believers could finally fall; "that one who is holy or righteous in the judgment of God himself may nevertheless so fall from God as to perish everlastingly." (Serious Thoughts upon the Perseverance of the Saints; standard reference, for instance, was to Ezekiel 18:24) "Assurance," for Wesley, was a much more empirical phenomenon—associated with the believer's present confidence in the gift of justifying grace, wherein the love of God was manifest to the believer through the inward workings of the Holy Spirit. (Romans 5:5)

For the comfort which Calvin saw in the doctrine of final perseverance (for the elect believer!), Wesley emphasized rather the assurance of salvation through the witness of the spirit (see ASSURANCE), and the exhortation to "go on unto perfection." In the Wesleyan theology of grace, the anticipation of entire sanctification (itself a gift of grace) served as a corrective to the believer's "falling away." Augmenting such expectancy, of course, was the prime importance of continuing in the way of the "means of grace," continuing to implement the workings of Divine grace through the disciplines of worship, Bible study, prayer, sacrificial service.

Perseverance in grace, therefore, was conditioned upon the believer's persevering! Although the believer continued dependent upon atoning, redeeming grace throughout the course of his salvation, nevertheless—for Wesley—such grace (as seen through Scripture) must be considered finally resistible, the Spirit could finally be quenched. Thus the believer is "saved from the fear, though not from the possibility, of falling away from the grace of God." (Sermon I. ii. 4.)

LELAND SCOTT

PERSSON, JOSEF A. (1888-1964), Swedish missionary to AFRICA, was born in Stockholm, Oct. 14, 1888. His mother had herself first felt the call to the mission field. A poor widow, she brought up her son and was glad to send him away when God's call came to him. As a young man of eighteen he was one of the first two missionaries sent out by the Sweden Annual Conference in 1907. His first place was a primitive printing plant in Cambini, Inhambane, MOZAMBIQUE. Persson picked up the foreign language from the lips of his native helpers. So he learned to know the native languages, Chopi, Tonga, and Tswa. He gave the natives a literature, beginning with a primer and a grammar, a Tswa-English dictionary, Bible studies, and several other books. He crowned his work with a translation of the Bible into Tswa, which he thoroughly revised before his death. He settled down in Johannesburg, Union of SOUTH AFRICA, acting as pastor and district superintendent, and during the Second World War he served also as bishop's deputy. He developed the printing office in Johannesburg, the Central Mission Press in Cleveland, Transvaal, to be an important help for several missions in South Africa. He was active for more than fifty years, and crowds of friends, black and white, followed him when he was laid to rest in a jungle grave in October, 1964. Two of his sons are active in the work of the church.

PERTH, Australia, is the capital of AUSTRALIA's largest state, Western Australia, whose population has not quite reached a million people. Because of the discovery of vast quantities of minerals in Western Australia in recent years, the potential of Perth would appear to know no limits.

Kingswood College is a University College for men within the University of Western Australia. It was opened in 1963 by the Prime Minister of Australia, Sir Robert Gordon Menzies. It occupies a site of over five acres in a commanding position on Stirling Highway, Nedlands, a southern suburb of Perth. It has accommodation for one hundred and thirty-three students, including tutors. It is planned to increase this number to 250. Men of all denominations and faiths are admitted. All faculties are represented in the College and it is also the training center for men studying for the Methodist ministry.

The governing body is a council of nineteen, with the President and Secretary of the Methodist Conference ex-officio members. Two members are elected from the University Senate, two from the Academic Staff of the University, and the remainder, ministers and laymen, are elected annually by the Methodist Conference. General supervision over studies is exercised by a staff of about twelve tutors. A restricted number of nonresidential students is permitted to join the tutorial classes.

The Theological Institution established in 1912, now named the Barclay Theological Hall, is located on the college grounds. The College was built by gifts from Methodist people throughout the State, from business houses and companies, and by substantial contributions from the Commonwealth and State Governments.

Methodist Ladies College, Claremont, a southern suburb of Perth, is situated on Stirling Highway on thirteen acres of land overlooking Freshwater Bay. A lovely reach of the Swan River. It was founded in 1907 and now has an enrolment of six hundred and seventy-three fee-paying scholars. In addition to preparing girls to enter the University, the school offers courses in Commercial Subjects and in Domestic Arts.

In 1951 a day school for girls in South Perth, St. Anne's, was purchased by the Council and developed as a branch of M.L.C. It has become a flourishing school under its principal, Mrs. M. B. Way. In 1964 its name was changed from Methodist Ladies College, South Perth, to "Penrhos" but as yet it has not achieved its independence. Both schools are controlled by the one Council, a rather large group appointed annually by the Methodist Conference.

The Principal of the College is Walter Shepherd, and the Chaplain is D. McCaskill. Two deaconesses have been appointed by the Church to work at the schools.

Wesley College in South Perth is a day and boarding school for boys situated on twenty-one acres of land on the south-eastern bank of the Swan River. The foundation stone was laid on Nov. 11, 1922 by the Premier of Western Australia, Sir James Mitchell and the school opened in February 1923 with J. F. Ward as its first Headmaster. The school grew so rapidly that the College Council soon realized that it could not meet the pressing needs of the school. In 1926 the Annual Conference of the Methodist Church of Western Australia considered the problem

The Theological Institution, Western Australia, was established by the Methodist Conference of 1912, with Brian Wibberley as principal. Accommodation was provided in the buildings of the Perth Central Methodist Mission. Local preachers and Christian workers were permitted to attend classes with the theological students. The first World War disrupted this work and it was not recommenced until 1923, when J. W. Grove was appointed principal. Wesley College became the training center in 1927 and theological students were prepared for the Diploma of the Melbourne College of Divinity. The growing need for ministers with University training eventually led the Western Australia Conference to send its matriculated theologists to the Theological Halls in the Eastern States. This policy was continued until Kingswood College was founded in 1963 within the University of Western Australia. The Theological Institution, now named the Barclay Theological Hall, was located within the College, with Robert Maddox as director. Here students are able to take degrees in secular disciplines as well as in Divinity. The cost of the maintenance of the Hall is met by a levy upon the whole of the Church in Western Australia. The Presbyterian and Congregational Churches in this State are cooperative and are contributing to it both teaching staff and students.

and requested the Trustees of the Wesley Church Central Methodist Mission, Perth, a group of very able and influential men, controlling considerable financial resources, to take over the financial responsibility and management of the College. The Trustees then became the College Council. In 1965 steps were taken to release the Trustees from sole responsibility and the College Council was enlarged.

The School provides tuition from Kindergarten to the School Leaving Certificate Standard (Matriculation) and prepares boys to enter the professions, the commercial and business life of the city and the university. It has an enrolment of six hundred boys of whom one hundred and fifty-eight are boarders.

The Headmaster is Clive Hamer, and the Chaplain is B. R. Angus.

PERU is a republic on the west coast of South America, extending 1,400 miles from ECUADOR to CHILE. The capital is LIMA. The area is 514,059 square miles, and the population (1969) is estimated at 13,172,000. The north-south ranges of the Andes Mountains, having deep valleys between, separate the country into long strips of highly diversified characteristics, with only slight communications to bind them together. The inhabitants of the varied sectors are as diverse as the terrain. Ten peaks of the Peruvian Andes reach at least 20,000 feet, the highest, Huascaran, attaining 22,205 feet. The Cordillera of the Andes marks the continental divide; all rivers rising in the slopes east of that line flow into the Amazon to the Atlantic.

The Inca empire and culture dominated the west coast of South America from the late eleventh century to the Spanish conquest under Francisco Pizarro in the 1530's. Cuzco, in southern Peru, was the capital. Roads were built along the valleys between the Cordilleras and today long stretches of the Inter-American Highway follow these roads. The ruins of forgotten Machu Picchu, an Inca city seventy-five miles north of Cuzco, were discovered by Hiram Bingham in 1911.

Needing a capital close to the sea, Pizarro founded Lima in 1535. Revolt and bloodshed continued for decades, Pizarro himself being assassinated in Lima. Jose de San Martin proclaimed Peruvian independence from SPAIN in 1820. Bolivar and Sucre followed up San Martin's victory and completed the ouster of Spanish forces in January 1826. Frequent revolutions marked the next hundred years. A new constitution was adopted in 1933 and amended in 1939. Some advanced social legislation has been enacted, and elementary and higher education are emphasized.

Peru is one of the "Indian republics," and an estimated forty-six percent of the people are of pure Indian blood. Another forty-three percent are Mestizo (mixed), and eleven percent of European extraction. Indigenous religions continue among some Indian groups. The Roman Catholic Church claims 89.6 percent of the population and Protestant groups only 0.7 percent.

Methodism was taken to Peru in the late 1870's by WILLIAM TAYLOR, later bishop, of the M.E. Church. He projected what he hoped would be a series of self-supporting schools and churches in Callao, Lima, and other cities. He actually established workers in Iquique, then in Peru but soon lost to Chile in the War of the Pacific (1879-83). From 1886 to 1890, FRANCISCO G. PENZOTTI, agent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY and Methodist preacher, made several visits to Peru from ARGENTINA. In July 1890, he was arrested for preaching in Callao, suffering imprisonment for eight months before the international repercussions over the question of liberty of worship forced his release.

In 1891 THOMAS B. WOOD, Methodist leader in Argentina and URUGUAY, arrived at Lima as superintendent of the newly projected Western District of the South America Conference. Prior to this no organized Evangelical work had been established by any Protestant church. With the aid of his daughter, Elsie Wood, several schools were organized that developed into outstanding institutions. The leading Methodist schools are the CALLAO High School (Colegio America), Lima High School (Colegio Maria Alvarado), Victoria School (Escuela America de la Victoria), and Colegio Andino at HUANCAYO. These with Methodist parochial schools have a total enrollment of 3,500. The Institute for Christian Workers in Lima trains pastors and social workers.

Evangelistic work remained very difficult for many years, with frequent persecution. In 1945 the churches had barely 400 members. Then rapid progress started as the preachers moved out from the chief centers. Approach was made to the Campa Indians of the eastern jungle area near Satipo on the Rio Negro. The church membership has grown greatly of late years and the Peru Provisional Annual Conference became a part of the Pacific Area.

To meet a need for qualified Evangelicals as teachers in the schools, which form a substantial part of the mission program, The Methodist Church established the Panamericana Normal School in Lima in 1961—finally winning government approval one week before its first commencement in 1964. Also new in the educational field is a student hostel related to historic San Marcos University.

In recent years the church in Peru has shown a decided interest in social work, largely as a result of the ambitious program of the WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE in the La Florida Social Center, founded by the late Martha Vanderberg and serving residents of a very poor section of Lima. As the barriadas, or squatters' settlements, have become a serious social problem (containing more than a million residents in 1965), the church has extended social services and evangelistic work to them. Best known is the Methodist Social Center at Pedregal, a settlement built near a former garbage dump, where vocational training, adult classes, club work, a kindergarten, and religious services are offered. There is work in several other barriadas, much of it carried on by lay volunteers from the older established Methodist churches in Lima.

Methodists in Peru are becoming known increasingly for their social witness. The 1965 annual conference adopted a "Manifesto to the Nation"—a document without precedent for any church in the country. The manifesto proclaimed the rightful interest of the church in the social and economical organization of the world. The Church believes that all change, renewal or effective revolution ought to spring from man regenerated by the power of God.

The Peruvian Methodist Church. As has been the case with other conferences of The United Methodist Church in South America, the Conference in Peru, pursuant to proper legislation adopted by the General Conference of 1968, decided to become autonomous and so organized itself as a church, Iglesia Metodista Peruana, on Jan. 19, 1970, in Lima. The Rev. Dr. WENCESLAO BAHAMONDE, fifty-four years of age, was elected its first bishop. The Church reports 2,753 members (full and preparatory) in twenty-eight organized churches. There are 2,830 Sunday school pupils. The administration of work in Peru has been through two districts—a District de la Costa, which centers about Lima; and a District Centro with its principal center at Huancayo in the Andes.

In the Peruvian Methodist Church, almost full autonomy has been given to the districts of the conference as these districts have a certain appointing power, especially of those ministers and laymen who are not under the supervision of the whole church. There is, however, a general committee in charge of all the ministers in full connection, and these are assigned in a block to the districts and these make their appointments within the geographical limits. The bishop or president in this newly organized church has by no means the full appointive power.

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

PETERS, BENJAMIN (1844-1898), early Indian minister of the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, was born in Madras, was converted from Hinduism in 1874, and was ordained as an elder in 1882. His mother tongue was Tamil, but he learned English so well that he sometimes ministered to English-language congregations. His theological studies were conducted under the guidance of CLARK P. HARD.

While serving as pastor of the Tamil congregation in BANGALORE, Peters zealously preached on the streets. This led to counterpreaching on the streets by the Moslems, and to fear that violence might result. A magistrate issued an order against street preaching. Peters felt obliged in conscience to disobey. He changed his preaching place. The police drove his would-be hearers away. He was arrested and imprisoned, but on appeal was released on bail. The judicial commissioner decided that there could be no sweeping prohibition of Gospel preaching in public places, and he was released. Peters promptly resumed street preaching and suffered no further interference by the courts.

His stand and its outcome made an important contribution to the freedom "to profess, to practice and to propagate" the religion of one's choice which is now guaranteed by the Constitution of the Republic of India. He died in Madras May 10, 1898.

PETERS, WILLIAM (1855-1915), a minister of the M.E. Church in INDIA, was born Jan. 1, 1855. He was said to be of mixed British and Indian ancestry but was proudly Indian in his feelings. His family lived in the Budaun District before and during the Sepoy uprising and narrowly escaped assassination. He was a fervent evangelist, an able administrator, and a saintly character. In time He was appointed as the first Indian superintendent of the Budaun District, which during his superintendency was the most rapidly growing district in the NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE. He died Sept. 28, 1915.

PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., is an old historic town situated on the Appomattox River about twenty-two miles south of RICHMOND. Methodism was introduced into Petersburg by ROBERT WILLIAMS in February 1773. It is said that Gresset Davis and Nathaniel Young, who were merchants of Petersburg, met Robert Williams in NORFOLK where they happened to be and invited him to come and preach for them. He came and preached in an old theatre fitted up for the use of all denominations. As it turned out, however, the infant church was severely persecuted. At one time when HOPE HULL and JOHN EASTER were holding a meeting, a mob burst in upon them with lighted squibs and fire crackers. Then another band brought up a fire engine and played a stream of water into the house until every light was put out. This account states that "Soon the place was involved in darkness, save where a bursting firecracker gave a momentary gleam, and the whole congregation was routed and driven from the place."

The preachers, however, continued to preach as occasion furnished and a society was begun and Petersburg was included in the Brunswick circuit. The old theatre was abandoned and a church was built on Harrison Street; but during the Revolutionary War, it was occupied by the soldiers, first as a barracks, then as a hospital, and was finally destroyed by fire. After the loss of the church, several people opened their private dwellings for the preaching. Soon after the close of the war, a second Methodist church was built, started by Mr. Davis, who headed the subscription list with fifty pounds. This church is described as "very small and unique of its kind, and showing any amount of props, beams, and girders."

In 1792, Petersburg first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church, John Lindsay being appointed pastor and an annual conference was held there on Nov. 15, 1793.

The first GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, was held in Petersburg in 1846, an epochal conference in every way. The delegates assembled at the Union Street Church, though this had just recently been sold to a Negro congregation. The Washington Street Church, which continues to stand in stately grandeur in Petersburg, had almost been completed but was not then ready for general occupancy. That church since that date has been noteworthy in the Virginia Conference.

The original cornerstone of the old Union Street Church is still preserved in the Washington Street Church today, bearing the inscription: "Cornerstone of Union Street M. E. Church laid by Blandford Lodge of the Masons, October 26, 1818." Also, Washington Street preserves the pulpit brought from Union Street Church—one from which Bishop Asbury is said to have preached.

WASHINGTON STREET CHURCH,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA

An A.M.E. Zion Church, erected in 1879, with a present membership of something over 350 and known as the Oak Street A.M.E. Zion Church, is also found in Petersburg.

The present churches of the city are: Blandford, with a membership of 415; High Street, 585; Memorial Methodist, 953; St. Mark's 713; Trinity, 633; and Washington Street, 833.

Many distinguished pastors of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE have served Petersburg through the years, and it has long been the head of a district. The Petersburg District presently reports 24,700 members.

PETTY, JOHN (1807-68), British Methodist, was born near Skipton, Yorkshire, on Dec. 27, 1807. He united with the PRIMITIVE METHODIST society in 1823, and six months later began to preach, serving as a hired local preacher in the Keighley Circuit. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1826 and commenced in South Wales, covering large tracts of country. He was appointed Connexional Editor in 1851. He was the first governor of the Jubilee School (Elmfield College), York, in 1862, becoming the first connectional theological tutor for candidates for the ministry. In addition to being a sound administrator, he was also a historian, and in 1864 published his History of the Primitive Methodist Connexion (revised edition, 1884). A volume of his sermons was published in 1851. He died April 22, 1868.

PEW RENTAL is an expedient for raising funds for a church by renting pews to individuals or families for their sole use and the use of their guests. Never popular in Methodism as a whole, the custom of renting pews did however prove acceptable in some sections of Methodism, particularly New England, in spite of the admonitions in the Discipline against it.

In 1784 the answer to Question 74 in the Discipline read, "Let all our Chapels be built plain and decent . . ." to which was added in 1820, "and with free seats." Several other paragraphs were added to this section of the Discipline, one of which read, "As it is contrary to our economy to build houses with pews to sell or rent, it shall be the duty of the several annual conferences to use their influence to prevent houses from being so built in the future; and as far as possible to make those houses free which have already been built with pews."

These provisions were evidently not universally acceptable, for in 1852 the Discipline added, "wherever practicable" to the provision of 1820 so that the whole line read, "and with free seats, wherever practicable." Evidently the Methodists were finding that pew rents could be a lucrative source of income.

Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, in his Cyclopaedia, said that in New England, "free churches are almost unknown," and there are extant today actual contracts for pew rentals of Methodist churches in New England. Simpson closed his article by saying, "At present the churches throughout the Middle States, and throughout the East and South generally, have free seats, except a few in the larger cities. In New England, New York, Northern Ohio, and MICHIGAN a large proportion of the churches are pewed."

The provision about pew rentals remained in the M. E. Discipline until 1928. Today all seats in Methodist churches everywhere are free.

PFEIFFER, HENRY (1857-1939), and ANNIE MERNER PFEIFFER (1860-1946). Henry Pfeiffer was born at Lewistown, Pa., March 3, 1857, son of Henry and Barbara (Kluftinger) Pfeiffer. He was reared in Cedar Falls, Iowa, where he received his early education in the public schools. After attending NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE in ILLINOIS, he secured employment as a clerk in a retail drug store in Cedar Falls and later on became the owner. In 1891 he moved to St. Louis, Mo., and entered the wholesale drug business. Ten years later he founded the Pfeiffer Chemical Company. In 1908 Pfeiffer expanded his business by purchasing control of William R. Warner and Company, Inc., of PHILADELPHIA, highly regarded manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers of NEW YORK CITY.

Parallel with Pfeiffer's success in business was his interest in philanthropies, particularly those related to the M.E. Church, of which he was a lifelong member. This interest was aided by Mrs. Pfeiffer (born Annie Merner in New Hamburg, Ontario, Canada, on Sept. 23, 1860), to whom he was wed on March 7, 1882. Mrs. Pfeiffer, from the beginning, took an active role in the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church. Her interest in homes for children and the aged, and particularly in educational institutions at home and abroad, was shared by her husband. Their philanthropies amounted to more than forty million dollars to colleges alone. While Mr. Pfeiffer carried on a business that rapidly expanded across the country and into many foreign countries, Mrs. Pfeiffer was serving on numerous boards of trustees of Methodist colleges and other institutions of the church. Both were the recipients of many honorary degrees and, in 1935, a junior college near Charlotte, N. C., of which Mrs. Pfeiffer was a trustee, changed its name to PFEIFFER COLLEGE in recognition and appreciation for their benefactions. Mr. Pfeiffer died in his eighty-third year on April 13, 1939, and Mrs. Pfeiffer passed away in her eighty-fifth year on Jan. 8, 1946, but the monuments to their names and benefactions will long remain to bless generations yet to come.

PFEIFFER COLLEGE, Misenheimer, North Carolina, was established by Emily Pruden as the Emily Pruden School, near Lenoir, N. C., in 1885. In 1903 Miss Pruden deeded the property to the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, and the name was changed to Ebenezer Mitchell Industrial Home and School. In 1910 it was moved to Misenheimer, where it operated as a high school until 1928, when two years of college work were added. In 1935 the name was changed to Pfeiffer Junior College, honoring Mr. and Mrs. HENRY PFEIFFER of New York, whose generous gifts made possible five buildings. It became a senior college in 1954, and since then its growth has been phenomenal both in resources and enrollments.

In 1961 the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church voted to sponsor the college and to extend financial support in a cooperative arrangement with the Woman's Division of Christian Service. Pfeiffer grants the B.A. degree. The governing board has thirty-six members, elected by the Western North Carolina Conference.

JOHN O. GROSS

PFRIMMER, JOHN GEORGE (1762-1825), pioneer American United Brethren preacher, was born in Alsace, France. He was a surgeon in the French navy, who at the age of twenty-eight emigrated to America where he settled in Berks County, Pa.

There he came under the influence of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN and became a preacher in 1790.

After preaching in eastern and western PENNSYLVANIA he moved to Harrison County, Ind., in 1808, eight years after the territory had been opened to settlers. He became a member of the Indiana district of the MIAMI CONFERENCE, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, and later served as superintendent, then secretary, of that annual conference, as well as secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1825.

He was appointed an Associate Judge of the state by Governor (later President) William Henry Harrison, and served effectively for two years.

Pfrimmer played an active part in establishing the United Brethren Church in Indiana. He organized a church which bore his name, Pfrimmer's Chapel, which was the first United Brethren Church built west of Ohio. He sensed the need for the religious instruction of children and organized the first Sunday school in the denomination in 1820. He was simultaneously a physician, jurist, and a musician as well as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

Pfrimmer died Sept. 5, 1825 and is buried near Corydon, Ind.

A. BYRON FULTON

PHELAN, MACUM (1874-1950), American minister and author, was born in Trenton, Tenn., Feb. 22, 1874. As a youth he came to TEXAS, and soon entered the State University at AUSTIN, where he received the M.A. degree in 1903. For a short time he taught in the public school system. Reaching a decision to enter the ministry, he was received into the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE on Nov. 16, 1905, and was active from that time until his retirement. Starting on the Colorado Circuit he was, at different times, assigned to appointments including the presiding eldership of the Vernon District. Transferring to CALIFORNIA, he was assigned to the Sacramento District. On his return to Texas he was for several years editorial assistant on the Southwestern Christian Advocate (later the Texas Christian Advocate). He returned to the pastorate, serving Haslett as his last appointment, retiring from that charge in 1937. He established a home in Handley, Texas, where he spent his declining years.

He was married Nov. 9, 1905, to Mrs. Bonita Brennard, and to them were born six children.

An outstanding contribution of Macum Phelan was his two-volume set of The History of Methodism in Texas, covering the years 1817 through 1899. In the preface to that publication he stated: "All of the old files of the Texas Christian Advocate now in existence have been examined page by page, and almost item for item, and these have been drawn upon to a very considerable extent."

He also wrote sermons and addresses. While trying to complete the second volume of his book on Texas Methodism, he developed an eye infection which made it impossible for him to read the final proof of his manuscript.

Representatives of the five Texas Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, met in Dallas, Dec. 5, 1933, and elected a committee to make plans for the 1936 Centennial Celebration of Texas Methodism. Phelan was a valuable member of that committee.

He died Aug. 4, 1950, and was buried in Handley, Texas.

Texas Christian Advocates. MRS. JOHN H. WARNICK

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. (1970 population 1,927,863). The first Methodist to preach in Philadelphia was GEORGE WHITEFIELD. He arrived in 1739. Two of his converts, EDWARD EVANS and JAMES EMERSON, soon began meeting informally with several other like minded persons. Through Charles von Wrangle, a missionary to the Swedes in Philadelphia, they heard of JOHN WESLEY and British Methodism. Von Wrangle recommended to one of their number, James Hood, that they give a warm welcome to any of Wesley's preachers who might visit Philadelphia. In 1767 Captain THOMAS WEBB, a British Methodist local preacher, arrived in Philadelphia and was enthusiastically greeted by the Philadelphia Methodists. He organized them into "The Religious Society of Protestants called Methodists." There were seven members in the new Society meeting in a sail loft near a drawbridge on Dock Creek (now Dock Street) at Front Street.

Through Webb's leadership and preaching the Society grew rapidly, and in 1769 when the Methodist preachers, JOSEPH PILMORE and RICHARD BOARDMAN, arrived from England they found a Society of 100 persons desiring to be in connection with John Wesley. Pilmore remained in Philadelphia as pastor of the growing group, and Boardman travelled to NEW YORK. They subsequently exchanged appointments about every four months.

By this time, also, the Philadelphia Methodists had moved from their Dock Creek meeting place to a former pot house (a kind of tavern where beer was sold at a penny a pot) at number Eight Loxley Court. Prayer meetings were held on the first floor, and preaching services were conducted from a balcony outside the second story window where the preachers addressed the congregations gathered in the courtyard below. The arrangement, however, was unsatisfactory, and in 1769 the Methodists began to look for larger quarters.

A splinter group from the local German Reformed Church had built the shell of a huge building at what is now Fourth and New Streets. They borrowed a large sum of money, but were unable either to complete the building or to pay off the indebtedness, and their trustees were put into the debtor's jail. The Assembly then auctioned off the building to pay the debt, and it was purchased by a mentally retarded youth for 700 pounds. His father decried the bargain, but he refused to sign an affidavit that his boy was not mentally responsible. Hearing that the Methodists were looking for a building he sold it to them for 650 pounds. On Nov. 24, 1769 the Society moved into the unfinished building which had neither windows nor doors and only a rough dirt floor.

ROBERT WILLIAMS came to the New World with a license from Wesley to preach occasionally under the direction of the regular preachers. His ship had been driven southward by storms, and he landed at NORFOLK. He preached in Norfolk for a short time, and then came to Philadelphia, the Methodist Society there paying his way. By 1769 he had gone to New York and was there to greet Richard Boardman.

In 1770 JOHN KING arrived from England but not having proper credentials from John Wesley, was refused a local preacher's license by Pilmore. King preached a sermon in "Potter's Field" (now Washington Square) and so impressed the Methodists who heard him that Pilmore permitted him to give a trial sermon at St. George's and subsequently licensed him.

In 1771 FRANCIS ASBURY and RICHARD WRIGHT arrived. Asbury preached his first sermon in America from St. George's pulpit. In fact, all of Wesley's itinerants with few exceptions preached their first sermons in the new world in St. George's. In Philadelphia also Asbury formed the acquaintance of Mr. Roberdeau who afterwards, as General Roberdeau, introduced Bishops COKE and Asbury to General Washington when they visited him in Mt. Vernon in 1785 to discuss slavery.

In 1773 THOMAS RANKIN arrived from Europe, having been appointed general superintendent of the work in America. He held the first American Methodist Conference in St. George's July 14—16, 1773. Ten preachers were present, possibly eleven, if we accept WILLIAM WATTERS' inference that he also was present. At this Conference 180 members were reported in the Society in Philadelphia and a few surrounding appointments. The second and third Conferences of American Methodism were also held in Philadelphia in 1774 and 1775. In the former year the membership in Philadelphia was 204, and in 1775, 190.

Notwithstanding its plain and unfinished condition, St. George's was frequented by many able men. Among these was JOHN ADAMS who noted in his diary in 1774 that he had listened to Captain Webb with high appreciation of his eloquence. St. George's still stands and historians consider it the oldest existing Methodist meeting house in America, and the world's oldest Methodist church edifice in continuous service.

The Revolutionary War seriously affected the work in Philadelphia. When the British occupied the city they used St. George's with its dirt floor as a cavalry school. The Methodists protested strongly, holding their meetings now in the home of Mary Thorne, the first woman class leader of American Methodism. In the year 1776, therefore, the Conference met in BALTIMORE, and in 1781 and 1782 the name of Philadelphia disappeared from the Minutes, although statistics were given for the State of Pennsylvania. In 1783 Philadelphia reappeared, reporting 119 members, and in 1784, the war having closed, Philadelphia reported 470 members.

In 1789 JOHN DICKINS was appointed Book Steward and was also placed in charge of the Philadelphia appointment. Philadelphia continued as the center of the publishing business until 1804 when it was moved to New York. In 1790 RICHARD WHATCOAT was appointed to Philadelphia and Dickens became "Superintendent of the Printing and Book Business." In that year, also, a small brick building called "Ebenezer," in Second Street below Catherine, was opened by the Methodists. It was the first house of worship erected by the Methodists in Philadelphia, and was not built until twenty years after the purchase of St. George's. It is no longer standing.

In 1794 on Sixth Street above Lombard a place of worship was erected for the colored people. It acquired a large membership, and was under the discipline of the M.E. Church until 1816. It then became independent and was organized with other colored churches into the "AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH." RICHARD ALLEN, who had been licensed to preach by St. George's in 1784, and had been ordained as a deacon by Asbury in 1799, became the first bishop of the new denomination.

In 1796 in Brown Street a second place of worship was opened for the colored Methodists called "ZOAR." This Society still remains in connection with the Methodist Church.

In 1793 and also in 1794, 1796, 1797 and 1798 a yellow fever plague swept Philadelphia, and in 1798 John Dickens died of the epidemic. He was one of the few clergymen who remained at his post in the city during the plagues. He was succeeded in the book business by EZEKIEL COOPER.

In 1800 a number of families, leaving St. George's, purchased a part of Whitefield's Academy near Fourth and Arch Streets, and in 1802 founded "Union Methodist Church." The original building is gone but the successor congregation is now Union Methodist Church, Brookline, Pa., a suburb of Philadelphia. The subsequent growth of the Methodist Church in Philadelphia has been steady though not rapid.

Philadelphia has been the seat of an Episcopal Residence for over 100 years. In 1863 Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, a close friend of Abraham Lincoln, settled in Philadelphia at the request of interested laymen who presented him with a house. He was followed by Bishop CYRUS D. FOSS, Bishop CHARLES McCABE and Bishop LUTHER B. WILSON respectively. Bishop JOSEPH F. BERRY, who served in Philadelphia from 1912 to 1928, was the first bishop appointed to Philadelphia under the area system. Bishop ERNEST G. RICHARDSON served from 1928 to 1944 and Bishop FRED PIERCE CORSON from 1944 to 1968.

The Home for the Aged in Bala just outside of Philadelphia, was built in 1898 and 1899 largely through the benefactions of a Colonel Joseph M. Bennett; the Deaconess Home was erected on Vine Street in 1893 through the further munificence of Colonel Bennett (it has since moved to West Philadelphia); the Methodist Hospital was built on South Broad Street in 1888 to 1892 through the generosity of Dr. Scott Steward and today is an enlarged and completely modernized institution; the Orphanage (now the Children's Home) was begun in 1887 through the help of the ever generous Colonel Bennett; the Historical Society of the Conference was founded in 1867 and today houses its 10,000 volume library, manuscripts and relics at St. George's.

In 1914 a site was purchased by the Tract Society of the Conference and in 1916 the Wesley Building was completed at 17th and Arch Streets and still houses the Methodist Book Store. The Book Store is not connected with the Publishing House but is a venture of the Tract Society of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. The profits are used for the Preachers' Aid Society. It has been in existence on various sites since 1864. Prior to this date an independent Methodist Book Store was in existence.

In 1922 part of the Wesley Building was purchased as a headquarters by the Home Mission Board of the General Church (now the Division of National Missions) and subsequently the bishop's office and many of the Philadelphia Conference agencies were established here. In 1967 the building was purchased by the Philadelphia Annual Conference when it was sold by the Division of National Missions. The Division moved to New York.

In 1949 the General Board of EVANGELISM of The Methodist Church conducted in Philadelphia a pilot project for a United Preaching and Visitation Evangelistic Campaign; 240 churches joined in the venture, resulting in 9,000 accessions to the church.

In 1953 a World Convocation on Evangelism, celebrating the 250th Anniversary of the birth of John Wesley, was held in Philadelphia. Laymen and preachers from all over the world gathered in Convention Hall for meetings each day and evening for three days. On Sunday morning, June 28, many of the visiting preachers occupied pulpits in metropolitan Philadelphia. In the afternoon despite heavy rains, 35,000 people gathered in Franklin Field for a mass meeting. One thousand individuals were personally united to the church that afternoon under the leadership of Resident Bishop Corson.

The present strength of Methodism in Philadelphia includes ninety-five Methodist charges. There are ten former E.U.B. charges, thirty A.M.E. charges, seven A.M.E. ZION charges, and one WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH.

The Academy. This structure, originally located on the west side of Fourth Street below Arch in Philadelphia, was built as a tabernacle or preaching house for George Whitefield and other itinerant preachers who desired a hearing in the city. Begun in 1740, it was immediately used by Whitefield who preached to a large congregation when the walls were only partially erected. It was completed by 1744 and five years later Benjamin Franklin and Whitefield cooperated in procuring it for about 777 pounds to house an Academy, the first in Philadelphia. It was chartered under the name, "The Academy and Charity School." A section was still reserved, however, as a preaching center for itinerants. In 1753 it became the "College" of Philadelphia and was incorporated as "The College, Academy and Charitable School." A year later Dr. WILLIAM SMITH became the first Provost. The school had an excellent reputation and in 1753 sixty-five boys were enrolled from near-by colonies. In 1779 it was converted into "The University of the State of Pennsylvania," out of which the present University of Pennsylvania has grown. In 1800 a group of about fifty dissidents left OLD ST. GEORGE'S METHODIST CHURCH and rented the north end of the Academy building in which to worship. In 1801 they purchased the south end, worshipping there for about thirty years. They organized Union M.E. Church which is still in existence, being located today in Brookline, a suburb of Philadelphia.

In 1802 The University of the State of Pennsylvania was moved from The Academy Building on Fourth Street to the President's House on the west side of Ninth Street, south of Market. The House had been built as a residence for the Presidents of the United States, but it had never been used for this purpose. It was purchased by the University for $41,650, about one half of its original cost. In 1874 the University was moved to its present location in West Philadelphia. Near the men's dormitories of the University there is today a bronze statue of Whitefield commemorating his part in the founding of the University.

The Academy building itself is no longer in existence, the site now being partly used as a parking lot for a nearby restaurant. At one time a bronze tablet could be seen on a wall near this site: "The Whitefield Meeting House erected in 1740 for George Whitefield and for a Charity School subsequently used until 1812 by the School, Academy, College and University of Pennsylvania successively." The University had moved in 1802.

Albert W. Cliffe in his book, The Glory of Our Methodist Heritage, adds this other word: It was "the first symbol of Religious Freedom in America as it was used expressly for the use of any preacher of any religious persuasion who might desire to say something to the people of Philadelphia."

Arch Street Church is the stately Italian white marble Gothic cathedral at the very center of the city of "Brotherly Love." The Romanesque Masonic Temple is next door and the French Renaissance City Hall is situated just beyond that with the famous Billy Penn statue on top of it.

This is the hub of the industrial, business, historical and social life of the city. Arch Street Church is the oldest building in this complex, dating from 1862. New high-rise business offices and apartments contrast the new with the old—but the self-giving life of the church is ever expanding.

A full program for the college or graduate students in center city is maintained. An open chapel daily invites hundreds to pray away from the noise of the city. The social services rendered reach into every part of the city and government as well as to the many strangers who need a helping hand.

Weekly Sunday evening services and mid-week Hour of Power are still popular here serving a downtown transient people. The business community enjoys the outstanding preachers presented each noonday during Lent. One of the largest WESLEYAN SERVICE GUILDS in the East meets here, as well as a weekly noonday Business Men's spiritual luncheon.

The visitors at the Sunday morning service include every state in the Union and almost all the countries of the world during the course of a year. The church has the privilege of entertaining these transients and getting further acquainted at a Coffee Hour following the service.

The Bishop of the area considers this his family church. The ashes of Bishop Ernest G. Richardson are interred under the marble pulpit which has presented almost every great preacher of each generation to the city of Philadelphia. General Grant attended service regularly with Bishop Simpson and his family.

Besides being the Conference seat where the Philadelphia Annual Conference meeting is held, Arch Street is always employing new approaches to serve its great Center City populace, using as its motto "Where Cross the Crowded Ways' men find their way by the Cross."

Bethel A.M.E. Church. The "Mother Church" of the A.M.E. denomination began in 1786 in St. George's M.E. Church, as a Prayer Band of forty-two Negroes under the leadership of Richard Allen. Following an incident involving racial discrimination in 1787, Allen and several other Negro members withdrew from St. George's and organized a "Free African Society." By 1794 an African meeting house (Bethel) had been built, dedicated by Francis Asbury and opened for worship with Allen as preacher. Between 1794 and 1816 the Philadelphia M.E. Conference sought to reclaim Bethel. The matter was settled when Bethel was granted legal independence from St. George's in 1816.

About 1840, the 1794 structure was replaced by a second brick church which remained until 1889, when the present structure was built on the original site purchased by Allen. Seven pastors have been elected to the episcopacy from the pastorate of Bethel: Richard Allen (1816), MORRIS BROWN (1828), WILLIS NAZERY (1852), CORNELIUS T. SHAFFER (1900), LEVI J. COPPIN (1900), WILLIAM H. HEARD (1908) and JOHN D. BRIGHT (1964).

Methodist Home for the Aged was founded in the spring of 1865 in the era often referred to as "Victorian," and indelibly marks the year when Bishop Matthew Simpson and his wife used their talents and substance to bring the Home into reality. Having acquired an "old" mansion with a tract of land in 1867, located on Lehigh Avenue, between 12th and 13th Streets, it was opened as a residence in 1868 with twenty-five guests. This project, a pioneer in the concern and care for aging Philadelphia, grew so rapidly that within a very brief period a new building was erected, this time providing accommodations for 100 persons. This was the largest Home for Aging in Philadelphia at the time.

Finally, again through the intense interest of the Simpsons, in 1898 a new site was acquired in what is considered today Urban Philadelphia. This overlooks the famed Fairmount Park, and there now are impressive buildings with ample accommodations for 240 people. Through the years the Home has enjoyed a reputation for excellent management under the direction of a Board of Managers and the Trustees. In addition, the Home is supervised by a professional staff training in geriatrics care. In recent years a modern infirmary has been opened with a capacity of seventy-two beds. During the 101st Anniversary the new Barnes facilities building was dedicated.

The present value of the property is $3,038,300 and that of the contents and equipment is $335,616. Currently there is no indebtedness. The operating budget today exceeds $500,000.

Methodist Home for Children, The, serves as a home for approximately sixty-five school-aged children from Philadelphia and surrounding areas. It was founded as an orphanage in 1879 by Mrs. Ellen Simpson, wife of Bishop Matthew Simpson. In the years that followed it became evident that the children needing a Home most desperately were no longer orphans, but rather dependent and neglected children from broken, disturbed, and deprived families. The Home gradually shifted its program to meet that need, and the name was subsequently changed from Methodist Episcopal Orphanage to Methodist Home for Children. The Home today is more professionally staffed than was possible in the past, and includes two social workers, a part-time psychologist, and a part-time psychiatrist, in order to deal with the complex problems of individual children coming out of abnormal backgrounds.

Other concepts have changed through the years. Whereas originally the children of the Home participated in an internal religious and educational program, having school and church on the grounds, the emphasis is now based upon the hope of preparing the children to be a part of normal society rather than isolated from it. Now most of the children attend public schools, with supplementary tutoring at the Home, while religious education is given both within the Home and in local Methodist churches.

In 1966 two modern cottages were completed, each housing fourteen children and two houseparents in single and double rooms. These replaced the old two and three story dormitory-type buildings which had served since the early 1900's. Two other modern cottages are presently in process of being built. The beautiful old stone Administration Building, containing the chapel, dining hall, recreation room, infirmary, and offices, has been renovated. The aim of the Home is to give deprived children the personal, professional care necessary for them to develop into happy and useful maturity.

Old Ebenezer was the first church built by the Methodists in Philadelphia, St. George's having been purchased from another denomination. Erected in 1790, it is mentioned frequently in Bishop Asbury's Journal. On one occasion a crowd gathered around the church while Asbury was preaching. They began "fighting, swearing, threatening," Asbury wrote, "This is a wicked, horribly wicked city; and if the people do not reform, I think they will be let loose on one another. . . ." (Vol. 1, pp. 729, 730)

The church was moved three times in its history, and the successor church today is Ebenezer, Havertown at Eagle and Steel Roads outside of Philadelphia. The original building located on 2nd St. near Queen is no longer in existence.

St. George's Church (see under ST. GEORGE'S).

Zoar Church (African Zoar Methodist Episcopal) founded in 1794, represents the historic continuity of the Afro-American within the traditional stream of The Methodist Church. She represents the remnant of Negroes who in the early days of the Republic, although disliking the patterns of participation available to them, refused to separate themselves from the fold of the "JOHN WESLEY Methodists." The eighteen men and three women used an abandoned butcher shop as their first place of public worship at Brown and Fourth Streets. Later a lot was purchased, the first edifice erected and dedicated by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY and JOHN DICKINS, Aug. 4, 1796. This was Methodism's third structure built in Philadelphia.

Zoar was not included in appointments separately under St. George's until 1811. She became a separate station under the Covenant of Assumption in April, 1835, and was listed in 1836 as having 450 members. Perry Tilghman, lay preacher, was the first Negro pastor-in-charge from 1835 to 1844.

The Zoar Church received its charter from the Commonwealth of PENNSYLVANIA on June 14, 1837. The congregation moved from Brown and Fourth Streets to the present site, 1204-08 Melon Street, in 1883.

The first Convention of Colored Local Preachers and Laymen met at Zoar, Aug. 23-27, 1852, and the second convention on June 28, 1855. The first Conference of Colored Local Preachers met on August 5 and 6, 1857, under the leadership of Bishop LEVI SCOTT, and by the authority of the 1856 GENERAL CONFERENCE. Among the nineteen local preachers who attended were James Davis, and David Tilghman, local elders; and Richard Crawford from Zoar. The third and sixth conferences were also held at Zoar, Aug. 10, 1859 and Aug. 7 and 8, 1862, respectively. This series of conferences (1857-1863) became the immediate forerunner of the DELAWARE ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church instituted by the General Conference of 1864 on recommendation of the "Committee on the State of the Work Among the People of Color."

At the General Conference of 1868, James Davis, charter member of the Delaware Conference and a son of Zoar, was the first Negro ever to be seated as a General Conference delegate.

Among the deaconesses commissioned early in this century was Shelly Jane Gale of Zoar who was consecrated by Bishop EDWARD G. ANDREWS, March 18, 1904.

PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE (ME). The first three conferences of Methodist preachers in America were conducted by THOMAS RANKIN in Old ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, in 1773, 1774, and 1775. These and indeed all of the conferences prior to the organization of the M.E. Church in 1784 were gatherings of all the Methodist preachers in the land, and each meeting was called, "Some conversations between the Preachers in Connection with Rev. Mr. Wesley." Except in 1779 there was only one such conference each year.

After the organization of the church in 1784, the meetings of the preachers over which Bishop ASBURY presided were called "annual conferences." From 1785 to 1787 inclusive, apparently the preachers in Philadelphia and vicinity traveled to the annual conferences which Asbury held in Baltimore or elsewhere. Then on Sept. 22, 1788 Asbury convened a conference in Philadelphia, and thereafter the Philadelphia Conference met annually. Thus it is proper to date the Philadelphia Conference from 1788.

In 1796 the GENERAL CONFERENCE designated six annual conferences with boundaries, and the Philadelphia Conference was one of the six. At the time it embraced New York west of the Hudson River, PENNSYLVANIA east of the Susquehanna River, NEW JERSEY, DELAWARE, and the remainder of the Peninsula. (See PENNSYLVANIA for beginnings of Methodism in the state.) The boundaries of the conference were altered a number of times as the years passed and eventually about a dozen conferences in whole or in part were carved from the territory of the Philadelphia Conference.

Through the decades the Philadelphia Conference was a strong and influential body. In 1808 when the denomination had about 152,000 members, some 36,000 of them were in the Philadelphia Conference. Thirty-two of the 129 preachers eligible to sit in the 1808 General Conference were members of the Philadelphia Conference. Ten members of the conference have been elevated to the episcopacy: GEORGE H. BICKLEY, CHARLES W. BURNS, JOHN EMORY, EDMUND S. JAMES, W. VERNON MIDDLETON, THOMAS B. NEELY, ROBERT R. ROBERTS, LEVI SCOTT, HENRY W. WARREN, and ISAAC W. WILEY. Bickley and Neely were born in Philadelphia.

The conference supports the Methodist Hospital in Philadelphia, a Children's Home at Bala, and Homes for the Aged at Bala and Cornwall. Three camps are maintained—Innabah, Pocono Plateau, and Carson-Simpson Farm. While there are no Methodist colleges within the bounds of the conference, it cooperates with the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in supporting DICKINSON COLLEGE at Carlisle, Pa. The office of the bishop of the Philadelphia Area, is at 1701 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

In 1952 the PUERTO RICO Provisional Annual Conference was added to the Philadelphia Area, and since that time the churches in the area have greatly aided the growing Puerto Rico work. The conference gave strong support to the World Convocation on EVANGELISM which was held in Philadelphia in 1953, capitalizing on the two hundred fiftieth anniversary of JOHN WESLEY's birth.

In more recent years the territory of the Philadelphia Conference has been southeastern Pennsylvania only. In 1968 the conference reported 394 ministers, 340 pastoral charges, 141,333 members, and property valued at $113,-314,138.

The Philadelphia Conference merged with portions of the EASTERN and CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCES (former E.U.B.) on Jan. 1, 1970, to form the Eastern Pennsylvania Conference.

PHILADELPHIA METHODIST, THE, was a magazine published twice a month by the Tract Society of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE from the year 1879 to 1916. It contained some news of the general church, but it was more of a local news sheet for the benefit of the friends and members of the churches of the Philadelphia Conference. Growing out of the Monthly Messenger of the Tract Society, it was an ambitious undertaking of eight newspaper-size pages of which the Corresponding Secretary of the Tract Society, J. B. McCullough, was the Editor. In 1885 McCullough became full time Editor of the Philadelphia Methodist, another person assuming the position of Corresponding Secretary of the Tract Society. The paper reached its largest size and subscription list when in 1894 it was increased to sixteen pages. It continued over twenty more years, changing its name toward the end of its life to the Methodist Times. Interest in the paper slowly waned, however, and in 1916 the Tract Society reported to the Conference, "financial returns [do] not warrant the continuance of the Methodist Times." The report added, "we rejoice in the beautiful spirit exhibited by the Times management" in sending to the New York Christian Advocate its subscription list.

PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE, LITTLE ROCK, Arkansas, was established as Walden Seminary in 1877 and chartered in 1883 as Philander Smith College, in recognition of gifts from the Smith family of Oak Park, Illinois. The college is one of the institutions founded in the South for the education of Negroes by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M.E. Church. Under the leadership of Bishop M. L. HARRIS, who served as president for twenty-four years, the college was accredited and its resources greatly expanded. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S. and B.S. in Home Economics. The governing board consists of twenty-eight members elected by the board. Ownership of the college and its holdings is vested with the General Board of Education of The United Methodist Church.

PHILIPPINES, REPUBLIC OF THE, is the largest island group of the Malay Archipelago, discovered in 1521 by Magellan, conquered in 1565 by the Spaniards, and for 333 years a part of the Spanish overseas possessions. The islands were ceded to the United States in 1899 in the treaty after the Spanish-American War. On July 4, 1946 the independent Republic of the Philippines was formally recognized. The islands are 1,150 miles from north to south and 682 miles from east to west, with a total area of 115,707 square miles lying entirely within the tropics. The estimated population in 1970 was 37,158,000. The people are chiefly of the Malay race. Approximately one-third of the population speaks English and one-third speaks Tagalog, the national language since 1946. Tagalog, Spanish and English are the official languages for government and commerce.

Church and State are separate by constitution and there is freedom of worship and of conscience except to the degree that social and indirect political pressures are exerted by the dominant church. About 82 percent of the population is Roman Catholic. Aglipayans number 2,000,000; Muslims, 791,000; Protestants, 500,000. For almost four centuries following Magellan's discovery of the archipelago he named the Philippine Islands, SPAIN dominated the political life of the people with a heavy hand, and Catholic missionaries—and later Catholic priests—dominated the religious life. People and taxes were for Spain's wealth; any religious group other than Roman Catholic was forbidden to carry on its religious services.

And then, suddenly, Dewey's defeat of the Spanish fleet in May 1898 changed the whole political, religious, social and economic situation in the Philippines. American rule and then self-rule (the latter on July 4, 1946) came quickly. Religious liberty was immediately proclaimed and practiced. Three months after Spain's dominance ended, the first Protestant service was held in the Islands—by Chaplain George Stull, a minister of the M.E. Church who arrived with the occupying forces. Though the service was primarily for the military, many Filipinos—freed from the old Spanish-Catholic prohibitions—joined the soldiers in worship.

In March 1899, Bishop JAMES M. THOBURN, Methodist missionary bishop for INDIA and elsewhere in Southern Asia, arrived in MANILA with letters from the Missionary Society in America appointing him to begin missionary services in the newly-liberated land. A year later, Bishop Thoburn ordained one Nicholas Zamora as the first Filipino Methodist preacher.

During the early years of the new century, a large number of newly-named Methodist missionaries arrived from the United States—and educational and medical services were developed along with a rapidly gathering and training of Methodist congregations both in the cities and in the rural villages. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY sent several women missionaries to the Philippines. The women organized a boarding school for girls, and this was later to become the Harris Deaconess School. During 1900, also, the activities of the missionaries spread from Manila to San Fernando in Pampanga, and to Malolos in Bulacan; and the seven preaching places (with seven Filipino workers and 220 probationers) were organized as "the Philippine Islands District of the Malaysia Conference."

In the first ten years of the century, the Methodist Publishing House opened a press in Manila—publishing The Philippine Christian Advocate in English, Spanish, and four Filipino languages; Harris Memorial School was founded; Mary Johnston Hospital was established; Union Theological Seminary was founded by Methodists and Presbyterians; and several notable churches—including Central and Knox Memorial churches—were organized. By 1908 the membership had grown to the point that the work was organized into the Philippine Islands Annual Conference.

Methodist missionaries to the Philippines worked zealously in the development of indigenous leadership—for the church and its institutions. The long restlessness of the Filipinos under Spanish rule, the educational opportunities given by the American school system in the Islands, and the new spirit of freedom and achievement and search for "a place in the sun" all contributed to the churchmen's desire to conduct their own religious services and institutions free from anything that looked like American domination or tutorship. The spirit of nationalism rose high—and affected both the church and secular institutions. Unfortunately, the American Methodist Church, moving as fast as its machinery for organization permitted, was not speedy enough for some of the Methodists of the Philippines, and a considerable group of the latter broke away from the Annual Conference and formed "The Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands." This new church was then led by the aforementioned Nicholas Zamora. Friendly and cooperative relationships exist between this new church and the Philippine Islands Central Conference—but the breach has not been healed.

Prior to the organization of the Central Conference (which elects its own bishops and is in many other ways self-governing), the Philippine Islands Annual Conference was divided into the Philippines Annual Conference, and the Northern Philippines Annual Conference; and more recently (1949) the Northwest Philippines Annual Conference was created, and (1955) the Mindanao Provisional Annual Conference was added. The first session of the still newer Middle Philippines Annual Conference met in 1961. This rapid growth in conferences reflects the rapid growth of Methodism in the Islands.

The Church had suffered heavily in men and in edifices of worship during the years of Japanese occupation in the second World War—but the Christians had neither flinched nor knuckled under, and their post-war recovery was a remarkable chapter of history.

Methodism in the Philippines has been strengthened by the coming in of about fifteen United Methodist missionaries who came from the former E.U.B. Church in America and who had been serving in what was called The United Church of Christ in the Philippines. In 1929, the United Brethren joined the Presbyterian and the Congregationalists to form the United Evangelical Church. That Church was a major party in the formation of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines in 1948, with the Disciples being the other main group. With the Philippine Methodists and the United Brethren in the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, a rather interesting situation came about at the union of The Methodist Church with the E.U.B. Church in May of 1968. The net result has been a great strengthening of The United Methodist Church in the Philippines.

PHILIPPINE WESLEYAN COLLEGE

Outstanding institutions still serving the Filipino people include: Union Theological Seminary, Mary Johnston Hospital and School of Nursing, Harris Memorial School, Philippine Christian College, Methodist Social Center (Manila), Philippine Wesleyan College, Northern Philippines Academy, Thoburn Memorial Academy, Eveland Memorial Academy, Aldersgate Junior College, Asbury Junior College, Aurora Wesleyan High School, Bethel Girls' High School, Greene Academy, Jose L. Valencia Academy, San Mateo Farm Research Center, Methodist Rural Center at Kidapawan, three mobile clinics, and eight student centers.

The Methodist Church in the Philippines has for some time been administered by two Filipino bishops elected by the Central Conference. In 1968 Bishop JOSE L. VALENCIA retired at the Central Conference after twenty years of service in the episcopacy and Bishop BENJAMIN I. GUANSING died in June 1968, after a little more than a year of episcopal service. To replace these two bishops, CORNELIO M. FERRER and PAUL L. GRANADOSIN were elected by the Central Conference of The United Methodist Church of the Philippines in Manila at the Nov. 22-Dec. 1 Conference. They will serve four year terms.

A new conference, the SOUTHWEST PHILIPPINES PROVISIONAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE, was constituted in 1969 by Bishop Cornelio M. Ferrer, presiding. This comprises territory formerly in the Philippines Annual Conference, including many large and small islands between Luzon and Mindanao. Among these are Mindoro, Palawan, Cebu, and others where Methodist work is either beginning or in the developing stage.

The Philippines Central Conference, as at present constituted, is comprised of the Philippines, the Northwest Philippines, Northern Philippines, Middle Philippines, and Mindanao, with the Southwest Philippines as the new conference. The Central Conference is one of two Church bodies in the Philippines related to United Methodism in America. The other is United Church of Christ in the Philippines. Bishop Ferrer's Episcopal Address at the constituting conference, held in the Knox Memorial Church in Manila, was entitled, "God is giving us a New Church in the Philippines." Latest reports indicate that there are 130,830 full and preparatory members in The United Methodist Church of the Philippines.

E.U.B. Church. As a "Silver Anniversary Memorial" the Board of the Women's Missionary Association of the United Brethren in Christ voted in 1901 to establish a mission in the Philippines. The first missionaries, Sanford B. Kurtz and Edwin S. Eby, arrived there in 1901 and took up their work in three provinces in the northwestern part of Luzon under the direction of a Comity Committee. The new work met with strong opposition from native superstition and Romanism. The arrival of H. W. Widdoes and his wife in 1903 and their successes at San Fernando marked the beginning of better things. By 1908 a mission conference was organized, schools were opened, the Scripture was translated, a weekly religious newspaper was published in Ilocano and, in 1920 Bethany hospital was erected at San Fernando. This mission became the most rapidly growing mission which the denomination supported.

The Japanese invasion of Luzon wrought havoc upon this enterprise in the Philippines. The church in an heroic manner rebuilt her work.

Just two years after the union of the Evangelical Church and the United Brethren in Christ Church, in 1948, the United Church of Christ in the Philippines brought together in union these churches: The Christian Churches (Disciples of Christ); The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH; the Congregational Church (now United Church of Christ); the Presbyterian Church, and the Philippines Methodist Church. Through this union there have come additional ministries in higher education, hospitals, in the newly located Union Theological Seminary, and by means of the organization of the National Council of Churches in the Philippines, new steps in ecumenical endeavors. The E.U.B. Church provided about twenty missionaries in this United Church.

Free Methodist Church. On recommendation of the Philippine Church Federation, Free Methodist missionaries started work in 1949 on Mindanao, the second largest of the Philippine Islands. Main stations are on the Agusan River at Bunawan and Butuan. Missionaries Groesbeck and Schlosser (from China) found few roads. They traveled by coastal steamer, river boat or on foot. New converts became lay-preachers and assisted placing pre-tuned gospel radio sets and hand-wound phonographs with gospel recordings in the interior villages. Churches were organized on a self-support basis. A Bible School opened in 1955 now occupies a fine campus at Butuan. Each student spends one year in field work before graduation. Government high schools are open for Bible instruction. Primitive outlaw tribes have been converted and reconciled with the government. Some translation of Christian literature is done by the students.

A conference was organized in 1963. A new field is being opened on the island of Leyte, where the population is sparse.

The national conference superintendent is a member of the denomination's Board of Administration. There were about 1,000 members in 1969.

PHILLIPPI, JOSEPH MARTIN (1869-1926), American editor and United Brethren clergyman, was born March 2, 1869, near London Mills, in Fulton County, Ill., the youngest of ten children of Martin and Caroline (Swartz) Phillippi. His advanced education was taken at Westfield College in Illinois (B.A., 1893), Union Biblical Seminary in Dayton, Ohio, (B.D., 1896), and ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (Ph.D., 1904). Westfield College also awarded him M.A. (1896) and D.D. (1906) degrees. In 1896 he was ordained by the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, and in 1897 he joined the faculty of Westfield College as professor of ancient languages. On Sept. 22, 1899, he married Marie Edna DeWitte, a student at the college.

In 1902 Phillippi moved to Dayton, Ohio, where he became assistant editor of the Religious Telescope (1902-1908). He became editor in chief of the denominational paper in 1908 and continued in that position until his death, Sept. 27, 1926. His continuous service as editor for more than twenty-four years was the longest in the paper's history. His writing was characterized by support of worthy civic causes and he often took definite stands on national political issues which had a moral aspect. Between 1909-13 he worked to establish the Otterbein Home, an institution for children and aged people established by the United Brethren Church on the site of a former Shaker colony. He wrote The Sword Unsheathed, or The Bible for the Masses (1911) and Shakerism: or the Romance of a Religion (1912).

PHILLIPS, CHARLES HENRY (1858-1951), eighth bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born on Jan. 17, 1858, at Milledgeville, Ga. He joined the M.E. Church, South in 1868 and became a member of the C.M.E. Church when it was formed in 1870.

Phillips was licensed to preach in 1878 and was ordained deacon in 1879 and elder in 1883. He received an A.B. and M.A. degrees from Walden University and a M.D. degree from MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE. Between 1883 and 1884, he was president of Jackson High School (later LANE COLLEGE). He served churches in TENNESSEE, WASHINGTON, D. C., and KENTUCKY. In 1894, he was elected editor of The Christian Index, where he served until 1902 when he was elected bishop by the General Conference. While bishop, he was noted as a scholarly writer and an eloquent speaker. He organized the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE and served as its bishop until his retirement in 1946. Bishop Phillips was designated "Church Historian" when he retired.

PHILLIPS, GLENN RANDALL (1894-1970), American bishop, was born May 21, 1894, in Paulding County, Ohio, the son of Samuel Kepler and Iva Evelyn (Randall) Phillips.

He was married on Dec. 31, 1918 to Ruth Estella Clinger. They have one child, a son, Randall Clinger Phillips, a Methodist minister of Los Angeles.

He received his B.A. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1915; studied at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1916, and in 1917 received his S.T.B. at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He received the D.D. degree from Ohio Wesleyan University, Garrett Biblical Institute, WESTMINSTER COLLEGE and ROCKY MOUNTAIN COLLEGE; the LL.D. from the UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA and UNIVERSITY OF DENVER.

He was ordained in 1920. During 1919-20 he served as pastor at Moorpark, Calif.; at Santa Maria, 1920-25; at North Hollywood, 1925-29; at First Church, PHOENIX, Ariz., 1929-30; and at First Church, Hollywood, Calif., 1930-48.

He was elected to the episcopacy by the WESTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1948 and was assigned to the Denver Area.

Among the memberships he held in various groups were: Board of Lay Activities, 1948; NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA, 1952; WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, 1956 and 1961; WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, Evanston, Ill., 1954; Board of MISSIONS; Board of PUBLICATIONS; Chairman, COMMISSION ON CHURCH UNION, 1960-64; Commission on Jurisdictional Study; Registrar, Board of Ministerial Training, Annual Conference, 1936-48; Chairman, Deaconess Work; Overseas Relief (MCOR); Los Angeles Church Federation; Denver Council of Churches; Los Angeles and Hollywood Ministerial Association, (President in 1934).

He contributed articles to a number of religious publications: A Preaching Mission, 1949; Young Men for Tomorrow's Service, 1951; and Strength for Service.

He was a lecturer, School of Religion, University of Southern California, 1940-45 and has served as trustee of the ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, the University of Denver, and CALIFORNIA WESTERN UNIVERSITY.

He made official visits to the Methodist Mission Projects in INDIA in 1950; to the Methodist Mission Projects in Europe and North Africa in 1953; and served as the Council of Bishops' Representative to the CENTRAL JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1952.

In 1957 he received a citation for his distinguished leadership in the DENVER Area. He was host bishop to the GENERAL CONFERENCE when it met in Denver in 1960 and ably discharged all duties then devolving upon him.

Bishop Phillips retired in 1964 but was recalled by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS and put in charge of the PORTLAND (Oregon) Area in 1967 upon the death of Bishop RAYMOND GRANT. He served until 1968, when he again retired and lived in SAN DIEGO until his death Oct. 6, 1970. A man of singular sweetness of spirit, he was held in high and affectionate regard by all who knew him and especially by his compeers in the Council of Bishops.

PHILLIPS, JOHN MILTON (1820-1889), American book agent and Methodist layman, was born in Montgomery County, Ky., March 26, 1820, the son of William Phillips, a Methodist clergyman. Orphaned at the age of fifteen and left with the responsibility of rearing a younger brother, he began his career with the Methodist Book CONCERN in Cincinnati, Ohio, as office boy and factotum. He applied himself diligently to his work and became an accountant and guarded the business affairs of the Concern.

He was elected a lay delegate to the M.E. General Conference in 1872, at which time he was elected junior BOOK AGENT in New York. He was the first layman to be elected a secretary of the General Conference and also the first layman to become Book Agent. He became senior NEW YORK agent in 1879 and remained in that office until his death.

A quiet and unassuming man, he knew the business of publishing and brought to his post thirty years of experience with the Concern. JOHN M. PHILLIPS died at CINCINNATI, Jan. 15, 1889.

The New York Christian Advocate said of him, "Little has been done or organized on a large scale in Methodism for a quarter of a century without receiving the benefit of his unobtruded counsels and harmonizing spirit."

JESSE A. EARL

PHILLIPS, PETER (1778-1853), British founder of INDEPENDENT METHODISTS, was born at Warrington. Arising from a sense of pastoral neglect, a new movement was started, and the Friar's Green Chapel was built. An encounter with Wesleyan discipline led Phillips to a close study of the New Testament, and he became convinced that the Church should be self-governing and the ministry unpaid and unseparated. Under some Quaker influence for a while, the group was known as Quaker Methodists, and some, including Phillips, adopted the Quaker mode of dress and speech. His preaching secured the establishment of new societies throughout Lancashire and Cheshire, and the new denomination took the name of Independent Methodists in 1808. In 1816 Phillips was elected President of the Conference of the Independent Methodists, a post which he filled eight times. His wife, Hannah Phillips, became a female evangelist alongside her husband, and HUGH BOURNE was influenced by both in his early ventures. Phillips traveled some thirty thousand miles, mostly on foot during this preaching tour.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

PHILLIPS, PHILIP (1834-95), American gospel singer, hymn writer and musical editor of the METHODIST BOOK CONCERN, was born in Chautauqua County, N. Y., on Aug. 13, 1834. He early developed musical talent and at the age of nineteen devoted his whole time to musical science and practice. He was successful in publishing Early Blossoms, a collection of hymns; and Musical Leaves, another brochure of the same type which sold over a million copies. During the Civil War, he entered into the work of the Christian Commission, and published Hymn Songs for the Soldiers' Orphan Home at Iowa, the proceeds of the sale of this book being used for the Soldiers' Home. In 1866 he became musical editor of the Methodist Book Concern in NEW YORK, and issued the New Hymn and Tune Book which was much used in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1868 he visited England, and again in 1872. On this latter trip, he proceeded by SAN FRANCISCO on a tour around the world. He held evenings of song in the Sandwich Islands, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, Palestine, EGYPT and INDIA, sometimes in cities, sometimes beneath the shade of wide-spreading banyan-trees. Returning eventually to Naples, Rome, Florence, Genoa, and the leading cities of Europe, and coming back to England, he gave 200 nights of song for the SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION. He was one of the first of the "gospel singers," as others of that profession following Phillips subsequently made a career of singing for large church congregations, or in revival services, or in giving personal concerts. "Mr. Phillips has the honor of leading in introducing these evenings of song," according to Bishop SIMPSON, "and is the first who has thus belted the globe." He died in Delaware, Ohio, on June 25, 1895.

PHOEBUS, WILLIAM (1754-1831), American physician and minister, was born in Somerset County, Md., in August 1754. Little is known of his early life. While quite young, he joined the Methodist Society. He was admitted on trial to the travelling ministry in 1783 and was appointed to the Frederick Circuit. In 1784, he was appointed to East Jersey. He was one of the ones who attended the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in BALTIMORE in 1784, at which American Methodism was organized into a church under the leadership of COKE and ASBURY.

In 1785 he was appointed to the West Jersey Circuit; 1787 to Redstone; 1788 to Rockingham; 1789 to Long Island; 1790 to New Rochelle; 1791 to Long Island. In 1792 he located, possibly due to his marriage and to the necessity of making more adequate provision for his family. In 1796-97 he returned to the travelling ministry. However, he located once more in 1798 and took up the practice of medicine in the city of New York. He was readmitted to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1806 and stationed at ALBANY. In 1808 he transferred to CHARLESTON, S. C. He returned to NEW YORK in 1811 and served there through 1812. He was sent to New Rochelle in 1813; to New York in 1814-15; to Albany in 1816; to Jamaica, L. I., in 1817; to Zion and Asbury Churches, New York, in 1818; and served as Conference missionary in 1819-20. In 1821 he was given the supernumerary relation and in 1824 was listed as superannuated. He remained in that relation until his death.

According to his contemporaries, Phoebus was a man of considerable intellectual ability and spiritual awareness. He was an effective physician and minister, as well as something of a linguist and historian. His eccentricities of speech and manner, according to NATHAN BANGS, made him on some occasions the object of ridicule—which he bore with patience and Christian grace.

Phoebus was a participant in some of the most significant events in the history of early American Methodism.

In addition to attending the Christmas Conference of 1784, he was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1808 which voted that the Church should hold a delegated General Conference in the future. It is reported that Phoebus made the motion to take up the matter of regulating the General Conference, a matter forcibly brought to the General Conference by a memorial from the New York Conference.

In 1821, Phoebus was elected by the New York Conference of the A.M.E. connection to preside over its first yearly session, in the absence of the invited bishop (probably McKendree) from the M.E. Church. This Conference convened in New York City on June 21, 1821.

Phoebus was the author of two books which are important for the understanding of early American Methodism. The first, An Essay on the Doctrine and Order of the Evangelical Church in America, was published in 1817. It has been called "one of the finest summaries of the doctrinal and historical position of early Methodism. . . ." (Bucke, I, 337). The second, Memoirs of the Rev. Richard Whatcoat, was published in 1828. The first part of the book contains Whatcoat's incomplete Journal. The latter part of the book contains Phoebus' understanding and evaluation of Whatcoat and of his relationship to developing Methodism.

Phoebus died on Nov. 9, 1831. He is buried in Cyprus Hills Cemetery, Brooklyn, N. Y.

PHOENIX, ARIZONA, U.S.A., the capital of the state, is surrounded by many tourist attractions, prehistoric villages, cliff dwellings, Papago Park, and the city's South Mountain Park. Phoenix was founded in 1870 and incorporated in 1881. It is the site of Phoenix Junior College, founded in 1920. Arizona State University is located at Tempe, ten miles away.

According to unverified tradition, N. M. Dyer, presiding elder of the New Mexico District of the COLORADO CONFERENCE (ME), preached the first Methodist sermon in ARIZONA at a date and place not known. Alexander Gilmore of the NEWARK CONFERENCE was later appointed Army Chaplain and assigned to Arizona. He preached in the Southern Methodist Church in 1871. Southern Church work had begun, but evidently no regular work was conducted then. No report of Southern work is available from 1872 to 1875.

In 1880 GEORGE F. BOVARD, a probationer in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE, was appointed to Phoenix. He held services in the George Coast home where the First Methodist Church was organized with eleven members in January 1881. Bovard held a revival in another home and forty-nine members were added to the church. Under Bovard a brick church was built, valued at $4,000 in 1883.

In 1870 the Los Angeles Conference (MES) appointed Alexander Groves a missionary to Arizona. He went to Phoenix, held services in the schoolhouse, and organized a Sunday school. M. M. Jackson hauled children from their adobe hut homes to and from Sunday school in a wagon drawn by oxen. Groves held a camp meeting in the school and in the fall of 1870 organized a class of seven. Later a lot was secured in downtown Phoenix and a frame church was built in 1884. It is the present Central Church.

Other Methodist developments through the years include the establishment of Good Samaritan Hospital in 1912, and the organization of many new Methodist churches. Other branches of Methodism active in Phoenix today are: two C.M.E. Churches, one A.M.E., four Evangelical Methodist, and three Free Methodist. In 1970 there were twenty-two United Methodist churches in the city, with a total membership of 15,550.

Central Church (Mother of Methodism in the Valley), had its beginning in 1870 when two ministers, Alexander Groves and Franklin McKean, were appointed to the Arizona Territory. The Southern California-Arizona Conference Journal states that Alexander Groves was the first pastor assigned to the church. Services were held under cottonwood trees or brush ramadas, and sometimes in the homes of ranchers, in theaters and store rooms, until 1875 when the first church structure was erected at the corner of Second Avenue and West Washington.

In 1880 another church (adobe) was built on the southwest corner of Central Avenue and Monroe, on grounds donated by the city. The congregation grew rapidly and by 1902 the adobe church was replaced by an imposing brick structure which served for many years. The congregation was growing rapidly when the Arizona Territory became a state in 1912.

By 1920 it was evident that more room was needed, so property was purchased at the corner of Central and Pierce and another structure was begun. The cornerstone was laid in 1920 and the first service was held on May 4, 1924. Between 1942 and 1949 land was purchased at Central and Palm Lane and plans were initiated for the present two million dollar plant. Under the leadership of Charles Kendall, the present complex of buildings was realized. In 1949 the Sanctuary was begun and the fifth structure of Central Methodist Church was dedicated Sept. 24, 1950. The educational building followed in 1954, then Pioneer Chapel, and the administrative building in 1955. Kendall Hall, the fellowship facility, was consecrated on Jan. 20, 1957. Additional property was acquired in 1963 for future expansion. The membership in 1970 was 2,785. The peak membership was reached in 1961 at 4,654, however members from this church have started or helped to start several new churches in the Valley.

First Church is considered one of the most beautiful Methodist churches in the entire Southwest. Although officially organized with eleven members in January 1881, the first Methodists began meeting as early as 1874 when four of them came together under a brush-arbor in Phoenix and began worshipping regularly.

The townsite of Phoenix had just been established through a patent signed by President ULYSSES S. GRANT. The population was about 300. Business and town lots were selling for $7 to $11 each. In 1875, with prophetic vision, the M.E. Church through its church extension program, bought strategic lots in the heart of town.

The brush-arbor Methodists decided to rent a building for worship services. The selection was an adobe building with dirt floor and dirt roof, but capable of seating 100 people. The first official meeting was held Jan. 16, 1881, when the church organized with eleven members.

Through the years the church has had four sites—

FIRST CHURCH, PHOENIX, ARIZONA

three in downtown Phoenix and the present site, which is about five miles from the center of downtown Phoenix. For fifty-seven years prior to moving to the present site at Central and Missouri Avenues the church was located at Second and Monroe Avenues. As the city moved northward the membership and attendance began to dwindle until it was below 1000.

Ground breaking services for the educational plant, administration offices and Fellowship Hall were held on March 2, 1952. The first service at the new location was held Aug. 31, 1952. On June 30, 1957 ground was broken for the new sanctuary, and the first services were held in it on Christmas Sunday, Dec. 21, 1958.

The membership in 1970 was 3,193, which is the second largest membership in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE. The church and grounds are valued at $1,200,000.

First Church has a dynamic program for all age groups. It reaches out in service around the world. One college president, GEORGE F. BOVARD, and one bishop, GLENN R. PHILLIPS, have served as its pastors.

PICKARD, BENJAMIN (1842-1904), British Methodist, was one of those Liberal trade unionists who strengthened the hold of Gladstone on the votes of the working class. Pickard was a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER who had started to work in the pit at the age of twelve, and who became general secretary of the Yorkshire Miners' Union in 1881, and the first president of the Miners' Federation in 1888. Outside Parliament he had fought for mines acts, anti-truck acts, and the institution of a living wage; as Liberal M.P. for Normanton he pressed for an eight-hour day in the mines, and for the setting up of conciliation boards to settle disputes.

E. R. TAYLOR

PICKARD, HUMPHREY (1813-1890), Canadian minister and educator, was born in Fredericton, June 10, 1813, into a family which stemmed from the pre-Loyalist congregationalist settlement in New Brunswick. His mother was a member of the first Methodist society in Fredericton. He was educated at the WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, in Connecticut, before returning home to enter his father's business.

Pickard was more interested in the ministry than in business, and in 1835 he sought admission to the Wesleyan ministry. Fortunately he was permitted in 1837 to return to Wesleyan University, from which he graduated in 1839. He was ordained in 1842, stationed in St. John, and appointed editor of The British North American Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, a forerunner of The Wesleyan.

By this time the new Sackville Academy was taking shape, and those in charge were looking for a principal. After considerable hesitation, the young and scholarly Pickard was offered the place. He was at the academy when it opened January 19, 1843, with a few students. Under his skillful management with the number of students quickly increased, and soon the "Female Branch" was added. By 1862, Pickard had secured the establishment of MOUNT ALLISON. The first class in Arts graduated in 1863, the beginning of a steady and increasing stream of trained people who were to find their way into all parts of our country and to the lands beyond the seas.

In 1869, Pickard decided to leave Mount Allison and return to editorial work. Until 1872 he was editor of The Wesleyan and book steward. Subsequently he returned to Sackville, to become Mount Allison's agent and minister of the Sackville Methodist Church. He retired in 1877 and died in Sackville, Feb. 28, 1890.

Apart from his regular duties, Pickard filled many responsible positions in the Methodist Church. The Conference of Eastern British America elected him secretary from 1857 to 1860, co-delegate in 1861, and President in 1862 and 1870. He was often a representative to the British Conference and a member of the second General Conference of the Methodist Church in 1886. Appropriately he was given the doctorate of divinity by Wesleyan University in 1857.

His successor at Mount Allison, David Allison, said:

Nature had endowed him too with vigorous mental powers which within certain ranges had been carefully cultivated. He did not aspire to the reputation of profound or versatile scholarship, but he was a clear thinker, with exceptional aptitudes for the exact sciences, for logic, and for philosophy. As a teacher he excelled in the lucidity of his prelection, in the emphasis with which he presented truth that he deemed important, and in the rare power he possessed of stirring up to intellectual activity the indifferent and the indolent. (The United Churchman.)

Elsewhere Allison concluded: "He was on the whole the most influential personal factor in determining the evolution of Methodist history in the Maritime Provinces."

PICKAVANT, JOHN (1792-1848), was born in Lancashire, England. He was converted to Methodism in 1808.

Initially a local preacher, he was put on trial and sent to Newfoundland in 1814. He was stationed first at Port de Grave, and in 1815 he moved to St. John's, to take charge of the new Methodist chapel, then under erection. In January, 1816, the new chapel was burned, and he went to England to solicit funds for a new one.

Pickavant served in Newfoundland for almost thirty years, and during many of these was chairman of the district and recognized head of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in the colony. He was described as "a master in Israel, gentle and gentlemanly, and in his pulpit an orator at once charming and subduing." His long ministry and his valuable leadership in the district gave inspiration and strength both to members and ministers who were devoted to, and anxious for, the growth of Methodism in Newfoundland.

GEORGE PICKERING

PICKERING, GEORGE (1769-1846), a New England pioneer preacher, was born in Talbot County, Md., in 1769. Converted at eighteen in St. GEORGE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, he became a Methodist in the face of opposition. He was admitted to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1790, and after two years was sent to New England. Over the years he was appointed to BOSTON, Lynn, Lowell, Cambridge, Salem, Marblehead, Newburyport, Gloucester, Roxbury, and other places. Four different times he was appointed presiding elder in Boston, serving a total of eleven years in that capacity. In addition, he was frequently engaged as financial agent for schools and embarrassed churches. On one occasion he made a tour through DELAWARE and MARYLAND collecting money for a chapel in Boston. He was known for tact, enterprise, and success. He had a tenacious memory, a sense of humor, and good judgment. He was a popular preacher and a successful evangelist. It was said that the children and the unlettered as well as the educated comprehended his brief sermons.

A leader in his conference, Pickering represented it at least nine times in the GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1804-32 and 1844. He led the delegation every time except in 1844 when he was the fifth and last member on his delegation. ORANGE SCOTT and others displaced Pickering in the 1836 and 1840 delegations, presumably because they were more vehemently opposed to slavery than Pickering.

In the 1808 General Conference, Pickering had the distinction of being a member of the committee which drafted the plan for a delegated General Conference.

Pickering married Mary Bemis, the daughter of Abraham Bemis, a wealthy and dedicated Methodist layman of WALTHAM, Mass. She inherited her father's estate, and she and her husband lived there the rest of their lives. However, a home in Waltham did not keep Pickering from itinerating as a Methodist preacher. He went where he was sent and visited his family occasionally. His biographer says that in half a century of married life he spent a total of about ten years at home. Pickering never retired, and when he died at Waltham, Dec. 8, 1846, it was claimed that he was the oldest effective Methodist preacher in the world.

PICKETT, DEETS ELBERT (1885-1966), American temperance leader and managing editor of The Clipseet and The Voice, was born in Dangerfield, Texas on Aug. 29, 1885, the son of Leander and Millie Dorrough Pickett.

Pickett came to The Board of TEMPERANCE of the Methodist Church in 1912 as Research Secretary and Managing Editor of The Clipseet, a weekly paper which was sent to all leading newspapers, and The Voice, a monthly magazine with a circulation at that time of about 75,000.

He was educated at Louisville Training School and ASBURY COLLEGE, both in KENTUCKY. He attended the Alcohol School of Studies, Yale University in 1943. He married Annie Belle Mingeldorf Oct. 25, 1907, and they had two children.

After his retirement in 1954 he lived near Fredericksburg, Va., until the family moved to SOUTH AFRICA, where Mrs. Pickett and the children presently live. Pickett passed away in September 1966, in Africa.

During his long career as a temperance worker Pickett was Secretary of The Internal Reform Bureau, (1912), and Executive Secretary of the Christian and Social Commission. He studied liquor control in Great Britain and FRANCE in 1919. He represented the government at the 16th International Congress Against Alcoholism in SWITZERLAND, 1921.

Pickett is the author of Enemies of Youth and other books, monographs, magazine articles and pamphlets.

So impressed with his ability were many governmental leaders that he was invited more than once to assume prominent White House responsibilities. Declining lucrative positions in the darkest days of the temperance movements, Pickett elected to stay on with the Board of Temperance, sometimes at less than half payment of his meager salary.

PICKETT, JARRELL WASKOM (1890-), American missionary to INDIA and bishop, was born near Jonesville, Texas, on Feb. 21, 1890, the son of Leander Lycurgus and Ludie (Day) Pickett. He was graduated from ASBURY COLLEGE, B.A., 1907; M.A., in 1908; and a D.D. in 1926. He received the LL.D. from OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY in 1946, and the L.H.D. from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1966. He married Ruth Robinson on July 27, 1916. Their children are Elizabeth Day (Mrs. Henry Ankeny Lacy), Miriam Lee (Mrs. William E. Gould), Margaret Joy (Mrs. John Sagan) and Douglas Robinson.

In 1908 and 1909, J. Waskom Pickett was a teacher of Latin and Greek at Vilonia, Ark.; and from 1909-10, associate professor, New Testament Greek, Taylor University (Upland, Ind.). He was admitted on trial, ordained deacon, then elder in the NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE (ME) in 1911; full connection in 1913. He served as pastor in LUCKNOW, India, 1910-14; missionary at ARRAH BIHAR, India, 1917-23; superintendent of the Arrah District, 1918-23. He was editor of the Temperance Clip-Sheet, 1917-23; and editor of the Indian Witness, 1925-29. He was secretary of the National Christian Council of India from 1930 until 1936. He was elected bishop by the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF SOUTHERN ASIA in 1935-36 and assigned to the Bombay Area, 1936-45; and the DELHI Area, 1945-56, retiring in 1956.

Since retirement, Bishop Pickett has been professor of Mission, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and counsellor in evangelism, Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS 1957-60, and counsellor in Finance, American Committee for Ludhiana Christian Medical College, New York City, since 1961. He is the organizer of the United Christian Mission to NEPAL, 1950, and its president, 1950-56; chairman, Methodist Church Councils on Christian Education and Medical Work, 1936-56; consultant on the Constitution of India, Indian Political Leaders, 1947-56; and consultant on Indo-American Relations by appointment of Presidents Truman and Eisenhower. He was the organizer, the first chairman of the National Christian Relief Committee, India, 1947; acting president of the National Christian Council, 1945-46; and is the past president of Boards of various colleges, hospitals, and regional Christian Councils.

Bishop Pickett is the author of Mass Movements in India, 1933; Christ's Way to India's Heart, 1938; (with Warner, Azariah, Van Doren, Jones) Moving Millions: The Paganism of Modern India, 1938; (with D. PIERCE, GEORGE FOSTER (1811-1884), American bishop, and one of the great leaders of southern Methodism, was born on Feb. 3, 1811, in Greene County, Ga., when his mother, Ann Foster Pierce, the wife of the distinguished LOVICK PIERCE, was staying at her father's home while Lovick Pierce was making his rounds of the district.

George Pierce had the great advantage of association with and training by his father. George was educated in Greensboro where certain distinguished leaders of the state then lived, and where a teacher of unusual ability took him in hand and taught him the fundamentals of sound learning. He entered the freshman class of Franklin

GEORGE F. PIERCE

College (ATHENS, Ga.), a state school, when he was a little over fifteen years old, and later went into what became the University of Georgia. His college days ended, he attempted to study law, but failed at that, and following an interview with JAMES O. ANDREW, felt called to preach and gave himself into the ministry. He married Ann M. Waldron in 1834 and was almost immediately thereafter sent to CHARLESTON, S. C.

He was elected president of EMORY COLLEGE in 1849, where he served until 1854. Meanwhile, he had been a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844 and had taken part in the great debate which resulted in the PLAN OF SEPARATION and the division of Methodism. He was, of course, a champion of the South and while only thirty-three years of age "was a born ruler of men and bore the kingly look on his face" his biographer expressed it. The motion which eventually passed the General Conference by a strictly sectional vote to depose Bishop Andrew as a slave owner aroused Pierce, and his speech carried in the Journal of that Conference has served to set forth the Southern point of view in a powerful way.

Pierce took part in the organization of the M.E. Church, South, at both the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION in 1845 and the first General Conference in Petersburg in 1846.

George F. Pierce was elected bishop eight years later in 1854 by the M.E. Church, South in spite of a whisper campaign against him which stated that he was not sound in his views on CHRISTIAN PERFECTION. Pierce affirmed that they were substantially those held by the Methodist Church, but he admitted that they were not exactly those of Mr. Wesley nor his father. "The great difficulty has been," he stated long afterward, "not an actual disagreement upon the subject itself, but in the attempt to define what is undefinable." (Smith, Life and Times, p. 190.)

As bishop, he was sent into ARKANSAS and MISSOURI and in 1859 to the far west. He managed to hold the MISSISSIPPI, ALABAMA, and GEORGIA CONFERENCES in 1862 when invasion had already broken up the South, but through the war years could do very little, especially after Sherman had invaded GEORGIA. His only son, Lovick (there were four daughters), of the 15th Georgia Regiment C.S.A. was wounded in the fighting during the Gettysburg campaign, but lived to be the grandfather of the present LOVICK PIERCE, the publisher of The Methodist Church and now retired.

Bishop Pierce took part in what was really the reorganization of the M.E. Church, South, in 1866 at NEW ORLEANS and found himself the senior bishop in 1870. He was admittedly very conservative in his views, part of his antipathy to any involvement of the Church in politics being due to the aggressive attitude of the Northern bishops, especially Bishop SIMPSON, who had no hesitation in relying on Federal Armies to extend the sweep of the M.E. Church in the conquered South. Bishop Pierce opposed the move to establish a theological seminary, as Bishop McTYEIRE managed to do in his sponsorship of VANDERBILT at NASHVILLE. He objected to the extension of the "time limit" from two years to four in the matter of ministerial appointments, and observed in speaking of AUGUSTA, GA.: "The four years rule and the organized choir have well nigh ruined one of the finest churches in the state."

The General Conference of 1878 was held in ATLANTA where Bishop Pierce was much the senior bishop and was given all honor by his comrades. In 1884 he and his wife celebrated their golden wedding and there were many distinguished guests at his home "Sunshine" near Sparta, Ga.

He retired to "Sunshine" and knowing that he would not again make any Conference visitations, he called ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD (later bishop) to him and gave him directions to give Bishop McTyre to take over his Conferences. To a venerable Christian minister, Dr. J. Rembert Smith, who was also a physician and sitting by his side, he asked, "What do you think about me? Will I get well?" The physician paused and then replied, "No bishop, your work is done, it is impossible for you to recover." He died as he had lived in quietness and peace, and was buried at the home of his son in Sparta. His biographer observed that what he had said beautifully of Bishop CAPERS in his memorial service could be said of him: "There were no sins to lament, no vices to deplore."

PIERCE, LOVICK (1785-1879), prominent American minister, from 1804 until his death, both in the M.E. Church and, after its formation, in the M.E. Church, South.

Progenitor of a family productive of Methodist leadership in successive generations to the present day, Lovick Pierce was the father of GEORGE F. PIERCE, widely respected bishop in the M.E. Church, South, and of James L. Pierce and Thomas F. Pierce, ministers in that church; and great-great grandfather of LOVICK PIERCE, who from 1946 to 1970 headed THE METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE.

Lovick Pierce was born March 24, 1785 in Martin County, N. C., where his parents Lovick Pierce, Sr. (son of Philip Pierce) and Lydia Culpepper Pierce settled after their marriage in Portsmouth, Va. Son of an humble household, Lovick Pierce was one of nine children born to his parents. Most of his formative years were spent in Barnwell County, S. C., where his family moved in his early childhood. Later described by their son as plain people who "lived by personal daily labor," Lovick, Sr. and Lydia Pierce reared their children under the general influence of the Baptist Church, predominant among the small farmers, hunters, and trappers of the frontier South, who composed the society of which the Pierce family was a part.

By 1802 the influences of Methodism were being strongly felt in the region of the Pierce farm, and in the summer of that year the entire family, including Lovick and his elder brother, REDDICK, joined the M.E. Church. This occurred despite the initial skepticism of the father, a militia captain, who at the outset had questioned the doctrinal soundness of the new denomination.

In 1803 under the preaching of JAMES JENKINS, a Methodist circuit rider, both Lovick and Reddick experienced conversion and indicated their interest in becoming Methodist preachers. Shortly thereafter the parents moved into GEORGIA, settling in Baldwin County, leaving the sons in SOUTH CAROLINA, where they began their ministry. Received into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1804, Lovick, then nineteen, was assigned to the Great Pee Dee Circuit in Eastern South Carolina, where for a time he was engaged in teaching. At this period the South Carolina Conference embraced all of South Carolina, part of NORTH CAROLINA and the settled portions of Georgia and FLORIDA.

In 1806 when the Conference met at Sparta, Ga., Lovick was assigned to the Apalachee Circuit, during the course of which assignment he took into the church a Miss Ann Foster, the gay and fashionable daughter of a wealthy Green County planter, Col. George Foster. Chastened by her conversion experience, which came, as was often the case in those days, during a camp meeting, the young lady renounced her frivolous ways and in 1809 became the wife of the handsome and fastidious, although as yet unschooled, young preacher. On Sept. 28, 1809, at the home of her father, Ann Foster and Lovick Pierce were married. This year was further made distinctive by Pierce's ordination as elder and his simultaneous assignment by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY to the position of presiding elder of the Oconee District which included half the state of Georgia. At the time, it is said, Pierce was the youngest man ever to be named presiding elder.

From 1809 to 1812 he served in this capacity. In the latter year he was further honored by election to the denomination's first delegated General Conference.

During the War of 1812, Pierce was drafted and assigned as chaplain to the troops at SAVANNAH. It was during these years that the young preacher, because of a throat ailment, reluctantly resolved to give up the traveling ministry for a career more compatible with his responsibilities as husband and father. His son, George, later to become a bishop, was born in 1811, the eldest of Lovick and Anne Pierce's eight children, of whom there were four sons. Locating in 1814, Pierce (1815-1816) pursued a course of study at the medical college of the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia to qualify himself as a preaching physician, a career he followed successfully in Greensboro, Ga., until 1823.

Returning to the itineracy of the M.E. Church in that year, he soon re-established himself as a leader in the denomination, holding various pastorates in Georgia and serving as one of the first agents of Georgia Female Academy (later Wesleyan at Macon). In 1830, when the GEORGIA CONFERENCE was formed from the South Carolina Conference, Pierce was one of its charter members. (In 1867 this conference was further divided into the NORTH and SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCES, with Pierce's membership remaining in the latter.) In 1835 Pierce became a trustee of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in Virginia, receiving the D.D. from that institution in 1843.

Lovick Pierce was a delegate to all the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M.E. Church from 1824 to, and including, the Conference held at New York in 1844 when the sectional division in the denomination occurred. In this division he went with the Southern group, with whose cause he was more than ordinarily identified, having himself been the man to recommend JAMES O. ANDREW in 1812 for conference membership when Andrew was a young unknown preacher. Successively Pierce was a delegate to the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION of 1845 at which the M.E. Church, South, was organized, and to the first General Conference of this church in 1846. At this conference he was elected the fraternal messenger of the M.E. Church, South, to the 1848 General Conference of the M.E. Church. But when this body met in PITTSBURGH, while accepting Pierce personally and unofficially as a friend, it rejected fraternal relationships with the newly formed Church and refused to recognize him in his official capacity. The conference recorded its action as follows:

"... whereas there are serious questions and difficulties existing between the two bodies, therefore resolved that while we tender to Rev. Dr. Pierce all personal courtesies, and invite him to attend our sessions, this General Conference does not consider it proper at present to enter into fraternal relations with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South." (Daily Christian Advocate, May 6, 1848.)

To this Pierce replied: "... within the bar I can only be known in my official character." And he added:

"You will therefore regard this communication as final on the part of the M.E. Church, South. She can never renew the offer of fraternal relations between the two great bodies of Wesleyan Methodists in the United States. But the proposition can be renewed at any time, either now or hereafter, by the M.E. Church. And if ever made upon the basis of the Plan of Separation, as adopted by the General Conference of 1844, the Church, South, will cordially entertain the proposition." (Ibid.)

As Bishop Andrew in 1844 had become the embodiment of the rift in Episcopal Methodism, so Pierce, in 1848, became the symbol of the uncordial feelings that existed between the two ecclesiastical bodies for nearly thirty years. Fortunately Pierce lived to see fraternal relations again established. In 1876, after the M.E. Church had made moves of reconciliation, he was again elected fraternal messenger to the General Conference of that denomination. Ill health prevented his presence at the gathering but the acceptance of his written message by the M. E. body did much to repair the damage caused by its action of 1848.

Up until the time of his death, Lovick Pierce, although never elected to the episcopacy, held a unique position of leadership in the Church, South. Invariably he was a delegate to its General Conferences, and for more than thirty years was a guiding influence in its affairs. Described as being not so rhetorically brilliant as his famous son, George, the "old Doc" in his day was considered by many "the ablest expounder of the Scriptures then living. He was truly a marvelous preacher, deeply spiritual, with a mighty sweep of thought and a vocabulary to match..." He was said to delight in "the grandest themes," delivering them in a diction marked by "the roll of evangelical thunder." For the rudest rustic as well as the most learned scholar, "the simple grandeur of his character had charm..."

Active in body and mind until the end of his life, Pierce died Nov. 9, 1879, in Sparta, Ga., at the home of his son, George, where he had resided during his declining years. Two days later his remains were buried at Columbus, Ga., by the grave of his wife, who died in 1850. His death was mourned throughout the Church and throughout the section with whose affairs he had so closely identified his long and fruitful life. His portrait is in the home of his great-grandson in Nashville, the present LOVICK PIERCE.

PIERCE, LOVICK (1903-), Publisher of The (United) Methodist Publishing House, was born on Oct. 17, 1903, in Sparta, Ga., the son of Walter Flournoy and Sarah (Alfriend) Pierce. He was a student at the Georgia Military College, 1920-21; MORNINGSIDES COLLEGE, D.B.A. in 1952; OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY, Litt.D. in 1961. He married Florence Eugenia Couch on Jan. 30, 1926, and their children are Eugenia Carter (Mrs. Andrew W. Young, Jr.) and Lovick, Jr. Mr. Pierce is the grandson of Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE and the great-grandson of LOVICK PIERCE—the Southern Church leader of a hundred years ago.

He joined The METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE and became its merchandise manager at the Richmond Branch, 1921-29; went to Dallas as manager of the Publishing House Branch there from 1929-46, when he was elected one of the PUBLISHING AGENTS—as they then were termed—of The Methodist Church. The Publishing Agents' title was changed in 1956, with one such to be appointed and to be known as Publisher of The Methodist Church and President of the publishing corporation. Mr. Pierce was elected and continued in this capacity until he retired in 1970.

He was steward in Ginter Park Church, RICHMOND, Va.; Highland Park Church, DALLAS, Texas, where he served as chairman; and in West End Church, NASHVILLE, Tenn. He has been the treasurer of the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1940-46; a member of the Council of Secretaries since 1946; ex officio member of the CURRICULUM COMMITTEE of The Methodist Church; of the 1960-64 Hymnal Commission; the Commission on Worship; the ad hoc committee dealing with the Methodist-E.U.B. union; and director and executive of various church organizations. Presently, Mr. Pierce serves on the Board of Trustees of SCARRITT COLLEGE. He also is one of the directors of the First American National Bank of Nashville; is a member of the American Booksellers Association, for many years upon its board and at one time Vice-President; is a member of the American Book Publishers Council, and of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He has been a member of the Board of Governors of the Nashville Area Chamber of Commerce. The present enlarged Publishing House, including its new building and printing facilities—among the largest in the world—came about under his administration.

PIERCE, RALPH (1827-1908) and Mrs. Pierce, with the Rev. JAMES L. and Mrs. HUMPHREY, were the first missionary recruits from America to join Dr. and Mrs. WILLIAM BUTLER in the INDIA Mission. On the day of the massacre in BAREILLY, May 31, 1857, a meeting was held in BOSTON to bid farewell to these two couples. When they reached CALCUTTA on Sept. 22, they were not allowed to depart for the north, but remained in Calcutta and studied Hindustani. On March 11, 1858, they joined Butler at the Taj Mahal in AGRA in well-furnished rooms in the building known as Jawab (or "answer"), a feature of Moghal architecture.

His first appointment was to Naini Tal. A school for girls was opened in the residence. A few months later the superintendent appointed him to LUCKNOW. (The appointments in those days were given only to the men, but the wives worked as devotedly as did their husbands.) The first converts in Lucknow from a non-Christian religion were from Islam—Hosein Beg, his wife, and daughter. They were baptized June 12, 1859.

In the fall of 1858 a girls' orphanage was opened in Lucknow under the care of Mrs. Pierce. In 1861-62, she was assisted by Miss HUSK (later Mrs. Messmore). In Nov. of 1862, Mrs. Pierce died. The orphanage was then removed to Bareilly, and Pierce became its superintendent. He was assisted by Mrs. David W. Thomas. It became and remained for a generation the largest and most productive of the girls' boarding schools of Indian Methodism. In 1861, the orphan girls in the school numbered forty-one. Two years later they numbered 135. After furlough Pierce remained in America. He died in Washington, D.C., March 17, 1908.

PIERCE, REDDICK (1782-1860), a minister of the M.E. Church, and subsequently of the M.E. Church, South, was born in Halifax County, N. C., Sept. 26, 1782. Both he and his brother, LOVICK, his junior by two years, were admitted on trial into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE at CHARLESTON in 1805, with Bishop ASBURY presiding. Reddick Pierce was sent as junior preacher on the Little River Circuit, GEORGIA. He then served the Sparta Circuit, Augusta station, and COLUMBIA, S. C., and was presiding elder of the Saluda District.

The two brothers differed markedly in appearance and temperament. Reddick was vigorous in body and mind, brave, daring. Lovick was somewhat more gentle and sensitive, with a taste for all the refinements of life.

Reddick was a man of extraordinary power in the pulpit. His brother, Lovick, records that scores fell senseless as Reddick preached. The brothers possessed no early literary advantages, but their ministry was characterized by lofty heroism and wholehearted dedication to the cause of Christ.

Reddick Pierce located in 1812, but returned to the work in 1822. He resided in Fairfield County, S. C., later moving to Mt. Ariel to educate his children. He became very deaf in later life and could communicate with his friends only by writing. He was asked once why he attended church so regularly, for "Uncle Redd, you can't hear a word" said the inquirer. "I go to fill my place" said the old minister simply.

The last twelve years of his life were spent in the home of Jacob Stroman in Orangeburg County, S. C. He died July 24, 1860, and his body was buried at Rocky Swamp Church. This tribute was paid to him by a friend: "A purer Christian never lived. His whole religious life was a rich development of the most guileless devotion to God, His Cause and Kingdom."

PIERCE, ROBERT BRUCE (1917-), American minister and city pastor was born in Hancock, Mich., on April 11, 1917, the son of Ralph Milton and Nellie Payne Pierce. He was educated at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1939; M.A., 1944; GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, B.D., 1941; Hebrew Union College, and holds an honorary degree from UNION COLLEGE. His wife was Harriet Vivian White whom he married on Aug. 3, 1938, and they have four children.

Dr. Pierce was admitted on trial into the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1940 and into full connection and ordained elder in 1942. He served as pastor in Glencoe, Ill., 1941-49; Broadway Church, INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., 1949-57; Metropolitan Church, DETROIT, Mich., 1957-61, at which time he became pastor of the Chicago Temple or First Church of CHICAGO. He serves as a trustee of the Chicago Wesley Memorial Hospital, the Rock River Conference Foundation, the Board of Directors of the Chicago YMCA Hotel, and is a member of the Advisory Board of the Salvation Army. He was the recipient of the Freedom Foundation's George Washington medal in 1954. His office is in the imposing skyscraper building of the Chicago Temple, where of course he preaches each Sunday morning.

PIERCE, WILLIAM HENRY (1856-1948), Canadian minister, was born at Fort Rupert on Vancouver Island, of a Scottish father and a Tsimshian mother, on June 10, 1856. Three weeks later his mother died, and when the news of her death reached her father, he took the infant boy to Port Simpson where he was reared among the tribesmen of his mother.

His first teacher was William Duncan, an Anglican missionary, who founded Metlakatla, ALASKA. At twelve years of age he joined the crew of the "Otter," a Hudson's Bay Company steamer under command of a Captain Lewis, who saw signs of promise in the boy. At fifteen he was converted under the preaching of THOMAS CROSBY, the great Methodist missionary to the Indians of the Pacific Coast. For a time, he acted as an interpreter for Crosby when opening new missions on the coast and up the Nass and Skeena Rivers.

In 1877, Pierce was appointed to Port Essington, at the mouth of the Skeena, where he taught school and preached. Under the direction of Crosby, Pierce opened missions at Port Wrangel, Alaska, at Lak-al-zap on the Nass, at Bella Bella on Campbell Island, and at Bella Coola on the mainland. In 1895 he was with Crosby on the mission boat, "Glad Tidings," when they visited thirty-two villages and travelled over seven thousand miles.

Pierce's next appointment was Kitseguella on the Upper Skeena, but shortly thereafter he was sent further up the river to Kispiox, where he remained for fifteen years. In 1910 he returned to Port Essington—his first mission—and was there until his retirement in 1932.

Pierce, the first person of Indian blood to become a minister in British Columbia, was ordained in May, 1887, at the first meeting of the Methodist Conference. Gifted with an alert mind, compelling humor, shrewdness, and intense Christian devotion, he made an indelible mark on the lives of both Indians and Canadians. He was a staunch advocate of temperance, a leader in social changes, and a wise and trusted counselor.

PIERCY, GEORGE (1829-1913), first British Methodist missionary to CHINA, was born at Pickering, England, February 27, 1829. After two voyages as a seaman he settled back to farming and was an effective LOCAL PREACHER. An interest in China, then newly opening to the West, resulted in his asking the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY for authority to go as a missionary, but they could not contemplate opening new work at that time. Piercy went to Hong Kong on his own charges in 1851, preached to soldiers and civilians, and moved on to Canton in 1852, when he offered himself again to the missionary society and was then accepted as a Wesleyan minister. In 1853 he opened the first Wesleyan preaching hall in Canton and was joined by W. R. Beach and JOSIAH COX. The Wesleyan Church had committed itself to the China Mission. In 1854 Mrs. Piercy began a school for girls; but in 1856, following the second Opium War, the missionaries had to withdraw to Macao. Here, February, 1857, the first Methodist converts were baptized. Piercy returned to Canton in 1858 and remained in South China until 1882. He died July 16, 1913.

CYRIL J. DAVEY

PIERPONT, FRANCIS HARRISON (1814-1899), governor of the "restored" state of VIRGINIA, and M.P. layman, was born Jan. 25, 1814, near Morgantown, Monongalia County, Va. (now W. Va.), the son of Francis and Catherine (Weaver) Pierpont. He won the B.A. degree at ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1839. After teaching school two years in his home state and one year in MISSISSIPPI, he returned home and was admitted to the bar.

An ardent anti-slavery man, Pierpont supported Lincoln for president in 1860. When Virginia seceded from the Union in 1861, he organized a mass meeting at Wheeling in May which led to a convention that elected him provisional governor of Virginia. When WEST VIRGINIA was admitted to the Union in 1863, a new governor was chosen for that state, and Pierpont was granted a four-year term as governor of the "restored" state of Virginia, that is, governor of the few counties which were in Federal hands and not in West Virginia. Pierpont moved his capital to Alexandria and carried on under military protection. When the Confederacy fell, he went to RICHMOND and became in fact the governor of Virginia, carrying on until replaced by a military commander in 1868. He then returned to his home in Fairmont, W. Va., and resumed the practice of law. Known as the "father of West Virginia," the state placed a statue of him in the Capital at Washington in 1910. One biographer says that apparently Pierpont belonged to that large class of men who are selected as leaders in troubled times because they possess strength of conviction rather than strength of intellect.

As a Methodist Protestant strongly opposed to slavery, Pierpont was among those who withdrew from the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MP) in 1866 and went into the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE which became a part of the newly formed Methodist Church (See Table of Methodist Annual Conferences). He was elected president of the Second GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Church which met in Pittsburgh in 1871. Though a delegate to the 1875 General Conference, he did not attend. However he participated in the 1877 Convention at BALTIMORE when the Methodist Church and the Methodist Protestant Church reunited under the latter name, and he served as a delegate to the 1880 General Conference (MP).

Pierpont married Julia Robertson of New York in 1854. He died at the home of his daughter in Pittsburgh, March 24, 1899, and was buried at Fairmont, W. Va.

PIERS, HENRY (1694-1770), British Anglican, figures in JOHN WESLEY's diary as a friend whom he often met in the period leading up to his conversion. Piers himself was led to Christ under the influence of CHARLES WESLEY and JOHN BRAY. A vicar of Bexley, Kent, Piers offered his pulpit to the Wesleys. Kezia Wesley was a paying guest in his home. He was a member of the FETTER LANE SOCIETY and attended the Conferences of 1744 and 1747.

given a Th.B. degree at the Brussels Protestant Theological School and a Ph.D. from Cambridge University (England) in 1965. He was pastor at VILVORDE—the William Tyndale Memorial Church—from 1950 to 1959 and at Uccle from 1962-63. He has been secretary of the annual conference since 1955, a district superintendent since 1961, a professor at the Protestant Theological School since 1961 and Dean in 1966, elected President of the Executive Council of The Protestant Church of Belgium at its organization in 1969. He married Andrée Deslé of Kain (Belgium) in October 1944, and they have two daughters.

PIETISM AND METHODISM. Definitions. Continental Pietism arose in the seventeenth century as the older half-brother of eighteenth century Anglo-American Awakenings of which Methodism is a part. This explains (1) that Pietism was of greater influence on Methodism than vice versa. Yet (2) Methodism is distinct from Pietism because it also stems from other sources than Pietism. Concretely, (3) Pietism and Methodism, both originally mocking names ("Pietism" first used around Darmstadt 1677, "Methodism" at Oxford 1729) share the emerging Protestant emphasis on the piety of the people over against theological doctrine and church structure. They (4) differ because Pietism is embedded in Calvinistic-Lutheran soil while Methodism stems from Anglican-Puritan parentage.

History: Pietism a. Roots. Pietism claims (1) the Reformation. Calvin's concern for the third use of the law (the law as the scaffold for Christian living, Institutes 1559, 2, 7, 12) led the very defenders of orthodoxy to an ethically oriented Precisionism (Voetius 1589-1676). Luther's 1522 Preface to the Romans (with its emphasis on a living faith) motivated the Rostock Reform wing of Orthodoxy (H. Mueller 1631-1675, Scriver 1629-1693). They in turn led Spener (1635-1705) to claim the Preface again and again as the Magna Charta of Pietism. The real Father of Pietism, however, is Martin Bucer, the mediator among the Reformers. His program (cf. the Tetrapolitan Confession of 1530) intended a Protestant consensus on the basis of piety. Direct links connect Bucer with Calvinistic and Lutheran Pietists (Ames, Spener) and also with the Radicals (via Schwenkfeld). Anglican (Bradford) and Puritan (Perkins) piety is also in his debt.

Pietism blends (2) into the unbroken stream of Mysticism. It treasures among the ancients Macarios and among the medievals Tauler. Since the Reformation the Pietistic pedigree includes Protestant mystics like Weigel (1533-1588), Arndt (1555-1621) and Boehme (1575-1624). Nor is Pietism afraid to appropriate seventeenth century Romance Mysticism, particularly Quietism (Molinos 1628-1696/7, Fenelon 1651-1715, de Guyon 1648-1717).

b. Classical Forms. Pietism began around 1630 in the Netherlands as (1) Reformed Pietism, though not yet under this name. It grew out of the academic orthodoxy of the universities (Ames and the Cases of Conscience theology, 1630 ff., at Franeker; Voetius and legalistic Precisionism in conventicles at Utrecht, 1634 ff; Coccejus and evangelical covenant theology, 1648 ff., at Leyden). Pietism was carried out, however, by pastors. In Holland Lodensteyn in Utrecht (Scales of Imperfections 1664) stayed within the church, Labadie in Middelburg (Reformation of the Church by the Ministry 1667) broke with it (1669). In Northwest GERMANY (Muehlheim/Ruhr) Underweyck founded 1666 conventicles which later provided the setting for the devotion of Tersteegen (1697-1769).

Lutheran Pietism (2), which gave the movement its name, developed four main forms. First, there is the Pietism of the founder Spener. During his ministry in Frankfurt/Main (1666-1686) Spener instituted (1670) conventicles out of which grew his Pia Desideria (1675), the program of Pietism which made Spener into the head of the Pietistic party. Second, his student Francke (1663-1727) created Pietistic welfare and educational institutions in Halle. As professor he made the theological faculty of the university into the academic center of Pietism. Third, in Wuerttemberg Bengel (1687-1752) shaped Pietism exegetically-apocalyptically (Gnomon 1742) and his student Oetinger (1702-1782) elaborated it systematically-philosophically (Philosophia Sacra 1765). From these three "pedestrian" forms ZINZENDORF (1700-1760) distinguished the (fourth form of) Pietism of the Moravian Brethren as "equestrian." This Pietism swings wider, first to the Radicals (Dippel, Sifting Period) then to Luther (since 1734). The MORAVIANS were criticized by Halle (Francke's son) and Wuerttemberg (Bengel, Oetinger).

Radical Pietism (3) on Calvinistic soil breaks with the church by external emigration, creating free churches (Labadie 1669, Church of the Brethren 1708). On Lutheran soil it goes into internal emigration. Sectarious withdrew into individualism. Some are loosely interrelated in Jane Leade's Philadelphian Society (founded 1694, Peterson, Breckling, Gichtel). Others represent extreme offshoots on the way to the Enlightenment (Dippel). Most important is G. Arnold (1666-1714). In his Impartial Church and Heresy History (1699/1700) he replaces dogmatic confessionalistic church historiography by the ethical approach of Pietism.

c. Subsequent Forms. Classical Pietism arose against the front of Orthodoxy and foreshadowed the Enlightenment. In the nineteenth century Neo-Pietism (1) emerged on the continent as it did in England and America in the form of revivalism (Erweckung, Réveil). Although it had representatives in universities (Tholuck) it was often anti-intellectual in its reaction to the Enlightenment. The classical Pietistic heritage appears in Neo-Pietism in three ways. In the territorial churches it took the form of Inner or Home Mission (Wichern, Hauge). It was soon expanded into evangelism (Schrenk, Keller), a concern the free churches joined. A special emphasis is found in the Holiness Movement (Rappard, Gebhard).

Neo-Pietism led to Neo-Orthodoxy and related movements. These are today under attack by (2) a contemporary Pietism which stands in a broken relationship to classical Pietism and only in an oblique relationship to Neo-Pietism. The traditional conventicles (classical Pietism) and movements (Neo-Pietism) are exceeded by a new Confessional Movement No Other Gospel (1693 ff.). Its distinguishing marks are a fundamentalism in the attitude toward Scripture and various forms of personalism in its efforts to create Christian life styles (Bergmann, Kuenneth).

History: Pietism and Methodism a. Wesley and Pietism. The founder of Methodism had various contacts with Pietism. (1) Literary Contacts. In his OXFORD days (1733 ff.) WESLEY read widely in Francke and was also acquainted with Arnold. In preparing his Notes upon the New Testament (1755) Wesley extensively excerpted from Bengel's Gnomon of 1742. In 1763 the Notes became a part of (the not yet repealed) doctrinal standards of Methodism. Thus the Lutheran Pietism of Wuerttemberg lives on in the confessional documents of Methodism. (2) Structural contacts are given with the Anglican Religious Societies (e.g. at ALDERSGATE STREET). These were fostered by Anthony Horneck (1641-1696), a friend of Spener's. Wesley modelled his own societies (1739 ff.) more after these than the Moravian societies (e.g. at FETTER LANE) with whom he soon had conflicts. (3) Personal contacts seem to be restricted to meetings with Moravians: on the way to and in GEORGIA (1735 ff., SPANGENBERG) as well as after his return in England (1738 ff., BOEHLER) including a visit to HERRNHUTH 1738, Zinzendorf). From these contacts rose his interest in translating German Pietist hymns. When the Methodists and the Moravians broke (1740 ff.) it also meant for Wesley a conscious decision for the classical Pietism of Spener, Francke and Bengel.

b. Early Methodism and Pietism. The contacts of other early Methodists with Pietism were also embedded in the situation which was marked by two facts. Works by Francke (particularly his Pietas Hallensis, 1705) were generally accessible in the translation of Anthony William Boehm(e). From 1740 on writings of Zinzendorf's became available in English, in addition to the personal influence which the Moravians exerted particularly through their London societies. Some special points. CHARLES WESLEY, like his brother John, was influenced by Pietistic hymnody (Neander, Tersteegen, Zinzendorf) in his frequent insistence that in the sight of God man is but a worm. A charismatic itinerant ministry in England and America led WHITEFIELD into many contacts with Pietists, mainly Moravians, including an unsuccessful correspondence and personal meeting with Zinzendorf (1743).

c. Later Methodism and Pietism. Revivalistic Methodism and Pietism developed largely separately with only occasional meetings. English Methodism stimulated Pietistic publications on Methodism (Niemeyer, Burckhardt, Krummacher, Christlieb). American Methodism originally rejected German language work which led to the formation of the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH (1787 ff.) and the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION (1816 ff.) in both America and GERMANY. When later (1838 ff.) American Methodism supported German-speaking work contacts increased. In America NAST (1807-1899) continually built bridges to the immigrant Germans which led him into a literary controversy with Walther (Missouri Synod Lutheran) over communion (1847). In Germany the meeting ground for Pietism and Methodism became increasingly the Evangelical Alliance which had been founded in England 1846 and was introduced into Germany 1878.

d. Contemporary Methodism and Pietism. Today contacts are on restricted levels. Ecumenical relations of the larger Methodist Churches in America and Britain with the larger Reformed and Lutheran Churches on the continent relegate the Methodist-Pietist relations to inner-evangelical conversations. In Britain the former PRIMITIVE METHODISTS uphold the "Pietistic" stance of the dissenters, although this stance is partly social in origin. In America the smaller Methodist Churches of decidedly Arminian outlook (in the following of FLETCHER, not of Wesley, although the position is claimed to be Wesleyan) relate to the descendants of the early immigration churches with pietistic background. On the continent rural sections of Methodism placed in traditional pietistic surroundings (Wuerttemberg, Lower Rhine, Saxony, parts of SWITZERLAND and SCANDINAVIA) continue old bonds of alliance.

Theology: Pietism. Pietism exists only in concrete geographical, confessional and later denominational forms, although it intends to overcome these. For these reasons Pietism possesses no unified theology. Yet all of its forms (including the Anglo-American Awakening relatives) share certain foundations, concerns and results of classical Pietism.

a. Foundations. (1) The norms of Word and Spirit. For ecclesial Pietism the Word of scripture (devotional book) is the historical vehicle for the Holy Spirit (Coccejus, Bengel). For radical Pietism the outer Word of the flesh only confirms the inner Word of the Spirit (Petersen). (2) The rules of faith and love. The act of faith is more important than the content of belief (Spener, Arnold). The doctrine of faith is exceeded by the life of love (Tersteegen). The mediator between faith and love is conscience (Ames).

b. Concerns. (1) The nature of piety is expressed by the new man who has his origin in the New Birth (Spener) and is edified in SANCTIFICATION and PERFECTION (Spener). (2) The conventicles of piety (Collegia pietatis) anticipate the future Kingdom of God within (for the Radicals: outside) the established churches of the present (Voetius, Bengel). As ecclesiae in ecclesia (respectively extram ecclesiam) they gather the true church in or from the many churches through the means of fellowship (Undereyck, Spener). (3) The practice of piety rests on specific suggestions for conduct (Voetius) but also moves out to tackle social evils (Francke). (4) A reformation of piety is called for as a second reformation building on the first reformation of doctrine (Teelink). Spener's Pia Desideria outline the program: reforms are necessary because of the fallen state of the church (cf. also Arnold). Reforms are possible because of better times promised to the church (cf. also Bengel). Reforms are suggested as concrete measures to be taken up by the church, particularly the ministry (cf. also Labadie).

c. Results. (1) Pietism upholds an ambiguous attitude toward the world as both God's good creation and man's dominion in which he constantly fails. Therefore Pietism's relations to state and society vacillate according to the openness of the people concerned to cooperate with Pietism (Cf. Francke and Prussia). (2) Pietism accepts as special mandate mission work (e.g. Halle Missions in Tranquebar, Moravians in Greenland, both in America). This engenders an irenic spirit of ecumenism which transcends old party lines (cf. Zinzendorf's tropology and Arnold's Church and Heresy History). (3) The expansion of Pietism was effected geographically by outreach (Halle Pietism in Switzerland, Scandinavia, RUSSIA) or transplantation (Moravian colonies in England, Greenland and America). Socially Pietism spread by permeating the lower classes who had few or no worldly goods to lose and by entering the uppermost classes who could afford to. Classical Pietism was not at home in the middle classes. (4) Further effects reach into literature (Goethe, Romanticism, e.g. Schleiermacher) and influenced scholarship particularly in the areas of psychology and education (Francke, Pestalozzi).

Theology: Pietism and Methodism. Original Methodism (i.e. as it felt bound by its doctrinal standards) shared most foundations, concerns and results of classical Pietism. It differs (increasingly so) in some special points.

a. Foundations. (1) The (norming) norms of Word and Spirit are confirmed by the (normed) norms of reason, antiquity and experience. Reason is appropriated because Methodism had to respond to Deism while Pietism preceded the Enlightenment (Knowledge and piety in KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, Charles Wesley). Antiquity is emphasized in agreement with the Anglican mother church (Wesley's refusal to consider separation from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND). Experience is the modern scientific test to which both Methodism and Pietism are open (The legitimate practice of testimonies and the illegitimate invocation of Wesley's private warm heart experience as a model). (2) The rules of faith and love are clarified as suffering and doing the will of God, suffering what God does for us and doing what God does in us (Wesley).

b. Concerns. (1) The nature of piety shall lead the new man to perfection, not a sinless perfection but a perfection that frees from sin (Wesley). Contemporary Methodism has all but renounced this doctrine. (2) The Kingdom of God is an inward work (The life of God in the soul of man, Wesley with Scougal), realized in the Methodist societies (1739 ff.) whose conferences (1744 ff.) are prudential means of grace (Wesley; where two or three confer with each other). Conferences have since (1784 ff.) changed from sacramental to administrative means. Yet Methodism is basically still an ecclesiola (emphasizing fellowship instead of doctrine or structure) although it had to move to ecclesia functions with which it has not yet come to terms. (3) Practical piety is shown by doing no harm, by doing good and by attending upon all the ordinances of God (Rules 1743). Because the third element increasingly tended to become problematic, the first two misled Methodism sometimes into moralism. (4) Reforms of piety are enacted within the societies (the early discipline of membership tickets, later given up) but also encouraged at large (Wesley's criticism of war and opposition to slavery, Methodism's Social Creed).

c. Results. (1) Originally the ambiguity of the world was felt more in personal than social categories. Therefore Methodism always supported (sometimes uncritically) the state (Wesley and the Crown, ASBURY and the outcome of the American Revolution) at least silently (under totalitarian regimes). Recently Methodism notices ambiguities in the social, yet hardly in the cosmic world. (2) Mission and ecumenism have been strong Methodist emphases since Wesley. Often mission and ecumenism were pursued with an optimistic activism which is today being challenged. (3) Methodism expanded geographically mainly among English speaking people through evangelism (at home) and mission (abroad). In the western world it appealed originally to the lower classes whom it soon lifted socially through the preaching of frugality (Wesley: On the use of money). Only rarely were entrances into higher classes achieved (Whitefield and LADY HUNTINGDON). Today Methodism is predominantly middle class, another reason for its rejection of Pietism. (4) Of the further effects of original Methodism few remained alive. Wesley's broad literary activity was soon overshadowed by dissenter position (in Britain) or revivalist emotionalism (in America). Wesley's emphasis on learning was kept alive mainly among the Wesleyan Methodists in England. Others, especially in America, advocated a less complicated activism. Wesley's concern for education (Kingswood School) was replaced by evangelistic SUNDAY SCHOOLS (Cf. the late foundation of Methodist seminaries and their thorough practical emphases).

A new Wesley renaissance (Cannon, Lindstrom, Towlson, Monk, C. Williams, M. Schmidt) has promise to lead Methodism not only to a much needed reappraisal of Wesley's significance but also to an openness toward its Pietistic relations and affinities.

PIGGOTT, HENRY JAMES (1831-1917), leading pioneer missionary in Italy, was born July 18, 1831, at Lowestoft, England, the son of William Piggott (missionary in SIERRA LEONE, 1824-28) and Elizabeth Gadsden. Educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL (1842-44), at Wesley College Taunton, and London University (1848-50), he entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry, and served in Newbury, Berks, OXFORD, Hastings, and Hammersmith. He married Mary Ellen Brown in 1859. He refused invitations to AUSTRALIA and INDIA with RICHARD GREEN, but accepted one as pioneer missionary to Italy in 1861. He arrived in ITALY in November, 1861; initiated work at Ivrea, and Milan, and assumed leadership of the mission when ill-health compelled Green's return in 1863.

HENRY PIGGOTT

In 1865 he moved his base to Padua, and then to ROME in 1873. In 1870 the work was divided into two districts, north and south, Piggott being the General Superintendent. He is regarded as the Father of Methodism in Italy, and his Life and Letters as its primary text book. He was a scholar, evangelist and administrator, wide in ecumenical vision, and a tireless worker in the cause of unity among Protestants in Italy. He retired from the Superintendency of the mission in 1902, and from active pastoral work in 1903. Thereafter he lived in Rome until his death on Nov. 30, 1917.

PILCHER, ELIJAH HOLMES (1810-1887), American minister, was born in Athens, Ohio, on June 2, 1810. He was admitted to the OHIO CONFERENCE on trial in 1829, and preached one year in WEST VIRGINIA. Then followed eight years on farflung pioneer circuits in MICHIGAN.

Beginning in 1838, he served terms as presiding elder of several districts, interspersed with prominent appointments in Michigan. In 1833 Pilcher was one of four Methodist leaders who began working to establish a Seminary in Michigan, later ALBION COLLEGE. He served Albion as trustee, agent, and professor. He helped to establish the University of Michigan, serving five years as regent. He promoted the establishment of Michigan State Agricultural College, and was co-founder of the Michigan Christian Advocate. He served nine times as Secretary of the Conference, five times as delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE, as a trustee of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and member of the BOOK COMMITTEE of the BOOK CONCERN. He organized at least thirteen churches.

Pilcher studied law and was admitted to the bar; later he studied medicine and was admitted to practice. He was the author of Protestantism in Michigan, published in 1878, and of many articles.

In 1877 he heeded the call to aid the Canadian Methodists. He was serving as presiding elder of the Hamilton District in 1882, when his health broke. Pilcher died April 7, 1887 at the home of his son, Lewis, in BROOKLYN, N. Y. Married three times, he had four sons and one daughter. A son, Leander, served as a missionary in CHINA.

PILGRIM HOLINESS. (See WESLEYAN CHURCH.)

PILLAR OF FIRE CHURCH, THE, is a Methodist oriented pentecostal group organized around the teachings of Mrs. Alma White. It was organized in 1901 at DENVER, Colo., as the Pentecostal Union. The name was changed in 1917 to Pillar of Fire. The movement was ruled charismatically by Mrs. White until her death in 1946, and has been headed by her son, Arthur K. White, since that time. Mrs. White had been converted under Methodist ministers in KENTUCKY and eventually married one from COLORADO. She preached from her husband's pulpit but eventually gathered an independent following. She withdrew from the Methodist Church after conflict developed with church authorities. Mrs. White became the first bishop of the new body.

The Pillar of Fire teaches the "second blessing" holiness doctrine and premillenarianism, as part of the program to revive primitive Wesleyanism and to re-establish the true "New Testament" church. The church is anti-Catholic and defends the Ku Klux Klan. In the 1940's three volumes entitled Guardians of Liberty were first published in order to highlight these views.

The Pillar of Fire operates a large number of day schools, elementary schools and academies. Two colleges, Alma White College at Zarephath, N. J., and Bellville College at Denver, Colo., are in operation. The Bellevue Bible Seminary operates out of the Alma Temple in Denver. Home missionary work is carried on in most of the major cities across the United States and foreign work in England and LIBERIA. The church was among the first to enter the radio ministry, buying its first station in 1927. Two others were added shortly after.

A periodical, The Pentecostal Union Herald (changed to Pillar of Fire in 1905) appeared almost as soon as the denomination. It has been joined by seven others. The denomination also publishes numerous books, mostly by Mrs. White and her sons.

PILMORE, JOSEPH (1739-1825), Methodist itinerant in Great Britain and one of the first two preachers sent to America by JOHN WESLEY. (There are four spellings of his surname: Pillmore, Pilmoor, Pilmoore, Pilmore.)

He was born in Tadmouth, Yorkshire, England, Oct. 31, 1739. His parents belonged to the Church of England. At the age of sixteen, under the influence of John Wesley, he was converted. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. In 1765 he was admitted into the Methodist Conference on trial, and the next year into full membership. For two years he preached in WALES.

In August 1769, he volunteered to go to America to preach and the Conference sent him. He and RICHARD BOARDMAN arrived at GLOUCESTER POINT, N. J., on Oct. 24, 1769. The following day they met with the Methodist

JOSEPH PILMORE

Society in PHILADELPHIA. From that date until May 1772, Pilmore and Boardman alternated their ministries in Philadelphia and New York City, exchanging every four months. In Philadelphia, Pilmore supervised the purchase of ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH and introduced the Intercession and the LOVE FEAST into American Methodism. From May 26, 1772, until June 2, 1773, Pilmore made an evangelistic tour into the Southern Colonies, going as far as SOUTH CAROLINA. He formed Methodist Societies in BALTIMORE, Md., and in PORTSMOUTH and NORFOLK, Va. Even though there were no appointments for Pilmore and Boardman at the first American Conference in 1773, they continued their ministries in Philadelphia and New York for a short time. During the winter of 1774 they returned to England. Pilmore received no appointment at the Conferences in England in 1774 and 1775. From 1776 to 1784 he received appointments at LONDON, NORWICH, Edinburgh (twice), DUBLIN, NOTTINGHAM, YORK.

Sometime after the Conference of 1784, Pilmore withdrew from the Methodist ministry. Many reasons have been suggested for this action. Basically there was a decisive conflict between him and Wesley. Perhaps this division is the "Paul and Barnabas episcopy" of early Methodism.

In 1785 Pilmore was ordained a deacon and a priest of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. From 1786 to 1789 he served as rector of the United Parishes of Trinity (Oxford, Pa.), All Saints (Lower Dublin, Pa.), St. Thomas, Whitemarsh (Pa.). From 1789 to 1794 he was assistant rector at St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia. In 1794 he became rector of Christ Church, New York City. In 1804 he returned to Philadelphia and served as rector of St. Paul's Church until 1821, when he retired. In 1807 the University of Pennsylvania conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree.

He died July 24, 1825 and is buried beneath the floor of the Sunday school room of St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia.

JOSÉ PEDRO PINHEIRO

PINHEIRO, JOSÉ PEDRO (1907-), a bishop of the Methodist Church in Brazil, was born on March 19, 1907, in Garibaldi, state of RIO GRANDE DO SUL, BRAZIL, the son of Pedro and Marieta (Krieger) Pinheiro. His education included a secondary course in the Methodist seminary at PORTO ALEGRE INSTITUTE, and one year at the CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at EMORY UNIVERSITY.

Pinheiro was ordained deacon in 1933 and elder in 1935. He always served in his native state, both in rural and urban areas, successively as pastor, district superintendent, principal (Reitor) of the Instituto Porto Alegre, and director for seven years of the Lar Metodista, the children's home, in SANTA MARIA. He has also been editor of the Methodist youth magazine, Cruz de Malta; regional secretary of the Boards of Christian Education and of Missions; and president of the Central Council, the key committee coordinating activities between the Methodist Church of Brazil and the Methodist Church of the United States. He has also strongly supported Instituto João Wesley in Porto Alegre—designed to train pastors and laymen.

José Pinheiro was elected Bishop of the Second Region in 1955, re-elected in 1960, and again in July 1965. He retired at the July 1970 General Conference.

W. W. PINSON

PINSON, WILLIAM WASHINGTON (1854-1930), American clergyman and missionary administrator, was born in Cheatham County, Tenn., on April 4, 1854, and joined the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, in 1878. He served pastorates at Bell Buckle, Winchester, McMinnville, Tracy City and Franklin in TENNESSEE, at AUSTIN, SAN ANTONIO and Gonzales in TEXAS, COLUMBUS, Ga., and LOUISVILLE, Ky.

He was Assistant Secretary of the Board of Missions from 1906 to 1910 and General Secretary from 1910 to 1926. He then became the editor of missionary literature for the Sunday schools, in which capacity he served four years.

In 1916 Pinson launched the Missionary Centenary, a successful campaign to raise $35,000,000 for Southern Methodist missions in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Methodist missionary society, and he was chairman of the joint committee representing both branches of American Methodism.

Pinson received honorary degrees from the University of Georgia and SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and traveled widely in visiting the foreign mission fields of the world. Pinson College in Camaguey, CUBA, was named in his honor.

Pinson was the author of In Black and White; Missions in a Changing World; China in Action; Bishop Walter R. Lambuth, Prophet and Pioneer; and George R. Stuart, His Life and Work.

He died on Oct. 7, 1930, at Nashville, Tenn., and was buried there.

PIRMASENS, Germany, has the mother church of Palatine Methodism, founded in 1855 by Ernst Mann. While waiting for his ship to America, he was invited to a BREMEN Methodist meeting and converted. He returned to his home city and began to bear witness; many were awakened. Persecution followed; meetings were prohibited several times; one preacher, the father of Bishop JOHN L. NUELSEN, had to leave the city within three hours. It was only in 1883 that all this was stopped by royal decree. But the church was growing. In 1876 a meetinghouse was dedicated. At the same time congregations were founded in other Palatine towns and in neighboring villages. In 1898 a big church was built, soon proving too small; so in 1914 another meetinghouse was bought and a second minister appointed. In the Second World War the church was destroyed and its members dispersed, the city being evacuated two times. But new members were won, and the church was reconstructed in 1950. There were about six hundred members in 1967, served by one minister. There has been a certain decrease in membership owing to mobility of population, particularly young people leaving Pirmasens.

PITEZEL, JOHN H. (1814-1906), American preacher, was born in Frederick County, Md., on April 18, 1814. The family moved to "the wilds" of OHIO when John was nine. He lived in Tiffin, Ohio from age fifteen to twenty, and was licensed to preach in April 1834. He attended Norwalk Seminary for a year, and in 1835 was assigned to the Lima Circuit in Ohio, and later in the year appointed to the Lower Sandusky Circuit as junior preacher. When the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE was formed at Mansfield, Ohio in 1836, John was appointed to the Tecumseh Circuit. After serving ADRIAN, Ypsilanti, Northville and Plymouth in southern Michigan, he was appointed to the SAULT STE. MARIE Indian Mission in Michigan's Upper Peninsula in 1843. He served the Kewawenon Mission during 1844-47, and the Eagle River Mission among the early copper miners during 1847-48. From 1848 to 1852 he served as Superintendent of the Indian Mission District of the Michigan Conference, in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. After leaving these appointments he wrote Lights and Shades of Missionary Life (1857), giving vivid accounts of Indian life, and of early copper mining activities and white settlers. From 1852 to 1859 he served Kalamazoo, Allegan, Edwardsburg, and Paw Paw, in southern Michigan. In 1859 he was made supernumerary and superannuated until 1870, when he was put on the active list again and appointed to Flowerfield. He retired again in one year, due to continuing frail health, and went to live at Three Rivers, his wife's home. She died in 1880, and in 1887 Pitezel married the widow of C. W. Breckenridge of the OHIO CONFERENCE. They went to live in Norwalk, Ohio, and when she died in 1901, Pitezel went to live with a daughter in Loraine, Ohio. He died at the daughter's home on May 4, 1906. Burial was in Three Rivers, Mich.

PITHORAGARH, India, a subdivision headquarters town in the beautiful Shor Valley of Kumaun District, Uttar Pradesh, has been a center of Methodist church activities since 1873. The beginning was made by arrangement of Bishop JAMES THOBURN on the suggestion of the missionaries of the London Missionary Society in Almora, who had learned that they were not to be allowed to open work there.

The request was made that a doctor be sent from America for Pithoragarh. Richardson Gray was sent in response to the request. In preparing to open missionary work in that remote but strategic center, he spent considerable time in Almora, the governmental district headquarters, and in the home of the most experienced missionaries in the Indian Himalayas. Before his preparations were complete he became engaged to Margaret Budden, one of four daughters of that greatly respected family. They were married and began work in Pithoragarh in 1875.

While four fifths of the people of the valley were Brahmins, and some were prosperous, there were no schools.

Gray began medical work. Mrs. Gray, knowing the local language (Kumaoni) well, invited the women to her home and began teaching them needlework. Out of these activities came a call for a girls' boarding school. Annie Budden came to visit her sister and accepted an invitation to take charge of the girls' school. She joined the Methodist Church and soon thereafter became a missionary of the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

One day, a Hindu widow named Sarli came with two sons and two daughters, asking for religious instruction. The whole family soon became zealous Christians. One of the boys, named Khuliya, adopted the surname Wilkinson and became the leading Indian minister of the district. The long-range results of missions are well illustrated by the record of the Wilkinson family since Sarli's conversion in 1877. A son of Khuliya, Richard Wilkinson, followed his father into the ministry and served as pastor of large churches and as superintendent of two districts, one of them Pithoragarh. One of Richardson's sons has been professor of sociology in the University of Nagpur and is an eminent Christian layman who represents the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in a study project in the United States. Another son is doing important social work in New York, and a daughter has held very responsible positions in educational institutions in India and America. A daughter of Khuliya married a young minister who has been superintendent of two districts, one on the plains of the Uttar Pradesh, the other, Almora.

From the small primary schools started by the Grays have come in the intervening years and through the able missionary service of many men and women—Indian more than American—a co-educational intermediate college and a junior high school for girls. From the early emphasis on healing, a wonderful ministry to sufferers from leprosy has been developed on the mountain just above Pithoragarh.

Outstanding among the missionaries from abroad has been LUCY W. SULLIVAN, who with Annie Budden exercised tremendous influence on two generations of Hindus and Christians in the Shor Valley and adjacent areas.

PITMAN, CHARLES (1796-1854), American pastor, orator, evangelist, presiding elder, and denominational administrator, was born at Cookstown, Burlington County, N. J., on Jan. 9, 1796. Early in his youth he came under the influence of Methodist meetings in Wrightstown, N. J., walking six miles to attend them. In his sixteenth year he was converted. Later he attended the Methodist services in New Mills (PEMBERTON), N. J.

At the age of seventeen he began teaching in a country school near his home. After his marriage (around 1817), he taught in a school near New Mills.

In 1817 he was licensed as a LOCAL PREACHER and accepted a supply appointment on the Trenton Circuit (New Jersey). In 1818 he was received on trial in the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. In 1820 he was ordained DEACON and in 1821 ordained ELDER.

Pitman's highly successful ministerial career may be summarized under three types of assignment: as pastor, as presiding elder, and as denominational administrator. He served local pastorates from 1817 to 1826: Trenton Circuit, Bergen Circuit, New Brunswick, Bridgeton, all in New Jersey; ST. GEORGE'S, PHILADELPHIA (twice); Union, Philadelphia; Eighth Street, Philadelphia; Green Street, Trenton (New Jersey).

He served as presiding elder on the West Jersey District (1826-1830), on the East Jersey District (1830-1833), and on the Trenton District (1841).

He served as special agent to raise funds for DICKINSON COLLEGE (1835-36). From 1841 until his forced retirement in 1850, because of illness, he served as Secretary of the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church.

In 1844 the University of North Carolina honored him with the D.D. degree.

He was a leader in the movement to have New Jersey Methodism become an Annual Conference, separate from the Philadelphia Conference. This was done by the General Conference of 1836.

He died in Trenton, N. J., on Jan. 14, 1854, and was buried in Mercer Cemetery in that city.

Both Pitman Grove Camp Meeting and the City of Pitman, Gloucester County, N. J., which grew out of the Camp Meeting, are named for him.

PITMAN COMMUNITY CENTER, Methodist rural community institution, was established in 1921 by John S. Burnette. It is located on Webb's Creek in Sevier County, Tenn., and serves a large area of the mountain country. A school, physician, nurse, a store selling used clothing and furnishings at a small price, post office, and craft shop comprise the center. The property has twelve acres of land used as a demonstration farm.

L. W. PIERCE

PITTS, FOUNTAIN E. (1808-1874), American preacher and missionary to South America was born in Georgetown, Ky., July 4, 1808. Both parents died when he was quite young. Fortunately, relatives provided him a good home and education. At twelve, he joined the church; at sixteen he was licensed to preach; and in 1826 he was admitted into the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, on trial. Four years later he was ordained an elder and transferred to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE.

In 1835, while pastor of McKendree Church, NASHVILLE, Tenn., he was asked by the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society to make a survey of South America. This was in response to a resolution of the 1832 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, asking for study of the possibility of the church entering South America.

Gone from home nearly a year, Pitts spent six months in South America and made lasting impact upon BRAZIL, URUGUAY, and ARGENTINA. At RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil, he organized a Methodist class in two weeks and petitioned the board to send a permanent missionary. He also organized a class in MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay. In BUENOS AIRES, Argentina, he organized a Methodist society and made preliminary arrangements for building a church.

Direct results of his survey were the sending out of JUSTIN SPAULDING, founder of the work in Brazil, the first Methodist missionary appointed for permanent service in South America, and of JOHN DEMPSTER, founder of Methodist work in Argentina and Uruguay.

Mrs. Pitts' health required his early return to TENNESSEE, where he served as circuit preacher, station preacher, and district superintendent. He became one of the leaders of the M.E. Church, South, at its organization and afterward.

Fountain Pitts was gifted in mind, voice, and personality. Eloquence and imagination made him one of the powerful preachers of his generation. He was noted for his campmeeting preaching, at a time when distinguished preachers of all denominations were creating the notable Cumberland Valley revival epoch of the first half of the nineteenth century. The slavery controversy embittered many churchmen, both North and South, but Fountain Pitts constantly sought to temper the passions of all with Christian charity and understanding. Early in the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, Pitts moved that LOVICK PIERCE, a like-minded peace maker, be sent to the next General Conference of the M.E. Church, as a fraternal delegate "to convey the love and good wishes of the Southern brethren."

Pitts' consuming concern became the redemptive ministry and welfare of the church. At the General Conference of 1874, he co-authored a resolution which resulted in the formation of the Brazil mission. On Sunday, however, during that Conference in LOUISVILLE, Ky., having preached twice, he was fatally stricken and died on May 12 of that year. The first funeral service was before the General Conference; the second was in McKendree Church in Nashville, Tenn., before his own congregation and a multitude of friends from all faiths.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. (population 512,789), is the second city in the state in size. It was laid out in 1786 and its strategic location at the junction of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers which formed the Ohio gave it early prominence as a gateway to the West. Its proximity to large bituminous coal fields and certain deposits of iron ore led to the establishment of large steel mills which have formed the basis of its industrial life through the years. The coal and steel industry drew persons from almost every portion of the world to Pittsburgh, and it has been truly a melting pot of the nations.

The city is first mentioned in the minutes of the M.E. Church for 1788, when Charles Conway was appointed the first preacher in the circuit, embracing the region for many miles around the city. In 1790 there were ninety-seven circuit members, though not many in Pittsburgh itself. Bishop ASBURY first visited the city in 1789, and makes the following record: "I preached in the evening to a serious audience. This is a day of very small things; what can we hope? Yet, what can we fear? I feel great love to the people, and hope God will arise to help and bless them."

Methodism was finally established in Pittsburgh in the year 1796 through the work of JOHN WRENSHALL, who had been born in England where he was converted in a Methodist society and became a local preacher. He removed to PHILADELPHIA in 1794 and then in 1796 came to Pittsburgh to open a new store. A little society under the leadership of Wrenshall met variously in a large room at the old fort at the Point, and in Wrenshall's home. In 1808, the little congregation moved to the home of THOMAS COOPER where, for some two years, services were held until the first Methodist church building in Pittsburgh was erected on the corner of Front and Smithfield Streets on a lot purchased from Thomas Cooper. On Aug. 28, 1810, Bishop Asbury stood upon the cornerstone of this church and preached, and made this entry: "The society here is lively and increasing in numbers, and the prospect still is good in this borough." This was the only house of worship owned by the Methodists until 1817, when a church was erected at the corner of Smithfield and Seventh Streets, where there has been a continuing congregation to the present.

The growth of the Methodist Church was quite rapid until between 1824 and 1829 great controversy arose in reference to the economy and government of the Church. A great deal of controversy was centered in the Smithfield Street Church, and the M.P. Church, which separated from the M.E. Church, became very strong in Pittsburgh and had a glorious history until 1939 when Methodism was reunited.

The Methodist Church in Pittsburgh grew rapidly, serving the diverse areas of the city by the establishment of what came to be great churches. In 1970 there were three churches with memberships of over 2,000 members. They are: Baldwin Community Church, Christ Church in Bethel Park, and Mt. Lebanon Church. Time has taken toll of the membership of certain other great churches, and yet First Church (formerly Christ) in Shadyside, Calvary Church on the Northside of Pittsburgh, and Emory Church in East Liberty are rendering a great service in difficult neighborhoods of Pittsburgh.

One of the significant movements of Pittsburgh Methodism was the creation of a City Society organized in 1880. It was chartered in 1894 as the Methodist Church Union and it serves as the official Home Mission and Church Extension agency for Pittsburgh Methodists. Through its efforts, Methodism has been attempting to relate to the City of Pittsburgh in days of change and decedance.

Three GENERAL CONFERENCES have been held in the City of Pittsburgh. The first in 1828, again in 1848, and more recently in 1964. The General Conference of 1964 held its sessions in the Civic Arena, which is noted for the dome which can be opened so that the great arena becomes an open-air theater. The late Bishop W. VERNON MIDDLETON, resident bishop of the Western Pennsylvania Area, in welcoming the 1964 General Conference, welcomed them to "the Renaissance City" and pointed out that persons had come from fifty states and nearly two score lands to attend the sessions.

The churches of Pittsburgh are contained within two districts of the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE, the Pittsburgh District and the Pittsburgh East. There are at the present time 54,822 members in ninety-five churches in Pittsburgh and its immediate environs. These churches possess assets in the amount of $37,896,084. The Methodist Church, therefore, is one of the dominant Protestant groups in the City of Pittsburgh, and its influence and service in the city is very great.

Baldwin Community Church is a large church in the Whitehall, South Hills section of Pittsburgh, which grew rapidly after its organization on Mothers' Day, May 12, 1946, when it was organized with eighty-five charter members under T. R. Courtice, the superintendent of the Pittsburgh District of The Methodist Church, who was the first minister of the new church. In October 1947, Courtice retired as David J. Wynne was appointed pastor and served through 1961. The church grew so rapidly that by 1952 two separate services were unable to seat the congregation and a third service was called for. The third building, a sanctuary, was completed in 1955 and on Christmas Eve the first service was held in the new building. In November 1959, the ground was broken for the final educational building and the addition housed thirteen classrooms of public school room size, a visual aids room, additional rest rooms and storage areas, bringing the total cost of buildings and lands to over a million dollars.

One of the striking experiences in the life of this church was the entertainment of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in May of 1959 under the direction of Bishop LLOYD C. WICKE.

The story of Baldwin Community Church is a chronicle of growth in numbers and property, but likewise it is one of growth to a spiritual maturity. Across her years, she developed into a church of 3,110 in 1970, in which a program of family centered nature has been developed from interests such as dramatic groups, ceramics groups, chess groups, choirs, photography and art interests as well as those inspirational and educational opportunities that are usually associated with the on-going process of a local church. A weekday nursery school was begun as a service to the local community and enrolls over sixty pre-school youngsters in each semester and is an integral part of the program of the church.

The church members are divided into a circuit system with three circuits, three ministers, and under each minister is a circuit lay leader. In each circuit, there are section leaders who are members of the Commission on Membership and Evangelism of the local church. Under each section leader, there are various area leaders. Areas are groups of some ten to twelve families for the purpose of fellowship, concern and general pastoral care. The area system works extremely well as a mode of communication for the overall effectiveness of the pastoral responsibility of the church in the community and is one of the keys to the success of this intimate relationship that exists in an extremely large church.

Christ Church, Bethel Park. Located on Highland Road in Bethel Borough, this great Church, started in 1949, had become the largest church in the Western Pennsylvania Conference by 1967. The organizing minister was Harry N. Peelor. The site of the new church was purchased by the Methodist Church Union of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1945, and the proposed church was listed as a new appointment at the Conference session in October 1949. The first service was held on Oct. 20, 1949 in a two-room office on the second floor of the Mitchell Building on Highland Road, Bethel Borough. The first twenty-seven members were received in November 1949. On April 13, 1950 the church was officially chartered by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania with 200 charter members. On July 5, 1951 ground was broken for the first unit of the building which was occupied for the first service in it on Easter Sunday, April 13, 1952. In May, 1959 ground was broken for three additional units, a sanctuary, with administration and educational wings. The new sanctuary was opened for worship on April 3, 1960. The 1960 membership had grown to 1,805, and by 1970 it was 3,604, with a property valuation of $1,730,387. Its total benevolent contributions in 1970 were $34,351 while the church continued carrying a heavy building indebtedness. A highly developed system of pastoral care was inaugurated in the fall of 1961 whereby the congregation is divided into three societies each functioning under the administration of an ordained minister of the church staff. This is said to maintain the warmth of a smaller church while retaining the power of the present large one.

First Church. The first record of Methodist preaching in the City of Pittsburgh shows that WILSON LEE of the Red Stone Circuit preached in the Triangle district in 1785, one year after Methodism was organized in America and twenty-seven years after the founding of Pittsburgh. The Pittsburgh Circuit was formed in 1788 with Charles Conway as the pastor. For the first seven years meetings were held in the First Presbyterian Church and the remains of old Fort Pitt. Later they were held in private homes until the first brick chapel was completed in 1810 on Front Street between Smithfield Street and Wood Street, with William Knox as the pastor. In 1817 the group moved to a larger church at Smithfield Street and Seventh Avenue. On March 5, 1828, this church was incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania.

First Church was divided over the issue of mutual rights of ministers and laymen. In May of 1829 opposing groups in the church, one known as the "Old Side" and the other as "The Reformers," were holding separate services in the Methodist Church at the corner of Seventh Avenue and Smithfield Street. On June 24, 1829, the church was placed under the "Conventional Articles," which had been adopted in Baltimore, Md., on Nov. 12, 1828. On May 25, 1831 ground was purchased for a new church building on Fifth Avenue near Smithfield Street. This church was dedicated June 3, 1833. Later it came to be known as "The Old Home." The Corporation owned the churches on Water Street, Smithfield Street and Fifth Avenue and also a cemetery where the Pennsylvania Railroad Station now stands. Litigation developed among the members of the original church over the ownership of this property. The Superior Court of Pennsylvania held all of these properties belonged to the majority group or the "Reformers," who retained the original charter. However, the court recommended an amicable settlement, and an agreement was reached in which the "Reformers" gave to the "Old Side" group the title to the property at Smithfield Street and Seventh Avenue and $2,000. On Feb. 6, 1838 this group was incorporated as The Smithfield Street M.E. Church. In 1893 the church located on Fifth Avenue, known as The First Methodist Protestant Church in the City of Pittsburgh and holding the original amended charter, built two churches belonging to the same corporation, The First M.P. Church and Trinity M.P. Church. Following Methodist Union in 1939, the First M.P. Church again amended its charter, changing its name to The First Methodist Church of Pittsburgh. In 1946 The First Methodist Church of Pittsburgh united with Christ Church under the name of The First Methodist Church of Pittsburgh and the original charter granted by the Pennsylvania State Legislature in March of 1828 was amended to that effect. First Church reported 1,207 members in 1970.

John Wesley A.M.E. Zion Church. In the spring of 1836, a small group of Christians began holding religious services in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Parker on Roberts Street. In July of the same year, they were organized into an A.M.E. Zion Mission, the first of the denomination in Pittsburgh. Their numbers outgrew the Parker home in a few months, necessitating larger quarters which were found in the home of Obadiah and Charlotte Mahoney, two members living on Arthur Street.

Three years later under the leadership of a Rev. Mr. Tabbs, a lot was acquired in Peru Way upon which a one-story building was erected; it became popularly known as "Little Jim." It was dedicated and occupied in the year 1850. In 1865, during the tenure of Nick Williams, a great revival was held in which 100 souls "desired to flee from the wrath to come and be saved from their sins" united with Zion Methodism and the "Little Jim." From this epoch-making event, the Peru Way structure became increasingly inadequate.

In the year 1881, under the pastorate of Jehu Holliday, the membership acquired a site on Arthur Street and proceeded to build a new building which was completed and dedicated in October 1886. From that time the John Wesley Church became one of the metropolitan charges in Zion Methodism.

During the long history of the congregation, twenty-five ministers have served the church, each rendering some worthwhile contribution to the life and history of Zion Methodism in Pittsburgh.

Mount Lebanon Church is a commanding church of the Pittsburgh area, having a fine edifice, a million dollar education facility, and has known great growth since its beginning in 1912. At that date a modest chapel was erected named Sanner Chapel to honor the memory of N. H. Sanner, an early pastor. This chapel, still in use today, served until the present sanctuary was completed and dedicated by Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL on Nov. 23, 1924. In 1955 the sanctuary was remodeled. The Mount Lebanon Church reflects the phenomenal growth of the South Hills District of Pittsburgh, where more and more people have built residences away from the smoke of the city. Membership grew steadily and in 1970 numbered 2,887 in spite of the fact that many of the members living south of Mount Lebanon have transferred to, and helped develop, Christ Church. Mount Lebanon Church also substantially assisted Christ Church financially for a number of years.

The church gained considerable national attention in 1942 when a "Golden Chain Campaign" was proposed to liquidate a $50,000 mortgage. The campaign was so successful that nearly $80,000 was pledged, and the excess amount was returned to the subscribers. One of the leaders of this campaign was LEON E. HICKMAN, a member of the church, and prominent in general church activities.

Two former pastors of the church were elected to the episcopacy: LLOYD C. WICKE, 1942-48, and W. RALPH WARD, JR., 1948-60.

The church ranks among leading churches of Methodism in its mission giving.

SMITHFIELD STREET CHURCH,
PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA

Smithfield Street Church. This is the old historic church of Pittsburgh Methodism. The original Society was established under the leadership of local preacher and merchant, John Wrenshall, in October 1796, and met from 1796 to 1803 in the historic "Blockhouse" of old Fort Pitt. Its first building was erected at Front and Smithfield Streets in 1810, and it became the first station appointment west of the Allegheny mountains in 1811. The present property at Smithfield Street and Seventh Avenue was purchased for $5,000 in 1817, and the first church building was erected on it in 1818. From 1812 to 1819 the membership grew from 167 to 357. A great revival in 1819 and 1820 increased the membership to 697 in 1821. One evening during the revival some young men put a paper of brimstone on the hot stove. The suffocating fumes, the character of the preaching, and the yellow painting of the building fastened the name "Brimstone Corner" upon the church.

The first GENERAL CONFERENCE west of the Allegheny mountains was held in this Church in 1828. It was the historic General Conference at which the appeal of "the Reformers" was rejected, and this resulted in the formation of the M.P. CHURCH. Consequently during 1829-33 Pittsburgh Methodism became greatly divided. The controversy split the Smithfield Street congregation and resulted in the formation of the First M.P. Church in 1831, and legal litigation over the Smithfield Street property ensued, the church site being retained by the M.E. congregation under an agreement reached in 1833.

Despite this disruption the church maintained its membership of about 750 until another controversy in the 1840's reduced the membership from 750 in 1843 to 360 in 1847. Seventy of the leading members withdrew at one time and joined new Methodist congregations being established in the growing city. Despite this decline, in 1848 it was determined to replace the inadequate old church. The present building was erected between May and December 1848, the chief initiative being by William Bingham, with Alexander Bradley providing financial guidance. It was dedicated on Christmas Day, 1848 by Bishop L. L. HAMLINE.

In the post Civil War period this historic church was one of the strong pulpits of Methodism and four of its pastors were elected to the episcopacy, namely: CHARLES W. SMITH, pastor 1876-1878, elected bishop 1908; CHARLES B. MITCHELL, pastor 1886-1888, elected bishop 1916; CHARLES E. LOCKE, pastor 1888-1892, elected bishop 1920; and NAFTALI LUCCOCK, pastor 1893-1897, elected bishop 1912.

During the depression of the 1930's the property then in debt was saved for Methodism by the Conference Church Union assuming financial responsibility for it. In 1942, under the leadership of the Church Union, a Pittsburgh Conference campaign produced the funds to pay off the indebtedness and renovate both the church and the adjoining building. The four story building was renamed Benedum Hall, for layman MICHAEL L. BENEDUM, a generous supporter of the project, and was made into the Pittsburgh Methodist Bookstore, and episcopal and other offices. This valuable corner is at present the last remaining piece of Methodist property in the "golden triangle" of downtown Pittsburgh. The Church continues as a functioning congregation, and the Center is a hive of activity.

PITTSBURGH CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, THE. This weekly M.E. publication commenced on Feb. 1, 1834 and continued until June, 1932, when it was merged with The Christian Advocate published in New York. Its original name was The Pittsburgh Conference Journal and it was launched as a project of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE. In 1840 the GENERAL CONFERENCE gave its approval to the publication and its name was changed to The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. Throughout its ninety-eight years of publication it continued to serve as the regional Methodist publication of the daughter Conferences of the original Pittsburgh Conference, namely: Pittsburgh, ERIE, NORTH EAST OHIO, and WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCES. It was one of the leading publications of the M.E. Church with a circulation during the first quarter of the twentieth century of over 40,000. Its editors were among the most influential men of the denomination. They were: CHARLES ELLIOTT, WILLIAM H. HUNTER, Charles Cooke, HOMER J. CLARK, Isaac N. Baird, SAMUEL H. NESBITT, ALFRED WHEELER, CHARLES W. SMITH, John J. Wallace, and RALPH B. URMY. The bound files of this publication have been preserved and are the property of the Historical Society of the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. They are housed in the Conference Historical Collection in the Library of the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania in Pittsburgh. They have been microfilmed by the Board of Microtext of the American Theological Library Association and are available, in whole or in part, from them. They form a major source of the official history of the Pittsburgh Conference, Methodism on the Headwaters of the Ohio, by Smeltzer, where numerous significant items are preserved in quotations.

PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE (ME) was created by the 1824 GENERAL CONFERENCE. It was composed of the original REDSTONE CIRCUIT and what might be called its daughter circuits. Its territory included western PENNSYLVANIA, eastern OHIO to the Muskingum and Tuscarawas Rivers, northwestern VIRGINIA (later WEST VIRGINIA), and the western tip of NEW YORK. The conference was carved mostly from the BALTIMORE and OHIO CONFERENCES, with small sections coming from the GENESEE and KENTUCKY CONFERENCES. At the beginning the Pittsburgh Conference had seventy-one preachers, forty-three appointments, and 20,355 members.

After the Fort Stanwix treaty with the Iroquois Indians in 1768, it became legally proper for white people to settle in southwestern Pennsylvania, and it is estimated that within seven years over 50,000 came into that area and northwestern Virginia. Among the newcomers were many Methodists from the STRAWBRIDGE region in MARYLAND, and there was some unofficial religious activity in their midst during the 1770's. Organized Methodism came into the region in the fall of 1783 when RICHARD OWINGS, Strawbridge's first local preacher, laid out the original Redstone Circuit, largely in the homes of relatives who had emigrated to the west. Bishop ASBURY appointed two itinerant preachers to the Redstone Circuit in the spring of 1784. By the end of the third year the Redstone Circuit had extended 300 miles and reported 756 members. In 1787 it was divided into three circuits, Redstone, Ohio (east of the Ohio River), and Clarksburg. By 1799 five circuits covered southwestern Pennsylvania and northwestern Virginia. They had a total of 1,649 members and about ninety-six societies, some eighty-seven of them centering in homes and the others meeting in small log cabin churches. Eight circuit riders ministered to the ninety-six societies.

After the defeat of the Indian Confederacy in 1795, northwestern Pennsylvania was opened to settlement. Many Methodists migrated to the region, and they became the nuclei for new Methodist societies. By 1804 the Redstone Circuit had expanded to include eight new circuits in northwestern Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio, and northwestern Virginia.

Such is the story of the rise of Methodism in the region which became the Pittsburgh Conference. After its organization the conference grew rapidly, and in 1836 it was divided, the northern portion becoming the ERIE CONFERENCE with four districts, fifty appointments, and 16,876 members, and the southern part continuing as the Pittsburgh Conference with five districts, fifty-eight appointments, and 25,615 members. In 1848 the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE was organized, taking two districts from the Ohio Conference. In 1876 the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE was created by detaching the Ohio portions of both the Pittsburgh and Erie Conferences.

The original Pittsburgh Conference established Madison College at Uniontown in 1826. It continued until 1833 when it was merged with ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at Meadville, which came under the patronage of the conference at that time. Allegheny is still a Methodist institution of higher learning. In 1834 the conference launched a weekly publication, The Pittsburgh Conference Journal, which as the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate became an official organ of the denomination in 1840. It was merged with the New York Christian Advocate in 1932.

At unification in 1939 the Pittsburgh Conferences of the M. E. and M. P. denominations united within the boundaries of the Pittsburgh Conference (ME) to form the Pittsburgh Conference (TMC), the one unit bringing 395 churches and 120,622 members to the merger and the other sixty-three churches and 13,578 members.

In 1960 the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE readjusted a number of conference boundaries to make them conform more nearly to state lines, a preliminary step to the merger in 1962 of the major portions of the Pittsburgh and Erie Conferences into the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. The Jamestown District of the Erie Conference became part of the Genesee Conference, some of the Genesee appointments came into the Western Pennsylvania Conference, and the churches in the northern panhandle of West Virginia were given to the West Virginia Conference.

In 1916 the Pittsburgh, Erie, and West Virginia Conferences were designated as an episcopal area with the bishop residing in Pittsburgh. This arrangement continued until 1960 when the West Virginia Conference became an area, the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE taking its place in the Pittsburgh Area. Four years later the Central Pennsylvania Conference became an area with its bishop residing at Harrisburg, leaving Western Pennsylvania as the only conference in the Pittsburgh Area.

The Pittsburgh Conference existed 138 years as one of the strong conferences of American Methodism. In 1962, its last year, it reported five districts—Allegheny, Blairsville, McKeesport, Pittsburgh, and Washington—about 308 ministers, 345 pastoral charges, 163,861 members, and property valued at $76,317,442.

PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE (MP) was organized at the fifth session of the OHIO CONFERENCE (MP) in CINCINNATI in 1833. At the time the Ohio Conference included western PENNSYLVANIA as well as INDIANA and KENTUCKY. When formed the Pittsburgh Conference included the east half of OHIO, western Pennsylvania, and western VIRGINIA (later WEST VIRGINIA). The first session of the conference was held at Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, Sept. 9-16, 1834. At that time the conference had thirty-eight preachers, twenty-eight appointments, and 7,050 members. ASA SHINN served as first president of the conference.

Among other actions at its first session the Pittsburgh Conference voted to support the Methodist Correspondent which was launched by the Ohio Conference in 1830. The paper became the Methodist Recorder in 1866; it was published in Pittsburgh from 1871 to 1929 when it was moved to Baltimore and merged with the Methodist Protestant to become the Methodist Protestant-Recorder.

In 1842 the Ohio territory of the Pittsburgh Conference was set off as the Muskingum Conference, and in 1854 the Virginia part became the Western Virginia Conference. Due in part to this loss of territory, the Pittsburgh Conference grew slowly, as compared with its original numerical strength. In 1900 the conference had only 8,635 members, but even so it was the dominant conference in a region where the M. P. Church was relatively strong. Pittsburgh was next to Baltimore as a M. P. center; it was an important publication headquarters for the denomination.

The Pittsburgh Conference was a part of the Methodist Church (the name taken by one section of the divided M. P. Church), from 1866 to 1877. (See Table of Methodist Conferences.)

The Pittsburgh Conference strongly supported Allegheny Seminary until it closed in 1867. Then it gave generous support to ADRIAN COLLEGE in MICHIGAN which had become a M. P. institution in 1852. The conference assisted WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY from its founding in 1882, and it gave support to a home for the aged at West Lafayette, Ohio. A fairly strong Preachers' Aid Society was organized in the conference in 1852 on receipt of a gift of $25,000. Careful management and additional donations brought the fund up to $125,000, and the income from it made possible annual payments of $400 to the superannuates and $250 to the widows of ministers in the 1920's and 1930's.

Over the years several Pittsburgh Conference men were elected president of the M. P. GENERAL CONFERENCE, and some became president of Adrian College. JOHN CALVIN BROOMFIELD, president of the General Conference, 1928-36, was one of the two M. P. ministers elected to the episcopacy of The Methodist Church at the Uniting Conference in 1939.

In 1936 the Pittsburgh Conference voted seventy-two to seven in favor of Methodist union. In 1939 the conference brought sixty-three churches and 13,578 members into the Pittsburgh Conference of The Methodist Church.

PLAN OF PACIFICATION (1795), together with the rules and regulations passed by the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1797, was the attempt of the Wesleyan itinerants after the death of John Wesley in 1791 to work out a constitution for the connection which would satisfy those who wanted the Wesleyan societies to become more like a religious denomination of a democratic kind (and that quickly), and those who were content with the position as John Wesley had left it. The Plan of Pacification, which was accepted by the itinerant conference in 1795, was a compromise on the subject of the Sacraments: one group, consisting especially of some of the more influential trustees, were not anxious to see the itinerants administer the Sacraments for the time being; a majority of the laity, and many of the itinerants themselves, thought that the itinerants should now be allowed to administer the Sacraments in virtue of their pastoral position. The plan provided that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper shall not be administered in any chapel, except the majority of the Trustees of the chapel on the one hand, and the majority of the Stewards and Leaders belonging to the chapel (as the best qualified to give the sense of the people) on the other hand, allow it. Nevertheless, in all cases the consent of the Conference shall be obtained before the Lord's Supper be administered.

Where there was a society but no chapel, it was sufficient for a majority of the stewards and leaders to say that the Lord's Supper should be administered. This decision meant that within a few years all the itinerants were administering the Sacraments without any local opposition, and this is often taken as marking the moment of separation between the Church of England and the Wesleyan Methodist societies.

The conference action was not based on a theory that the itinerants had received a presbyterian ordination in succession from John Wesley; the Conference of 1791 had forbidden any further ordinations by the imposition of hands and so prevented the emergence of a significant succession of this kind. The itinerants almost certainly regarded their reception into Full Connexion as a kind of ordination, "virtual ordination" as it is sometimes called. The chief architects of the plan were JOHN PAWSON, JOSEPH BENSON, and WILLIAM THOMPSON. It is not always realized that the plan also offered a solution to the problem of the place of the laity in the constitution. The section "Concerning Discipline" gave to a simple majority of trustees, or of the stewards and leaders, of any society authority to summon the pastors of the local district, together with all the trustees, stewards, and leaders of the circuit in which the society lay, in order to try any circuit pastor whom they considered "immoral, erroneous in doctrines, deficient in abilities," or an offender against the other rules contained in the plan itself. There was a lay majority in such a meeting, and it was empowered to act by a majority vote; a pastor found guilty had to withdraw from the circuit in question, though a district meeting, consisting of itinerants only, finally decided his fate. It is not surprising that in the "Addenda" to the Minutes of 1795 the itinerants said that "we have, to some degree, deposited our characters and usefulness in your hands, or the hands of your representatives, by making them judges of our morals, doctrines and gifts." This extraordinary regulation, however, was never appealed to, except perhaps when SAMUEL WARREN claimed, wrongly, that he ought to have been tried by this court in 1835, instead of by a district meeting.

As a first stage in the development of Wesleyan Methodism after John Wesley's death, the Plan of Pacification was important, but it was not as decisive as is sometimes suggested. The Constitution of 1797 had to add further clarification to the Wesleyan constitution, and the two sets of regulations were not in themselves sufficient to prevent the establishment of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1797. It was the position of the laymen in the Wesleyan Methodist connection which was the fundamental issue, not the question of the administration of the Sacraments. Further schisms took place between 1797 and 1849, and the matter was not finally settled until the admission of lay representatives to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1878.

PLAN OF SEPARATION, THE. A plan adopted by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1844 after long and fruitless debate and heated division over continuing in the episcopacy a Southern bishop, JAMES A. ANDREW, who was a slave-owner, albeit an unwilling one. This Plan allowed the thirteen Annual Conferences in the slave-holding states to withdraw from the M. E. Church

"should the Annual Conferences in the slave-holding states find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection" (History of American Methodism. Vol. II, p. 63). The whole report—later called the Plan of Separation—was a lengthy one containing twelve separate resolutions. Each of these was voted on separately with roll call votes on four of the separate resolutions, but the whole being finally adopted by the Conference with only eight members dissenting. In effect it allowed the Southern Conference representatives to ascertain the feelings of their people, and allowed "the Societies, stations and Conferences adhering to the Church in the south, by a vote of the majority of the members of the said societies . . . to remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the Southern Church" (Ibid.). It agreed that there would be no attempt on the part of the M. E. Church to organize churches or societies within the limits of the Church, South, and the Church, South should reciprocally observe the same rule. It also agreed that the equity in the BOOK CONCERN should be divided in "the same proportions to the whole property of said Concern that the traveling preachers in the Southern Church shall be to all the traveling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church."

The text of this plan is given in full in Methodist histories. Pursuant to this Plan of Separation, the Southern Conferences and local churches did form their own ecclesiasticism—the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH. This Church organized formally in 1846 and existed as one of the two great branches of Episcopal Methodism until it, with the M. E. and M. P. Churches, reunited in 1939 to be The Methodist Church.

The Plan of Separation was repudiated by the next General Conference of the M. E. Church (1848) forcing the Southern Church, which had by that time organized, to go into court to secure its equity in the Book Concern and other general Church interests. The Supreme Court of the United States finally acted upon this matter, finding for the Church, South, and holding that the General Conference of the Church was competent to adopt the Plan of Separation and ordering the Book Agents and those in authority in the M. E. Church to pay over to the Southern Church the above mentioned equity. (Federal Reports, 16 Howard, 288; Smith vs. Swormstedt, 1853.)

PLAUEIN, Germany. About 1869 a Methodist family named Schneider re-emigrated from the United States to Plauen (Saxony) and gathered a group of people seeking salvation. Most of the first Plauen Methodists were women. The first official Methodist service was held on Whitsunday, 1870. For several years Plauen was served from other circuits; only after 1886, when two villages had been separated, was Plauen able to develop, and a big church was built in 1892. Three years later the Plauen-Reichenbach-Netzschkau Circuit was divided into three. Only 117 members were left in Plauen, but a steady increase led to about 800 adult members up to the time of the Second World War. Then the community suffered grievous losses from air-raid destructions and subsequent emigrations of members. The church property was destroyed, but after the war the congregation gathered in a wooden, shed-like building, increasing again to about six hundred members. In 1954 the conspicuous Erloserkirche (Church of our Redeemer) with a seating capacity of 1,000, with numerous additional rooms was dedicated. The Plauen Circuit, today in the CENTRAL CONFERENCE of the German Democratic Republic and near the demarcation line between East and West and on the border of the CZECHOSLOVAK Republic, seems predestined to represent the world-wide Methodist task of reconciliation.

ERLOSERKIRCHE, PLAUE, GERMANY

PLAYER, WILLA BEATRICE (1909-), American college president, was born at Jackson, Miss., on Aug. 9, 1909, the daughter of Clarence C. and Beatrice (Day) Player. She received the A.B. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1929, and the LL.D. from that institution in 1953. She became Doctor of Education at Columbia Teachers College; and has received the LL.D. from LYCOMING COLLEGE, 1962; from Morehouse College, 1963; and from ALBION COLLEGE, 1963. Miss Player went upon the faculty of BENNETT COLLEGE, N. C., in 1930, and after being an instructor and vice-president there, 1930-55, she was elected president of the college in 1955. She is a member of the Women's Planning Commission for the Japan International Christian University Foundation, Inc.; and the Ford Foundation; and is a member of the National Association of Schools and Colleges of the United Methodist Church (president, 1962-63); the North Carolina Council of Churches (secretary); the Southern Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges (Visiting Committee, 1953-54); American Association of University Women; the National Council of Negro Women, and of the United Church Women (upon its Board of Managers).

She is a member of the American Association of Colleges and has served on its Committee on Liberal Learning.

PLAYTER, GEORGE FREDERICK (1809-1866), Canadian minister and historian, was born in London, England. When he was twenty-four he emigrated to CANADA, and in 1834 he was taken on trial in the CANADA CONFERENCE. He was ordained in 1838.

For some years, Playter served on circuits in Upper Canada. At the same time his interest in writing was developing. After the union with the Wesleyans broke down in 1840, he issued two powerful letters entitled "A Voice from Canada" and "A Second Voice from Canada," in which he defended the Canadian Methodists. Thus from 1844 to 1846 he became editor of The Christian Guardian, but in this capacity his earlier promise was not fulfilled.

After he left The Guardian, Playter dropped out of the ministry temporarily to write and to operate a printing establishment. He took up circuit duties again in 1849, but became superannuated in 1858. In retirement he completed two volumes of his History of Methodism in Canada, of which only the first, covering the years before 1828, was published.

Playter's history was an admirable piece of work—well-informed, judicious, and comprehensive. The loss of the second volume, which would have continued the story to 1847, was a great misfortune for future historians of Methodism.

As a writer and as a preacher, Playter was honest, straightforward, and blunt. "His sermons were remarkable for their clearness. He uttered nothing at random, nor anything not worth the uttering. His professions were not loud, but he was a sincere, humble lover of the Saviour." (Minutes of the Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, 1867, 16). He died on Oct. 24, 1866.

PLUMMER, F. BERRY (1885-1957), American E.U.B. minister, was born to Charles W. and Sarah Eakle Plummer, Jan. 7, 1885, at Bridgeport, Washington County, Md. He joined the Pennsylvania Conference, Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1903 and was ordained by the same conference in 1908. He graduated from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE in 1905 with the B.A. degree and later received from his alma mater the D.D. degree. Plummer was married to Emma E. Flook of Myersville, Md., Nov. 11, 1907, who preceded him in death (Feb. 10, 1949).

He was one of the strongest figures in his annual conference, representing it in eleven GENERAL CONFERENCES. For thirty-five years Plummer served Hagerstown, Md., St. Paul's Church, one of the most important churches in the Conference. He served forty-one years as a trustee of Lebanon Valley College, receiving in 1955 the first citation that the college had issued to one of its trustees. For fifteen years he was a member of the executive committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America. He served his denomination as a member of the General Board of CHRISTIAN EDUCATION, the Board of Pensions, and the General Council of ADMINISTRATION, including its Executive Committee.

After an illness of eight weeks, Plummer died May 25, 1957 in Hagerstown, Md., and his remains were placed in the Mt. Zion Cemetery, Myersville, Md.

PLYLER, MARION TIMOTHY (1867-1954), and ALVA WASHINGTON (1867-1956), American brothers, pastors, and editors. Marion T. Plyler was born on Sept. 14, 1867, in Iredell County, N. C., the son of Robert Conrad and Mary L. (Kimball) Plyler. His wife was Epie Duncan Smith, whom he married on June 20, 1900, and they became the parents of seven children.

He was educated at Trinity College (now DUKE), A.B. in 1892; A.M., 1897; and D.D., 1937; and at the University of Chicago where he did postgraduate work in 1898. He also received the M.A. degree from the University of North Carolina in 1905 and its D.D. in 1931.

Joining the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, he served Wilmington, Murfreesboro, Plymouth, Louisburg, Chapel Hill, Greenville, and Washington, 1892-1910. He was the presiding elder of the Elizabeth City District, 1911-14; of the Raleigh District, 1915; pastor, Grace Church, Wilmington, 1916-19; again the presiding elder of the Durham District, 1920-23; the Raleigh District, 1924-27. He became editor of the North Carolina Christian Advocate in 1928, and served in that capacity continually until his retirement in 1945.

Alva Washington Plyler, the twin brother of M. T. Plyler, began his ministry in 1892. Among other appointments, he served three times as presiding elder, the districts being ASHEVILLE, SALISBURY, and GREENSBORO in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. He became editor-manager of the North Carolina Christian Advocate in 1921 (seven years before his brother M. T. joined him). The Plyler Brothers, as they were always called, were always thought of together in connection with the editing and publication of the North Carolina Christian Advocate. Alva W. Plyler was the author of one book, The Iron Duke of the Methodist Itinerancy (John Tillett), which was published in 1925.

M. T. Plyler was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES) of 1914, '18, '22, '26, '30, '34, and '38, and also of the General Conferences of The Methodist Church of 1940 and '44, as well as the UNITING CONFERENCE of 1939. He attended the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE of 1921 and 1931; served on the General Board of MISSIONS in his Church, 1918-25; was president of the Board of the Pastors' School at Duke University from 1918 for thirty-two years. He was president of the WESLEY FOUNDATION at the University of North Carolina also. He wrote Leroy Lee Smith, Lawyer of the Old School, 1916; Men of the Burning Heart, 1918 (in collaboration); Bethel Among the Oaks, 1925; Thomas Neal Ivey—Golden Hearted Gentleman, 1925; Letters of Travel in America and Europe.

He had considerable influence in his Conference as editor and church leader and was held in great respect by his brethren. He retired in 1945 and died in DURHAM, N. C., on March 24, 1954.

A. W. Plyler was a trustee of the Methodist Assembly (LAKE JUNALUSKA) at one time, and also a trustee of BREVARD COLLEGE. He married Grace Davis Barnhardt on July 20, 1901. (She is still living and resides in The Methodist Home, CHARLOTTE, N. C.). They had three daughters of whom only one survived infancy.

He was a member of the Southern Methodist Press Association and at one time was its president; also a member of the editorial council of the Religious Press of America. He received the honorary D.D. degree from both ASBURY COLLEGE and Duke University. He was a delegate to six General Conferences, including the Uniting Conference at Kansas City in 1939.

PLYMOUTH, England. The first Methodist class to be formed in this famous Devon port was started in 1745, and twelve months later JOHN WESLEY paid the first of a score of visits to the city; the last of these was in 1789. His association with the city was not always a happy one, and on one of his last visits a better-than-usual reception occasioned the comment in his Journal, March 2, 1787: "What, is God about to work in Plymouth also." This uncertain beginning has been belied by later growth. Plymouth Methodism remained a part of the Devonshire Circuit until 1783 when the Plymouth Dock Circuit was formed. The first chapel was opened in Lower Street in 1780. Ker Street, the most famous of the early chapels, opened in 1787, was demolished in 1960's. By the time of John Wesley's death there were fifteen hundred members in the circuit. In 1819 a second circuit was carved out of the Dock Circuit and called Plymouth. In 1823 the Dock Circuit was renamed Devonport.

By 1871 Plymouth had to be redivided into the King Street and Ebenezer Circuits. The King Street Chapel, built in 1864, was claimed to be the finest outside London. It housed the Wesleyan Methodist conferences of 1895, 1913, and 1929, and remained in use until its destruction by German bombing in 1941. Ebenezer was built in 1816 and survived to provide a skeleton for the Plymouth Central Hall which was created after Wesley Church (1879) was destroyed in 1937 by fire. This reconditioned building would also have perished in the wartime blitz, but was saved largely due to the efforts of a team of students from RICHMOND COLLEGE who were holding a crusade at the hall at the time of the air attack. Their work in extinguishing dozens of incendiary bombs saved the building, which was the only large hall left standing in the city. And so it became, until 1959, the scene of the city's annual mayor-choosing ceremony, and of other important civic functions.

The Devonport Circuit was divided in 1893 to form the Gloucester Street and Belmont Circuits. These existed separately until 1926, when a single Devonport Circuit was again formed. The Belmont Chapel (1875) is still in use. The nineteenth century also saw the growth in the city of the other branches of the Methodist family. Primitive Methodism seems to have owed its origins to a local resident, William Driffield. By the middle of the century it had rooms in Plymouth and Devonport and village causes at Holborton and Dunstone to the east. From this work grew the societies at Millbridge, Herbert Street, Morice Town, and Cobourg Street. Of these city chapels only Millbridge survived the Second World War.

THE UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES had a society in Ebrington Street. The BIBLE CHRISTIAN movement was established in Plymouth Dock in 1818 by WILLIAM

O'BRYAN himself. It was at Stoke Damerell that a Bible Christian press was set up in 1822 to print a hymnbook. And it was in Stoke Damerell Church that O'Bryan's daughter Mary married William Thorne, the printer. The press moved to Shebbear in 1829, but the work in Plymouth grew. By mid-century there were half a dozen societies of which Greenbank and Embankment Road were the largest. It was to Elburton that Mary Thorne retired as a widow, and there spent the last ten years of her life.

The union of 1907 created three United Methodist circuits centered on Greenbank, Ebrington Street, and Morice Town. These three, together with the Primitive Methodist Circuit of Cobourg Street, and the four Wesleyan circuits—King Street, Ebenezer, Devonport, and Garrison were amalgamated after Methodist Union in 1932 to form King Street, East, Devonport, and Garrison Circuits. In the years before the Second World War the growth and movement of population in the city led to extension work in many of the suburbs. A new central hall was opened in the Garrison Circuit. At the outbreak of war the membership of the four circuits was over 5,000. The Second World War brought great naval and military activity in Plymouth, and between 1939 and 1945 Plymouth Methodism gave hospitality to thousands of servicemen from all over the world. The sailors' "Welcome" at Devonport, begun in 1908, and the Plymouth Central Hall were the focal points of this work. But in one week in April, 1941, the city center was destroyed by air attack, and a third of the population was made homeless. Eleven Methodist churches were destroyed and many others damaged. In Devonport on the Sunday morning after the blitz not one church was fit for worship. To deal with this emergency a single Plymouth Circuit was set up. This continued until 1945 when the Plymouth East Circuit separated itself. At the same time the Plymouth Central Hall joined the Garrison Circuit to form the Plymouth Mission Circuit. In 1952 the King Street and Devonport Circuits resumed their own existence.

Methodism in Plymouth has produced many famous men. HENRY CARTER, so long a creative figure at the Temperance Department, was born in the city. Three vice-presidents of the Methodist Conference came from Plymouth, including ISAAC FOOT. It was the generosity of John Beckly, a Plymouthian, which gave the Conference the annual lecture in social studies and Christianity which bears his name. Perhaps the city's greatest claim to fame in Methodism, however, will be that it was here in 1965 that the Methodist Conference took the historic decision to pursue the path of union with that Church of England from which John Wesley sprang.

DONALD MASON

POE, ADAM (1804-1868), American preacher and book agent, was born in Columbiana County, Ohio, July 21, 1804. His formal education was limited, but by dint of reading and study he became a well informed man. Baldwin University awarded him the D.D. degree in 1862. In 1825, he married Eliza Hosford, and they had a son and two daughters.

Brought up a Presbyterian, Poe embraced Methodism as a youth, and in 1827 joined the OHIO CONFERENCE. Following seven years on circuits, he received varied appointments. He served a total of nine years on four districts—Wooster, 1834-37; Tiffin, 1838; Norwalk, 1842 and 1847; and Elyria, 1848-49. There were five appointments to two stations for a total of eight years—Mansfield, 1839, 1845-46, and 1850-51; and Delaware, 1840-41, and 1843. In 1844 he was appointed for one year as agent for Ohio Wesleyan University and Norwalk Seminary. In 1852, he became assistant agent at the Western Book Concern in CINCINNATI, and served as agent from 1860 to 1868.

Poe was pastor at DELAWARE when Ohio Wesleyan University began in 1842. A trustee from that time forward, he rendered notable service. At his funeral, Bishop DAVIS W. CLARK remarked that it could almost be said that Adam Poe was the founder of Ohio Wesleyan.

While Poe was preaching in a powerful revival at the Methodist Church, Danville, Ohio, in January 1835, WILLIAM NAST, who was to become the father of German Methodism in America, knelt at the altar with other penitents and was, according to his own testimony, "born again." It was Nast's Aldersgate experience. That September Poe introduced Nast to the Ohio Conference which admitted him on trial and appointed him as "German Missionary" in Cincinnati.

The FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church was organized Aug. 7-8, 1866, when eleven men, including Poe, met in Trinity Church, Cincinnati; he was elected as the first treasurer of the society.

A man of recognized ability and devotion, genial in nature, and equipped with a stock of reminiscences and anecdotes which he used effectively in conversation and preaching, Poe enjoyed the confidence of his brethren, as attested by the fact that they elected him to six GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1844-64. He died June 26, 1868.

POL, GASTON (1924-), Bolivian educator, was born in Cochabamba. He studied at the university there, receiving a law degree in 1964. He took graduate courses at VANDERBILT, Peabody, and SCARRITT, all in NASHVILLE, Tenn. He married Julia Salazar, a teacher and director of the elementary sections of the American Institute. They have two adopted children. He was a professor in the school of law at the university. His positions in the Methodist Church included lay preacher, treasurer of the annual conference, executive secretary of finances, coordinator of educational work in BOLIVIA, and director of COLEGIO EVANGELICO METODISTA in La Paz (formerly American Institute).

In 1969 Dr. Pol was named as one of an eight-member Supreme Council on Education for Bolivia, which was created to guide sweeping educational reforms in Bolivia. He was one of five private citizens on this council, the other three being cabinet members. A United States missionary wrote: "the new and much-needed Comision Suprema de Educacion is charged with restructuring and unifying Bolivian education; this affords Dr. Pol a unique opportunity for service to his country."

NATALIE BARBER

POLAND, a country of eastern Europe, is bounded on the north by the Baltic Sea and the U.S.S.R., on the east by the U.S.S.R., to the south by Czechoslovakia, and to the west by GERMANY.

Polish history begins with 966 A.D., when Mieczyslaw I, duke of Mazowie, accepted Christianity for himself and his people. His son, Boleslaw the Brave, transformed his father's principality into a powerful and independent kingdom. With her everchanging frontiers and a prestige and political power that waxed and waned repeatedly, Poland played for the next seven centuries a vital role in European history. During the sixteenth century her rulers became elective. This democratic innovation weakened her to such an extent that her powerful neighbors, Russia, Austria and Prussia, could partition her territory in three successive moves (1772, 1793, and 1795). Restored as a republic in 1918, Poland enjoyed a brief independence until she was divided anew by Germany and the U.S.S.R. in 1939. After the Second World War, she emerged as a republic again with sweeping changes in ideology, territory, and population.

Poland is recognized as traditionally a Roman Catholic country. Before the Second World War, sixty-nine percent of the population were Poles; of these seventy-five percent were Roman and Uniat Catholics. Today, ninety-eight percent is estimated as Polish, and of that ninety-four percent is Roman Catholic.

During the early days of the Reformation, Protestantism flourished in Poland, because of a prevailing religious tolerance, with Lutherans and Calvinists predominating. At one time a majority of the Polish nobles accepted the tenets of the Reformers. Due to a lack of unity and the extremism of some Protestant leaders, the educational activities of the Jesuits, and external political situations, the influence of the Reformation slowly waned until it became negligible. Today, Protestants represent between one and two percent of the population, with a predominance of the following denominations: Lutheran, Reformed, Methodist, Baptist and Evangelical.

Methodism. The Methodist Church in Poland grew out of the activity of the 1918-19 Centenary Commission of the U.S. M. E. Church, South. After the First World War, deputations were sent to Europe to investigate existing situations, and on June 5, 1919, the BOARD OF MISSIONS (MES) voted "that work be opened in Poland . . . as soon as the conditions will allow." This new activity sought to provide temporary physical relief to those in need, and religious services for those seeking spiritual guidance. The unique Polish Relief Campaign in the United States provided clothing and other supplies valued at $2,000,000. Daisy Davies was its director.

The first sessions of the "Poland and Danzig Mission" were held in Warsaw, Poland, Aug. 24-27, 1922, with Bishop W. B. BEAUCHAMP OF RICHMOND, VA., presiding. It reported: districts, 2; charges, 9; churches, 7; membership, 800; probationers, 150; value of property, $67,000. The district superintendents were George W. Twynham and John Rasmussen, Sr. Other early missionaries and church workers were EDMUND CHAMBERS, Hiram King, Fred C. Woodward and THOMAS J. GAMBLE.

Klarysew School and Home. The first congregations were organized in the key cities of the country. To meet certain pressing postwar problems of the population, some institutions were opened. The best known of these was the school and children's home at Klarysew near Warsaw. This institution had three main goals: to provide a home and education for the most promising of the many orphans adopted by the church, to create a center that would be a base for the church's future development, and to help meet through education one of the fundamental needs of the country. Its first and only director was WLADYSLAW DROPIOWSKI, a well-known Polish educator. In 1933, due to budget restrictions, the mission was forced to close this institution. Reopened in 1965, it now serves as a conference center.

English Language School. Another unusual product of the early years is the English Language School in Warsaw. In 1921, E. B. McKnight and a Mr. Welch started free evening classes for teaching English and the Bible, and these gained immediate popularity. Reportedly from 1,500 to 2,000 persons attended during the first year. Soon these courses developed into an evening English language school for paying students. This gradually improved in teaching personnel, standards of instruction, physical facilities; it imported textbooks from London especially written for Poles. In the last decades it has been known as the best institution teaching English in Poland. Today it has over 5,000 students. Its directors were consecutively Thomas W. Williams, W. Winston Cram, Ruth Lawrence, Leonid Jesakow, and JOSEPH SZCZEPKOWSKI.

Woman's Work. On May 4, 1927, the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church South voted to close the Russian Mission in Harbin, Manchuria, and transferred the personnel and budget of the Woman's Department in that city to Poland for a program among White Russians. Constance Rumbough and Sallie Lewis Browne arrived from Harbin within a few months and established their headquarters in Wilno, Poland. Later their mandate was widened to include work among the women, youth, and children of the entire country.

Growth of the Methodist Church in Poland was slow. Legal restrictions, such as the lack of official recognition of the church by the state, made difficult any rapid expansion. The German-speaking congregations which had constituted an entire district in 1922 decreased rapidly in membership and influence. Even before the Second World War several of them conducted their services in Polish. After the war no German-speaking congregations remained.

In the 1920's, a program undertaken to establish new congregations and to open hostels for high school students among the White Russians in the northeastern provinces met with only limited success. The congregations disappeared when, in 1939, these provinces were annexed by the U.S.S.R. Attempts were made also (in the late 1920's) to open work among the Ukrainians in eastern Galicia. These efforts were fruitless. Church development received a serious setback from the depression in the United States, which between 1931 and 1936 brought drastic budget reductions and the recall of most of the American missionaries. Bishop U. V. W. DARLINGTON of HUNTINGTON, W. Va., as the bishop in charge, sympathetically guided the young church during these difficult years. He was succeeded in 1934 by Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE of ATLANTA, Ga. This tireless evangelist visited most of the Polish congregations and untiringly labored at deepening the spiritual life and increasing the missionary zeal of preachers and members.

The Second World War dealt a grave blow to Methodism in Poland. During this conflict one third of the congregations were lost because of territorial incorporation into the U.S.S.R. Over one half of the preachers were lost to the church, forced to leave the country by various circumstances. Many promising young Methodists perished in prisons and on battlefields. For six years the life of the church was totally disorganized.

Fortunately a vital core remained in Warsaw. Classes in church history and related subjects, usually given at theological seminaries, and covering a three-year course, were taught by university professors and other qualified persons. In this way some twenty men and several women were carefully prepared for future leadership in the church. When the war ended, most of the men students became the pastors of the rebuilt congregations.

Since 1945. With the coming of peace in 1945, Methodism experienced a period of substantial expansion. New congregations were organized in many parts of the country. Church membership grew rapidly. Some reasons for the increase were the official recognition of the Methodist Church in Poland by the Polish government; the uprooting and transfer to the west and north of a large segment of the population; the availability of young clergymen trained during the last few years of the war; the vigorous leadership of Konstanty Najder, the first general superintendent, and the material support from the church abroad under the energetic direction of Bishop PAUL NEFF GARNER of the Geneva Area.

Much of this expansion was due to the situation that arose in former East Prussia, a considerable part of which fell to Poland in 1945. Since the German pastors and many of the members of the United Evangelical Church of this territory had fled to postwar Germany, their churches and parsonages stood empty. The constituencies that remained were leaderless. The Roman Catholic Church in Poland began to take over some of the church buildings. Najder, acting jointly with leaders of the Augsburg Evangelical Church (Lutheran), petitioned the Polish government to assign the still unoccupied churches to these two denominations. The Methodists were permitted to begin services and to organize congregations in over twenty of these parishes.

At the same time, new work was started in other parts of Poland. Numerically this period marked the high tide of Polish Methodism. For several years the annual reports showed over sixty pastors with appointments and membership above sixty thousand.

After the Second World War the Board of Missions sent another group of experienced missionaries to Poland. However, these were permitted to remain only a short time: in the fall of 1949, all foreign religious workers were ordered by the Polish authorities to leave the country. Seven dark years followed. No sessions of the annual conference were held. Dissensions and intrigues among the preachers abounded. Finally the traveling preachers expelled the general superintendent, Joseph Naumiuk, from the conference. Jan Ostrowski was elected his successor. Great losses in members and clergy occurred during these years.

After the radical political changes of 1956, a new day dawned for the church. Relationships between the preachers slowly improved. Communication with the church overseas became normal again. With the election of Joseph Szczepkowski as general superintendent, Methodism bound up its wounds and attacked energetically its organizational problems and missionary responsibilities. During these years Bishop FERDINAND SIGG of ZÜRICH, SWITZERLAND, in charge of the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE, visited the church regularly, ordained to the ministry those qualified, and supervised the appointments.

Today, though small in numbers, Methodism plays a vital role in modern Poland as a Protestant denomination. It has been active in the country's ecumenical organization and has sent delegates to numerous overseas religious and social action meetings. Its representatives have of course participated in the sessions of the Central and Southern Europe Central Conferences, and the General Conferences of the Methodist Church.

POLAND ANNUAL CONFERENCE embodies the Methodist work in Poland. It was a Provisional Annual Conference when in 1960 the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church gave permission to it to become an annual conference, if during the quadrennium a minimum of twenty-five ministerial members should belong. This condition was met and the conference was recognized as the Poland Annual Conference in 1964. It is in the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE and is currently presided over by the bishop of the GENEVA Area.

Statistics of this conference at the 1969 reporting were: Number of districts, 5; charges or appointments, 36; organized churches, 36; preaching stations, 13 (total, 49); ordained ministers, 27; lay preachers serving as pastors, 8; members of the church, 6,519. Institutions of the conference as described above are the English-Language School at Warsaw, an orphanage at Klarysew, and a Bible school and youth center, "Warfieldowe," Klarysew.

POLITICS AND BRITISH METHODISM. In the history of English party politics there has been a peculiar polarity. Underlying the shifting connections traced by the famous historian of the eighteenth century, Lewis Namier, and the altering attitudes to specific policies, there has remained a seemingly natural alliance between Tory and Anglican on the one hand and Liberal and Free Churchman on the other. From the days of Cavalier and Roundhead to those of Disraeli and Gladstone, and even to some extent to the present time, "Church and Queen" has been a Tory toast, while Whig-Liberal agents have relied on the support of the greater part of the Nonconformist vote. Neither party has been able to ignore religious loyalties; and when the Labour Party began to displace the Liberal Party as the major party of political reform and radicalism, it too was seen to owe more to Methodism than to Marxism.

Within this pattern the part played by Methodism as an influence in English politics has been as equivocal as its own ecclesiastical development. JOHN WESLEY's authoritarian rule was as much a reflection of his Tory-Anglican traditions as of his undisputed supremacy over every part of the church he brought forth from its Anglican cradle, but at first he was anxious to keep Methodism out of politics as much as he could. Many of those to whom he preached had no votes; he was determined to avoid the dangers of allowing an evangelical movement to run out in the sands of political activity, as he feared some eighteenth-century nonconformity had done; he was anxious to avoid either Jacobite or Jacobin "smears," so he instituted a "no-politics rule" for his helpers.

In the troubled period which followed the death of Wesley this rule served to keep Methodists from unhappy association with some of the potentially revolutionary movements of the early nineteenth century, and the supposed atheism of some of the followers of Tom Paine horrified them. It is too much to claim that Methodism saved England from a revolution such as affected France, for conditions in the two countries were so different, but it is true that many to whom the new doctrines of the rights of men were being preached were finding them more clearly expounded in the Bible than in Rousseau or Paine. A no-politics rule normally works more favorably for conservatism than for radicalism, and two further tendencies in the post-Napoleonic War period worked toward keeping Methodists out of the old Whig-Dissenting alliance. There was a Tory government in office and the newly emergent church was anxious not to attract restrictions; the major public interest of Methodists was in humanitarian movements, and many of the leaders of these were Tories like WILLIAM WILBERFORCE and Shaftesbury.

The 1832 Reform Act did not much excite those whom Disraeli in Coningsby called the respectable Wesleys who should be natural allies of his new-type Conservatives; they reacted in unmistakable aversion from Chartism; they might not like Anglo-Catholicism, but they would not support Liberal-Dissenters in trying to disestablish the Church of England. JABEZ BUNTING, in the mid-century, seemed to be the very incarnation of this new ecclesiastical-political entente between Methodism and Conservatism; even when the disasters of 1849-51 splintered the Wesleyan connection, his view still prevailed with the majority of his ministerial brethren, and with most Wesleyan laymen too.

Bunting's influence remained within Wesleyan Methodism strongly supporting authoritarian church government and conservative political sympathies; but outside the Wesleyan connection, there were other Methodist movements which were less fearful of contamination by liberal ideas. By 1797 ALEXANDER KILHAM's METHODIST NEW CONNEXION was avowing liberal principles in church and state alike. The appeal of WILLIAM CLOWES and HUGH BOURNE in PRIMITIVE METHODISM, and of WILLIAM O'BRYAN and his BIBLE CHRISTIANS was to a class socially lower than those who comprised the strength of the Wesleyan connection. It was small wonder that these connections were less circumspect in their political expression; among their members were to be found many who supported movements for cheap food and better working conditions. The Founding Fathers of English trade unionism were often Methodist local preachers and class leaders, and the terms they used for some of their organizations they learned from the Methodist that first taught them the worth of ordinary men and also the way to organize them. Such men naturally turned to Liberals rather than to Conservatives; and as the franchise was widened, they were wooed first by the Radical-Liberals, and later by the Labour Party.

The parallel development of Wesleyan Tory and Primitive Methodist Radical was accompanied by the emergence of a Liberal Methodist type which was more middle class in composition, and which was particularly significant in the Gladstonian era. It was predominantly lay in character, and, while it was recruited in large numbers by the ecclesiastical conflicts of the nineteenth century, it may have owed its genesis to the consequences of the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835. Democratic institutions in England emerged first in the nineteenth century in local government, and it was here that Methodist laymen first found themselves in alliance with Nonconformist shopkeepers and manufacturers. So often in the old towns there had been an alliance between the squire, the parson, and the professional classes, respectable established citizens with a naturally conservative outlook. The new wealthy classes produced by the Industrial Revolution had to struggle against the privileges of this "establishment." Liberalism, with its substitution of election for inherited privilege and hierarchy, was the natural political creed for such protagonists. By the time of Gladstone and HUGH PRICE HUGHES, such Methodists had become a powerful ally of the Liberal Party when it claimed to speak with the voice of the "Nonconformist conscience."

In the twentieth century the interconnection between religion and politics had been blurred by greater emphasis upon class divisions. The three Methodist political types have all continued within the Methodist Church—reunited in 1932—but, as English Liberalism has declined in influence as a political party, many of the more radical Methodists have veered towards the Labour Party, which in England has been non-Marxist. Many of the more prosperous have joined their old Wesleyan brethren in supporting the Conservatives. It would be hard to estimate the proportion of each party within the Church today.

POLK, CHARLES PEALE (1767-1822), American portrait painter, best remembered for his so-called "lost portrait" of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY. He was a son of Robert Polk and Elizabeth Digby (Peale) Polk. His mother came from the famous Peale family of artists, was a daughter of Charles Peale, Jr., and a sister of Charles Willson Peale. After his father was killed in a naval action in 1777, Charles Peale Polk was trained in art by his uncle, Charles Willson Peale.

"The hard linear painting, well executed and attractive in Charles Willson Peale, was debased by his nephew, Charles Peale Polk," says critic J. Hall Pleasants in the Maryland Historical Magazine, pointing to "stiff handling by Polk of legs, arms, and figure . . ." But Polk painted Washington, Franklin, LaFayette, and other notables of the day. One canvas of Washington hangs outside the State Dining Room at the White House and his work appears in exhibitions depicting the development of the portrait art in America.

The "lost portrait" of Asbury was done in 1794. He reluctantly agreed to sit for the artist only when James McCannon, a merchant tailor, proposed in exchange to give a warm waistcoat to each of his preachers. Asbury's Journal of June 18, of that year notes: "I once more came to BALTIMORE where, after having rested a little, I submitted to have my likeness taken; it seems they want a copy; if they wait longer, perhaps they may miss it. Those who have gone from us in VIRGINIA [i.e., followers of the schismatic JAMES O'KELLY] have drawn a picture of me which is not taken from life."

That portrait done in Baltimore was by Charles Peale Polk. For many years its whereabouts were unknown, but it was recovered by GEORGE C. M. ROBERTS, and is now owned by the Baltimore Conference Historical Society as a prized show-piece of the Lovely Lane Church Museum in Baltimore. That it once was used as a fire-screen was believed by Roberts, who made a study of the portrait's mysterious provenance. A hole was cut through the canvas where the right hand is uplifted, probably to admit a stovepipe. Now restored, this "lost portrait" was prominently exhibited, September-December, 1968, in Room 206 of the new National Portrait Gallery in Washington for the inaugural exhibit titled "This New Man." Now it is permanently on display at the Lovely Lane Museum, 2200 St. Paul Street, Baltimore. It offers an interesting comparison both in subject and technique with the Asbury portrait done in 1812 by JOHN PARADISE.

This 1794 portrait was done by Polk during a period when he was most popular as a painter of portraits and his own confidence in his talents ran high. He had advertised himself at Philadelphia as a house, ship, and sign painter in 1787. But from 1791 to 1793 he announced himself in Baltimore newspapers as a portraitist.

Apparently Polk for a while became a traveling artist, typical of the period, for he was in RICHMOND, Va., 1799-1800. In this he may not have been altogether successful for he became a government clerk in WASHINGTON and apparently lived there until his death in 1822. There is evidence that he married three times: 1) c. 1785, Ruth Elliss; 2) c. 1811, Mrs. Brockenbrough; and 3) c. 1816, Ellen B. Bowman; and was father of fifteen children.

LELAND D. CASE

POLK, JAMES KNOX (1795-1849), the eleventh President of the United States and first President to be associated with the Methodist Church, was born on Nov. 2, 1795 near Pineville, N. C. In 1796 his family moved to TENNESSEE. In 1820, two years after his graduation from the University of North Carolina, he began the practice of law in Columbia, Tenn. In 1821 he became the chief clerk of the Tennessee Senate and two years later a member of the Tennessee House of Representatives. While a member of the state legislature he married Sarah Childress. They had no children.

From 1825 until 1839 Polk was a member of the U.S. Congress and for the last four years served as Speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1839 he was elected governor of Tennessee, but was defeated in his bid for reelection in 1841. In 1844 Polk was nominated by the Democratic Party for the office of President of the United States. In the November 5 election he defeated his opponent, Henry Clay, and on March 4, 1845 was inaugurated. During his administration TEXAS, IOWA, and WISCONSIN became states, the western part of the United States was acquired from MEXICO, and the OREGON dispute with Great Britain was settled.

While President, Polk usually attended the First Presbyterian Church in Washington, D. C. Early in his Presidency he wrote in his diary: "Mrs. Polk being a member of the Presbyterian Church I generally attend that church with her, though my opinions and predilections are in favor of the Methodist Church." When he attended church alone, he often worshiped at Foundry M. E. Church in WASHINGTON.

Polk declined to run for re-election in 1848. On June 9, 1849, shortly before he died, he was baptized and received into membership in the M. E. Church, South, by a long-time friend, JOHN B. MCFERRIN of NASHVILLE, Tenn. Polk died on June 15, 1849 in Nashville and is buried there on the State Capitol Grounds.

POLK, TRUSTEN (1811-1876), American layman, Governor of Missouri, and U.S. Senator, was born in Sussex County, Md., May 29, 1811. He attended Cambridge Academy and graduated from Yale University in 1831, with honors, completing a study there in 1833.

Polk opened a law office in St. Louis, Mo., in 1835 to begin a notable career in the profession and in politics. Two years later he married Elizabeth Skinner, Dec. 26. In 1845 he was elected to the Convention to re-write the Constitution of the State of Missouri. His most important efforts were directed toward the establishment of public schools by constitutional provisions. This laid the foundation upon which the state's public school system has been built. Polk's interest in education was expressed by his becoming a founder and life-long supporter of CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE.

Thwarted in his desire to become a minister of the Gospel, his Christian commitment was expressed in his life and services to the Methodist Church. Trusten Polk held every office and performed every function open to a layman in his local church, Centenary, St. Louis; was actively engaged in district and annual conference affairs; and from 1866 until his death an influential member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH.

Polk ran successfully for the Governorship of Missouri against two politically powerful men, Robert Ewing and former U.S. Senator Thomas Hart Benton. He was inaugurated Governor on Jan. 5, 1857; but a week after that was elected to the U.S. Senate (January 13), and resigned the Governorship on Feb. 27. He served in the U.S. Senate until Jan. 12, 1862, when, the Civil War raging, he became Colonel of a Missouri regiment in the Confederate States Army. He was appointed Judge Advocate General, Department of the Mississippi, but was captured by Union forces in 1864. Upon his release in 1865, he returned to St. Louis and resumed his law practice and church activities. His stature as a layman was recognized by his appointment as one of the two laymen to the CAPE MAY COMMISSION from the M. E. Church, South. His death April 16, 1876 occurred before the Commission met.

SAMUEL POLLARD

POLLARD, SAMUEL (1864-1915), British Methodist pioneer missionary to Southwest CHINA, was born at Camelford, England, April 20, 1864, the son of Samuel Pollard, a BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister. After five years in the civil service he offered for the Bible Christian ministry. Bible Christian missionary work had begun in 1884 when S. T. THORNE and Thomas Vanstone were sent to Yunnan, Southwest China, and Pollard and FRANCIS DYMOND joined Thorne at Chaotung in 1887. He spent four very hard years at Kunming from 1889-93, but was appointed chairman in 1895 and was sustained by more British workers. The main approach was to the Chinese people, but Pollard trekked into the hills, coming to know the aboriginal Miao people. His distinctive work began when four Miao tribesmen visited his house in 1904, after wandering five hundred miles in many directions "in search of truth." By 1905 Pollard had been visited by four thousand Miao and had begun to titerate in their tribal areas.

The first church was built at Stone Gateway in 1905. The Chinese joined with the Miao's overlords, the No-su, in persecuting the new Christians; and in 1907 Pollard was attacked and almost killed, but before his death the Miao mass movement had been swelled by No-su and Go-p'u converts. Chapel building averaged three per year, with hundreds of cottage meetings, and twenty-three schools were opened. Pollard invented the "Pollard script" in committing the Miao language to writing, and translated the New Testament and many hymns. He died of typhus at Stone Gateway after heroic labors on Sept. 15, 1915.

CYRIL J. DAVEY

POLLOCK, CHARLES ANDREW (1853-1928), American jurist and prominent layman of NORTH DAKOTA Method-

ism, was born on Sept. 27, 1853 at Elizabethtown, N. Y., the son of John and Eunice Ellis Pollock. He received the A.B. degree (1878), M.A. (1881) and LL.D. (1908) from Cornell College. On Sept. 27, 1882 he married Martha Clinton. Four children were born to them: John C., Clara A., Lorine M., and Charles M. He migrated to the Dakota Territory in 1885 and became District Attorney of Cass County. He was Judge of the Third District Court of North Dakota from 1885 to 1905. He was elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church from 1908-12. Here he served notably on the Committee on Judiciary which, in the M.E. Church, interpreted the constitutionality and effect of the General Conference enactments for the Discipline.

Judge Pollock was a firm believer in prohibition and became known as a mighty advocate of laws pursuant thereto. He was instrumental in writing the Prohibition Law of the State of North Dakota in 1889. He also wrote a Manual of the Prohibition Law of the State of North Dakota in 1910. He made his home in Fargo, N. D., where he died in July 1928.

DAVID F. KNECHT

POLWHELE, RICHARD (1760-1838), British Anglican, was born at Truro on Jan. 6, 1760, and educated at Truro School and Christ Church College, Oxford. Ordained in 1782, he was appointed in 1794 to Manaccan, near Helston, in Cornwall, a parish where he remained until 1821. He had already shown his interest in poetry, history and topographical studies. His study of Devonshire began to appear in 1793, and his more famous History of Cornwall in seven volumes from 1803 to 1808. He also published Traditions and Recollections (1826) and Biographical Sketches in Cornwall (1831). He comes into Methodist history because he was a vicious critic of the whole evangelical revival; in 1800 he published Anecdotes of Methodism, which contained the kind of material which LORD SIDMOUTH was to use against Methodism at the time of his abortive attempt to introduce anti-Methodist legislation. Polwhele was answered by SAMUEL DREW, who replied with Observations on Polwhele's Anecdotes, also in 1800. This controversy introduced the two men to one another, and they later became quite friendly. Polwhele cannot, however, be regarded as a very serious student of either Methodism or Evangelicalism in general. He died at Truro on March 12, 1838.

JOHN KENT

POMONA, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., Trinity Church is a model of Tudor Gothic Cathedral of the fifteenth century and one of the most attractive churches in Pomona. The church began in May of 1877 when A. M. Hough organized the First M. E. Church of Pomona. The organization meeting was, appropriately, held in a carpenter's shop, owned by J. G. Reed. There were seven charter members of the new church. During that year the first church was built on land donated and the total cost of the building was $500, a goodly sum at that time.

During the early years the church was served by circuit pastors. In 1882 the church had grown to the point where it required a new building. This second church with a seating capacity of 300 cost $2,250. It was dedicated, debt free, on Sept. 30, 1883. In 1888 J. W. Phelps became pastor of the First M. E. Church, and a third building was built and dedicated Jan. 10, 1890. This building is still standing and is occupied by another denomination.

On Oct. 25, 1906 at a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE of First Church a motion was passed "that we recommend the building of a church on the north side of the Southern Pacific track." It was decided that the new church should be named Trinity M. E. Church. At a general meeting held on April 18, 1907, it was "voted" to build an edifice costing $21,000.

The year of 1935 brought about a great change for Methodism in Pomona. During the depression years, church pledges were materially reduced. In the interest of economy Bishop JAMES C. BAKER and District Superintendent Charles F. Seidler, promoted the merging of First Church and Trinity. This move resulted in the dissolution of the First M. E. Church Corporation, and the transfer to Trinity of its church property and most of its members.

In January 1953, ground was broken for the present sanctuary on the location of the old Trinity Church. Befitting God's house, the handsomest of materials have been used. Altar, reredos, paneling, and pews are of Philippine mahogany, richly carved. The front doors are hewn from solid oak.

Stained glass windows depicting the life of Christ, Old Testament history and contemporary events in Protestantism are memorial gifts installed by the famous Judson's Studios of Los Angeles, Calif. On Oct. 6, 1963 a new organ built by Abbot and Sieker was dedicated, one of the finest instruments in the Pomona Valley.

Trinity's building and equipment outlay is approximately $884,000 and is debt free. In 1970 it reported 1,741 members.

Trinity is Methodism's mother church in the Pomona Valley. It has been a church with a strong mission to foreign and local missions. Its church school and youth programs over the years have been responsible for youth entering the Christian ministry, youth work, mission field and other related church endeavors. The church serves the community with varied programs vital to youth in scouting and campfire groups; it serves its members through two worship services each Sunday, family night programs, WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE, programs for Lent and Christmas, and church school classes for the children, youth and adults. The music program at Trinity is one of the most outstanding within the community.

PONCA CITY, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. First Church is a strong church in that section of OKLAHOMA. With the opening of the "Cherokee Strip" of Oklahoma Territory in 1893 and the subsequent establishment of Ponca City, the Methodists started with a "class" and within the year built their first church building. E. C. Harper was the first pastor. In 1921, under the pastorate of Clarence N. Hewitt, the present church edifice was erected and dedicated. An educational building was added in 1951.

Under the leadership of twenty-nine pastors who have served the First Church of Ponca City, membership has grown to 2,450 and a church school membership of 958 in 1970. Annual programming of its ministry exceeds $125,000 in cost. Staff includes two full-time ministers, minister of music, two missionaries in Congo, and secretarial assistance.

HENRY J. POPE

POPE, HENRY J. (1836-1912), British minister, was born at March, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 2, 1836. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1858. From 1876-97 he was secretary at the Chapel Office; he made this a center of religious aggression as well as a financial department. He was the inspiration of the Central Mission set up in Manchester in 1885-86, whose success was the key to the spread of the Central Hall idea throughout England. In recognition of his share in the FORWARD MOVEMENT, he was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1893. In 1897 he became Home Missions Secretary, and worked constantly for expansion. He died in London on July 16, 1912.

WILLIAM B. POPE

POPE, WILLIAM BURT (1822-1903), British minister and scholar, was born at Horton, Nova Scotia, Feb. 19, 1822; his father was a Wesleyan Methodist missionary from Devonshire. Brought up at Plymouth, he studied for the ministry at the Theological Institution, Hoxton (1841-42). While on circuit, he built up a reputation by translating antirationalist German theologians: Haupt's First Epistle

John (1846); Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus (1854); Ebrard's Commentary on the Johannine Epistles (1859); Winer's Confessions of Christendom (1863). Pope became theological tutor at Didsbury College, Manchester, in 1867. In 1871 he gave the second FERNLEY LECTURE on The Person of Christ; in 1875-76 he published his Compendium of Christian Theology. In 1877 he was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference, and in 1878 published Sermons, Addresses and Charges delivered during his year of office.

A saintly man, Pope had immense prestige as a theologian in later nineteenth-century Wesleyanism; his aloof, scholarly conservatism probably explains why liberal theology developed so slowly in the Wesleyan connection. Blind in his later years, he died on July 5, 1903.

JOHN KENT

POPE, WILLIAM KENNETH (1901-), American bishop, was born Nov. 21, 1901, at Hale, Mo., the son of William Mumford and Victoria (LaRue) Pope. In 1917-20 he attended Clarendon College in Texas. He received his B.A. degree in 1922, and his B.D. in 1924 from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. He attended the Graduate School at Yale University from 1927 to 1929. His honorary degrees include: D.D. from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (Georgetown, Texas) in 1937 and from HENDRIX COLLEGE in 1961; and the LL.D. degree from Southern Methodist University in 1964.

On March 16, 1930, he married Kate Sayle and they have two children, Katherine Victoria and Kenneth Sayle.

He joined the CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South in 1924, deacon in 1925, full connection in 1926, elder in 1929. He was transferred to the SOUTHWEST MISSION CONFERENCE in 1936; to the SOUTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1940; to the TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1949. His pastorates include: Milford, Texas, 1924-26; First Church, Breckenridge, 1929-33; First Church, GEORGETOWN, 1933-36; St. Paul Church, Springfield, Mo., 1936-40; First Church, AUSTIN, Texas, 1940-49; First Church, HOUSTON, 1949-60.

He was elected a bishop in June 1960 by the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, and assigned to the Dallas-Fort Worth Area. He was a member of the South Central Jurisdictional Conferences of 1948, 1952, 1956 and 1960; a member of the General Conference (TMC) in 1952, 1956 and 1960. He served as secretary of the Commission to Study the Ministry of The Methodist Church 1949-56. He was a member of the General Board of EDUCATION of The Methodist Church, 1952-64, has been on the Board of Christian SOCIAL CONCERNS since 1960 and was elected on the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs by the Uniting Conference of 1968; also a member of the PROGRAM COUNCIL in 1968. He was a delegate to the World Conference on Life and Work in Oxford, England in 1937; and to the World Methodist Conference at Oxford in 1951. He was a visiting preacher to the General Conference of The Methodist Church in Mexico in 1946, and represented The Methodist Church in the United States to the Centennial Celebration of Methodism in India in 1956. Bishop Pope is a trustee of: Southern Methodist University, Southwestern University, TEXAS WESLEYAN COLLEGE, and of the Methodist Children's Home of Texas. He is a member of the Board of WESTERN METHODIST ASSEMBLY (MOUNT SEQUOYAH). He administers the work of The United Methodist Church in the NORTH TEXAS and the Central Texas Annual Conferences. The Area presently comprises more than 700 churches with a total membership of about 165,000.

PORT ARTHUR, TEXAS, U.S.A. The Methodist Temple.

Many of the first settlers of Port Arthur were from KANSAS, ILLINOIS, IOWA and MISSOURI and many of these were Methodist. In January 1897, they held a meeting in Hotel Sabine and enrolled as a Methodist Class, after the original CLASS MEETINGS. Application for a charter was made and this was received in May of 1897. Material and work were solicited for the erection of a new house of worship. The Port Arthur Townsite Company donated a lot at the corner of Sixth Street and Savannah Avenue. One of the officials of the Kansas City, Pittsburgh and Gulf Railroad made the church a gift of eight dozen chairs. An organ was loaned to the little congregation. Charles K. Woodson was sent to the church in 1899, succeeding P. C. W. Wimberly, who had come into the Methodist Conference from the Presbyterian Church and was asked by the local Methodists to resign because of "inconsistency concerning Methodist discipline." A new organ was purchased while Woodson was at the charge. The church was without a pastor from 1900 until 1902. During this interval the Methodist congregation attended the Congregational Church services. In 1902 the church building was moved from Sixth and Savannah Avenue to Sixth near Beaumont Avenue.

On Oct. 28, 1902, the Trinity M. E. Church, South, was organized, taking a number of members from the First Church, North. The membership consisted of forty charter members. F. M. Bowles, who had been a successful lawyer and has just entered the ministry, was assigned by the Conference as pastor. Under his leadership 200 members were added to the church during the next four years and a church building at 836 Fifth Street was erected. A parsonage was added soon after. Several years later the church property in the 800 block was sold and the property at the corner of Nashville Avenue and Fifth Street with adjacent lots on Sixth Street was acquired by the church, which is known today as the Methodist Temple.

Twenty-nine pastors have served the pulpit of The Methodist Temple. One, WILLIAM C. MARTIN, was elected to the episcopacy. In 1970 the Temple reported a membership of 1,620.

PORT ARTHUR COLLEGE, Port Arthur, Texas, was founded in 1908 by the Gulf Conference of the M. E. Church. The school practically came into existence with the city of Port Arthur itself. John Gates, a pioneer who developed the city, made provision for the campus and for assistance in erecting some of its buildings.

It began as Port Arthur Collegiate Institute. At present it is a vocational school specializing in business and electronics. The Board of Education holds title to the property and the school's endowment. The governing board of twenty-one members, elected by the board, is self-perpetuating.

PORTER, HENRY PHILLIPS (1879-1960), seventeenth bishop of the C.M.E. Church, was born near Kilgore, Texas. He attended Texas College, where he finished the preparatory course in 1903. Bishop Porter began preaching in 1893 and became a member of the Central Texas Conference. In 1922, he was elected publishing agent, and while serving in that capacity he directed the building of a new publishing house and improved the church literature. At the General Conference in 1934, he was elected to the office of bishop. He presided over the episcopal areas of ALABAMA, OHIO, KENTUCKY, NORTH and SOUTH CAROLINA, and TEXAS. He retired in 1958 and died in 1960.

PORTER, JAMES (1808-1888), American minister was born on March 1, 1808, in Middleboro, Mass., the son of William and Rebecca Porter. He attended Pierce Academy and KENT'S HILL ACADEMY. In 1827, converted under Ebenezer Blake, he joined the M.E. Church. He became a member of the New England Conference in 1830.

His early pastorates were within the bounds of the present SOUTHERN NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE; later appointments included the cities of WORCESTER, BOSTON, and LYNN in MASSACHUSETTS. In 1844 he was presiding elder of the Worcester District and ten years later of the Boston District. From 1856 onward he was Assistant Book Agent in NEW YORK, retiring from that post and the active ministry in 1868.

As a result of a resolution introduced by Porter in the annual conference of 1855, laymen were admitted to NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE committees. At the time of his death he was the only member of the New England Conference elected seven times to GENERAL CONFERENCE. Here he was a conspicuous leader in the anti-slavery struggle, especially in 1844. Evangelism, theological education, and promotion were his strong interests. Porter published sixteen volumes, including: Compendium of Methodism, History of Methodism, Winning Worker, Chart of Life, and Helps to Officers of the Church.

On June 17, 1838, he married Jane Tinkham Howard. Eight children were born to them. Porter died on April 16, 1888, in Brooklyn, N. Y. He was buried there in Greenwood Cemetery.

PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A. JESSE LEE preached in Portland on his first visit to MAINE in 1793. On this occasion, and several other times, he preached in the second Congregational church, referred to in some accounts as "Rev. Kellogg's meeting house." Once he preached in the court house. In 1794 Philip Wagner organized the class at Monmouth. He was appointed in 1795 to the Portland Circuit, where he organized the class at Portland. The population of the place then was 2,246. In December of that year the first Quarterly Meeting held in Maine assembled in Portland. Wagner formed a class of nine members who struggled along with great difficulty. At the end of nine years the class numbered eleven. The favorable turn came in 1804 when Enoch Elsey purchased and presented to the society a house of worship previously used by the Episcopalians. The building was remodeled, moved to Federal Street, and was soon filled by a "respectable" congregation.

In 1797 Joshua Taylor was appointed presiding elder of the newly erected District of Maine and preacher in charge of the Readfield Circuit. It was in 1800, as he tried to preach in Castine, that he was rudely escorted from town by a clamorous mob. In 1804-5 he was appointed pastor of Portland. During that time the society grew from eleven members to sixty-four. Taylor was forced to give up his work because of ill health and opened a private school in Portland which he continued for sixteen years, preaching on the Sabbath in the vicinity as occasion required. He later was readmitted to the conference and in 1847 he retired in Portland. When he died in 1861 at the age of ninety-three years, the city of Portland went into mourning. The mayor and other dignitaries attended the service and during the funeral procession all the church bells of the city tolled. Methodism had made its place in the city and Joshua Taylor had been instrumental in bringing this about.

The Chestnut Street Church was completed and dedicated on Feb. 11, 1811. It prospered and, as the city extended its borders, became the mother of churches. In 1846 its members started the church on Pine Street; in 1851 they organized a church on Munjoy Hill, now known as Congress Street Church; later they established a church on Peak's Island in Casco Bay. For many years there was an Italian Mission which later became a church. A few years ago it was given up, its members joining other Methodist churches in the city as there was no longer need for services in the Italian language. For many years there was a Deaconess Home in Portland, but with changing conditions that, too, was given up.

For a considerable period Chestnut Street Church regularly received pastors transferred from other conferences, but of recent years members of the MAINE CONFERENCE have been appointed to it. Among its most distinguished pastors was Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON HUGHES, brother of Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES. This church has a present membership of 959, the largest in the Maine Conference. There are six United Methodist churches in the city of Portland, four in South Portland, four on islands in Casco Bay. Methodism in Portland and vicinity is stronger than anywhere else in the State of Maine.

PORTLAND, OREGON, U.S.A., chartered in 1851, had a population of about 375,000 in 1970. JASON LEE, the pioneer missionary on the Pacific coast, and his associates introduced Methodism in the region in 1834. By 1848 there were eight mission employees, and in 1849 the Oregon and California Mission Conference was organized. In 1850, JAMES H. WILBUR was appointed to PORTLAND and OREGON CITY; he immediately began to build Portland Academy and what came to be known as "Father Wilbur's Chapel," the forerunner of First Church, on Taylor Street near Third. The next year Wilbur reported fifty-eight members on the charge. In 1852, the GENERAL CONFERENCE created the Oregon Conference, and that year Portland had forty-three members. The church had 109 members in 1860, 222 in 1870, and 296 in 1880, though by the latter year a second church, Hall Street, had been organized. In 1890, First Church had 631 members, while two other congregations and a Chinese mission accounted for some 500 more in the city. In 1912, when First Church had 1,250 members and Grace Church had 656, the two merged under the name of First Church which reported 1,670 members the next year.

In 1864, the East Portland Church was organized in the part of the city lying east of the Willamette River. Three years later it reported 326 members, including 127 probationers. After 1888 it was known as Centenary Church. In 1900, Portland had twelve churches with a total membership of 2,153. At unification in 1939, the M.E. Church had twenty-six churches and 11,149 members in Portland.

The Pacific Christian Advocate which began in Salem in 1855, was published in Portland from 1858 to 1929 when it was moved to SAN FRANCISCO.

In 1858, the M. E. Church, South organized work in OREGON, making it a part of the San Francisco District of the Pacific Conference. The Oregon District was formed in 1859 with ORCENETH FISHER as presiding elder. In 1860 he reported five circuits, one of them called Portland, with a total of 268 members. There are no records for the Civil War years, but in 1866 the Columbia Conference was formed with two districts, and a total of seven circuits in Oregon. However, the denomination had difficulty gaining a foothold in Portland. In 1868 there was a Portland Mission with forty-five members, but the next year the number had dropped to thirteen, and Portland did not appear again in the appointments until 1903 when C. A. Hyatt was appointed there. In 1904 he reported eighty-four members. From 1910 to 1919, the Portland church reported over 300 members each year, but thereafter it decreased in strength until 1931 when it closed.

The M. P. Church organized the Oregon and California Conference in 1850, but the denomination was never strong, and it disappeared from that region after 1908.

A few foreign language churches were organized in Portland, but with the passage of time they became churches in the Portland District of the Oregon Conference. Hughes Memorial, a Negro church with ninety-seven members in 1970, receives some financial aid from the Portland District Church Extension Society. That organization, composed principally of laymen, was formed in 1903. It helps to establish new churches and gives financial assistance to existing churches which are in need. The society helped to establish GOODWILL INDUSTRIES in Portland, and it has managed Leewood Camp. Portland Methodism assists with interdenominational inner city redemptional projects and helps to support Koinonia House on the Portland State College campus.

Portland was one of the sixteen cities selected by the 1904 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church for episcopal residences, and it has continued as such to this day.

In 1970, the Oregon-Idaho Conference had a Portland East and a Portland West District, the one having 43 charges and 15,203 members and the other 31 charges and 11,350 members. In the City of Portland proper The United Methodist Church in 1970 reported 26 churches, 11,742 members, property valued at $7,139,575, and $1,035,488 raised for all purposes during the year. Rose City Park and First are the two largest churches in the city, the one with 1,652 members and property valued at $857,856, and the other with 1,313 members and property worth $1,519,937.

First A.M.E. Zion Church was organized in 1862 at the home of Mrs. Mary Carr on A Street (now Ankeny). It was then called "The People's Church." The first Trustees included Ned Simmons, a Mr. Johnson, and a Mr. Nichols. For some time the church held services at various homes of the members. Later, property was purchased on North Third Street, between B and C Streets (now Burnside and Couch Streets). Here, the cornerstone was laid, June 3, 1869. J. O. Lodge was the pastor at this time.

In 1883 the trustees of the church bought property on Main and Eleventh Streets (now Thirteenth Street), and erected a building. On Sunday, Oct. 11, 1891 the old cornerstone was relaid at 13th and Main Streets. A. Tilgham Brown was the pastor. The church remained at this location for more than twenty years.

The building of the church, at the present location, began in 1917, and was completed under the pastorate of W. I. Rowan; Bishop L. W. Kyles was presiding bishop at that time. The parsonage apartment was built in 1929 and was formally opened on May 12, 1929. With the opening of the enlarged Church plant, a more extensive program began, and the formal rededication of the new church and parsonage on Sunday, Sept. 15, 1929, by Bishop J. W. Martin, marked a new epoch in the history of this old Portland and Pacific Northwest Church. W. W. Matthews, a former pastor of First A.M.E. Zion of Portland, became a bishop.

There have been periods of great trial for Zion. During the period of 1911 to 1917 many members became dissatisfied and discouraged and joined other Churches. Again in the thirties, the church was faced with great financial problems, but overcame them by faith and by hard work of the members.

Rose City Park Church is a large residential church located half-way between downtown Portland and the city's international airport. Its brick edifice is best known for its memorial windows of traditional stained glass.

District Superintendent J. W. McDougall organized this congregation in the Rose City Community Club House on Feb. 1, 1913. The church soon bought nearby lots in this section which had just come into the city, a step which transformed a notorious horse racing track a few blocks away into a sedate municipal golf course. The new congregation soon moved from the club house into a large tent and, by the first winter, were housed in a bungalow-type wooden chapel, known as "The Little Brown Church on the Hill," which was used until 1925. By that time the first pastor, W. W. Youngson, had returned for a second pastorate after a term as district superintendent.

The present brick sanctuary was built in 1924-25, with an extensive educational unit and chapel added in 1951. Youngson Hall, honoring the first pastor, was dedicated in 1957. The nave was remodeled and enlarged with a new chancel added in 1965, with a new organ installed in 1966, bringing the total plant valuation to one million dollars.

In the mid-1950's the membership numbered over 2,000 and maintains a constituency of about twice that number. In 1970 it reported 1,652 members. It has a multiple staff and multiple Sunday morning services, served by five trained choirs. The chief emphasis has been on persons and their needs. During the Golden Anniversary Year in 1963, a count showed 85,000 people entering for worship, study or fellowship. Half of the twelve senior pastors who have served over the years, including this writer, have either been appointed to the church from the superintendency or have gone from this parish to a district assignment.

PORTO ALEGRE, Brazil. The work of the Methodist Church in Porto Alegre, capital of Rio Grande do Sul, was begun by João C. Corrêa, lay preacher and homeopathic doctor. Born in Jaguarao, Rio Grande do Sul, he had moved to MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, where he first heard the Gospel. Converted, he became a volunteer worker for the Plate Conference of the M.E. Church, and was asked to return to BRAZIL. This he did in April 1875, selling Bibles and Christian literature. He was soon officially appointed by THOMAS WOOD, Superintendent of the Mission, to be a missionary in charge of the Province of Rio Grande do Sul.

Corrêa moved with his family and a young Uruguayan teacher, CARMEN CHACON, their protégée, to Porto Alegre. In September 1885, he organized the first congregation with six charter members; a Sunday school with twenty pupils, and a day school which he named the Colegio Evangelico Misto. Carmen was put in charge of the school, which eventually became the well-known COLEGIO AMERICANO of today. The little congregation grew into Central Methodist Church of Porto Alegre. Corrêa served until 1896, being succeeded by William Robinson, who came from Montevideo with his family, and with Miss H. M. Hegeman, a contract missionary teacher who was to direct the school. Due to illness and the death of a child, Robinson returned to the States, and JOHN W. PRICE took charge of the work. To this day the influence of the Prices is felt in the educational and evangelistic work of the Methodist Church in this region.

In 1900, the M.E. Church transferred its work in Brazil to the M.E. Church, South; and South Brazil was organized into a district of the Brazil Annual Conference. It is now the Second Ecclesiastical Region of the Methodist Church of Brazil.

Today there are seven self-supporting churches in Porto Alegre, plus Sunday schools and preaching points throughout the city and surrounding area. The Porto Alegre District supports a home for aged women, called the Ottilia Chaves Home. Other churches have developed fine welfare services, a girls' home, and mothers' clubs. Central Church, with its beautiful temple in the downtown area, has built a several-storied educational and office building.

There are two outstanding Methodist schools in the city. One is the Colegio Americano for girls, whose modern plant was designed by the missionary-architect, MARY SUE BROWN. The other is a boys' school, the Instituto Porto Alegre (originally called College), founded in 1923 with the support of Bishop JOHN M. MOORE. Its first principal or reitor was JOHN R. SAUNDERS. He was succeeded by EARL MORELAND, when he decided to continue in pastoral work.

A unique feature of Methodism in this city is a granite and bronze monument in its main park honoring JOHN WESLEY. Its sculptor was a Brazilian Methodist, Romano Reif. This is the first monument in South America that honors the founder of a leading Protestant denomination.

Porto Alegre College was founded in 1921 by the M.E. Church, South, with funds provided through the church's CENTENARY FUND. Its founders with Bishop John M. Moore, John R. Saunders and J. Earl Moreland. Bishop Moore chose the city and campus site, purchased the land and served as first advisor. Saunders served as first president, 1921-25; Moreland was vice-president, 1922-26, and president, 1927-34. Classes were held the first year in rented quarters in downtown Porto Alegre until the new campus buildings were completed in February 1924, on the site 400 meters above the level of the business section of the city. Enrollment was held to 350 men through the first fifteen years (1967 enrollment, 1,624; coeducational since 1945). Schools are Elementar (eight years), accredited by State, Rio Grande do Sul; Ginasio (six years), accredited by the Federal government since 1928; School of Theology (three years); business school (two years). Faculty and staff through 1934 numbered twenty-six. The name was changed in 1935 to Instituto Porto Alegre. The college was designed by its founders to serve the three Southern states, as CRANBURY COLLEGE served the Northern states. Trustees are nominated by the Board, but serve only after approval by the Concilio do Sul (So. Brazil Annual Conference). Presidents have been: Alan K. Manchester (1926-27); Dr. Oscar Machado (1934-49); Bishop JOSE PINHEIRO (1949-53); DANIEL L. BETTS (1953-55); Dr. Aslid Gick (1955-).

PORTSMOUTH, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A., one of the oldest cities in New England, was settled in 1623 and incorporated in 1633. As early as 1767 GEORGE WHITEFIELD came here preaching the Word, but Methodism proper was introduced by JESSE LEE on July 18, 1790. On a second visit, there being no public building open to him, he preached to an eager throng from the court house steps.

In 1798 FRANCIS ASBURY noted in his diary that he found Portsmouth "well fortified against Methodism," but the seeds soon began to sprout almost eighteen years after Jesse Lee's first summer service, for a class of fifty-two active members made up the Methodist society organized April 27, 1808 by George Rich, missionary of the Boston District. He purchased for $2,000 an old meeting house on Vaughn Street, which had been the property of the Universalists, and it was used by Methodists for nearly twenty years.

Mentioned in the M.E. Church minutes first in 1806, Portsmouth, which was then in the Boston District, was served by Levi Walker, who was sent to RHODE ISLAND and Portsmouth. Previous to the organizing of a Sunday school in 1819, the LADIES AID SOCIETY had been formed and remained continuously active. After having been connected with various charges since its founding, it appears at the head of the New Hampshire District in 1820, with Josiah A. Scarritt as pastor. The Portsmouth society was incorporated by order of the General Court following occupancy on State Street of a newly built $9,000 sanctuary, dedicated Jan. 1, 1828. This was remodeled in 1868. The New ENGLAND CONFERENCE met at Portsmouth in 1829 and during the session organized the New Hampshire-Vermont Conference.

On May 4, 1839 the local fellowship adopted the following resolution: "Resolved that with John Wesley we believe that American slavery is the vilest that ever saw sun . . . Resolved that as slavery exists to an alarming extent in the Methodist Church, we ought by all constitutional means use our influence to clear the Church of this shocking abomination."

Attempts at forming a second society under the name of the Broadhead Church in 1859 were not successful and after a few years it was given up. An EPWORTH LEAGUE was organized in 1889 at the State Street Church. Upon completion of the present stone church on Miller Avenue in 1913, the old building was taken over for use as a Jewish Synagogue. In more recent years, due to the proximity of the Pease Air Force Base, additional facilities became imperative and an adjoining parish house and educational building was built and dedicated on Apr. 27, 1958. It is in the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE and in 1970 reported 593 members, 160 preparatory members, a church school of 251, a Sunday school average attendance of 150, and estimated value of church building equipment and land of $296,600.

PORTSMOUTH, VIRGINIA, U.S.A. (population 109,827), is one of the ports of Hampton Roads and an active seaport city. It has an important navy yard, is a rail and ocean shipping center. Laid out in 1750, it was the scene of conflict in the American Revolution and in the War Between the States.

JOSEPH PILMORE and ROBERT WILLIAMS were among the first evangelists sent to America by JOHN WESLEY. Williams, not an ordained preacher, left Ireland in 1766 and was licensed to preach at PHILADELPHIA in 1769 by Joseph Pilmore. In early 1772 Isaac Luke, a member of the Anglican Church in Portsmouth, heard Williams preach from the court house steps in NORFOLK and invited him to cross the river to Portsmouth. Williams accepted and preached from the porch of the Luke home on Court Street. He appointed Luke as leader of the group and Luke found an empty warehouse for a meeting place. Williams labored here two months before going elsewhere.

Joseph Pilmore preached in Portsmouth several times in July 1772, and on Nov. 14, 1772, organized the class into the first Methodist society in southeastern Virginia. Two days later he formed a society in Norfolk. These two groups formed the Portsmouth-Norfolk Circuit. At the first Methodist Conference in America, held in Philadelphia July 1, 1773, RICHARD WRIGHT, an ordained preacher, was appointed to the circuit. JOHN KING was the next pastor, followed by FRANCIS ASBURY in 1775. After Asbury arrived, a small chapel was built in Portsmouth on Effingham Street by the twenty-seven members.

The American Revolution brought troubles for Methodism. Wesley disapproved of rebellious colonists. Many preachers returned to Great Britain, among them Joseph Pilmore and Richard Wright. Asbury remained. He was on the circuit six months and conducted the funeral of Robert Williams while there. From 1777 until 1783, no preachers were appointed to the circuit. The British distrusted the Methodists and discouraged meetings. Class leaders continued the work, and membership increased during the war.

In Portsmouth the little chapel was outgrown, the society purchased a lot on Glasgow Street in 1792. The chapel building was moved to the new lot and enlarged. In 1792 WILLIAM MCKENDREE became pastor of the circuit which had grown to 949 white and 693 Negro members. The Portsmouth church became a station in 1806. The first Sabbath school was established in 1818. The congregation moved to its present location on Dinwiddie and Queen Streets in October 1833.

In 1843 the congregation, interested in church extension, built a chapel on Gosport which became Wright Memorial Church. In 1843, because of the desires of the 342 Negro members, the church on Glasgow Street was turned over to these faithful members. This group was served for years by a white local preacher, George M. Bain, until a colored preacher, JAMES A. HANBY, was found. This church is now Emmanuel Church, a strong congregation of the A.M.E. Church. Also, Wesley Chapel was built on Effingham Street. It served that area until June 1966, when it was closed. Another chapel was erected which was to become Central Church.

The disastrous yellow fever epidemic of 1855 took the lives of many members.

The old church on Glasgow Street burned in 1856. George M. Bain asked Dinwiddie Street Church to help, and a large brick building was erected on North Street. The VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of 1858, presided over by Bishop KAVANAUGH, met there, and the building was then turned over to the Negro brethren.

During the War Between the States, Dinwiddie Street Church dropped from 600 to 197 members. The northern BALTIMORE CONFERENCE assumed control in 1862 with authority granted by Federal forces. Pastors appointed by the Virginia Conference were harassed by Federal troops and forced to leave. A notation in the conference annual listed Dinwiddie Street Church as being "in Federal hands." In 1864 the church burned, and the military commander gave St. John's Episcopal Church to the northern preacher, and that church was used by northern Methodists until the close of the war. During this period a small chapel was built at the rear of the Dinwiddie Street lot, and services were held there by the southern Methodists.

During its first century the Dinwiddie Street congregation had started four other churches: Wright Memorial, North Street, Wesley Chapel and Central. Three of its former pastors, Asbury, McKendree and EARLY, and one of its presiding elders, RICHARD WHATCOAT, had become bishops.

At the beginning of its second century Dinwiddie Street Church started rebuilding, and a new brick church was consecrated on Nov. 14, 1876. It was given the name Monumental as a monument to Robert Williams, the first Methodist to preach in Portsmouth in 1772, and the first to introduce Methodism into Virginia.

In 1881 the ladies of the church formed a Foreign Missionary Society, a new organization in Methodism, against the wishes of the pastor. He felt that women should not hold prominent positions in the church. His wife was the first president!

By 1807 Monumental was a prosperous city church with 869 members. It had become a leading church in Virginia Methodism, giving generously to missions, education and other Methodist causes. The first women stewards were elected in 1925. Many churches in Portsmouth were assisted in their early days by this "Mother" church. WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP, pastor 1915-1917, and WALTER C. GUM, pastor 1933-1936, later became bishops. Twenty-eight Methodist preachers came out of Monumental Church. Present membership is 1,158 (1970).

At the Annual Conference held in Norfolk in 1966, Monumental was awarded a certificate by the Conference Bicentennial Committee recognizing it as the oldest Methodist church in continuous existence in Virginia.

PORTUGAL (Igreja Evangélica Metodista Portuguesa, abbr. IEMP). Metropolitan Portugal occupies the western part of the Iberian Peninsula in Europe, being bounded on the north and east by SPAIN, and the south and west by the Atlantic Ocean. It covers an area of 35,466 square miles, and its population was estimated in 1968 as approximately nine million. Portugal is mountainous though about two-thirds of the land is cultivated. Lisbon, its capital, operates a major international airport.

In recent years marked industrialization has proceeded in all parts of the country, and in the overseas provinces, with a rapid growth of commercial and industrial activity, centering on the capital in the south, and on Oporto, the second largest city and seaport, in the north. This development not only has its important economic consequences, but is producing profound sociological effects on the life and ethos of the people.

As early as 1811, Methodist class meetings were being held among soldiers, with some officers, of the Duke of Wellington's Peninsular Army, winter quartered in Cartaxo, some forty-five miles north of Lisbon; but no known permanent results of this activity remain. Historically significant work began in 1853-54 when Thomas Chegwin, a Cornish mining engineer, inaugurated his class meeting among workers in the Palhal Mines in northern Portugal.

Another layman, James Cassels, born in 1844 of a British family resident in Portugal, introduced Methodism to Vila Nova de Gaia, a smaller neighbor of Oporto, situated on the southern bank of the River Douro. He was afterwards ordained a minister of the Lusitanian (Episcopal) Church, and became a naturalized Portuguese; he was decorated by the Portuguese Government in 1924 as a public benefactor, and a bust to his memory, "Diogo Cassels," stands in a public garden in Vila Nova. He built the first Wesleyan Church in Portugal, "Torre" in Vila Nova de Gaia (now the day-school building of the Lusitanian Church of St. John the Evangelist), which was dedicated in 1868 in a service conducted by H. H. Richmond, Methodist minister from GIBRALTAR, in which station the tiny work in Portugal was for a while included.

The first celebration of the Holy Communion and the first infant baptism (of James Cassel's daughter), also took place on this occasion.

In February of 1871 the first British Methodist missionary came to take charge of the work at Oporto and Palhal. He was Robert Hawkey Moreton, born in BUENOS AIRES in 1844, whose knowledge of Spanish helped him to a rapid acquisition of Portuguese, in which tongue he became an acknowledged master and into which he translated several hymns still widely used today in hymnaries both in Portugal and BRAZIL. He introduced the tonic solfa musical system into Portugal to enable his people, then mostly without culture, to learn to sing. He remained superintendent for forty-three years. His ministry was marked by the use of hymns and of the current Methodist liturgy in his own Portuguese liturgy, by his insistence on the class meeting and the due application of Methodist discipline, and by his own erudition and missionary zeal.

Aided by members of the British colony in Oporto, he designed and built the Mirante Church, opened in March 1877. This is the mother-church of Portuguese Methodism. Later, in 1934, the facade of this church was adorned with azulejos, the distinctive Portuguese glazed tiling used on exteriors, giving it an appearance almost unique in Methodism, with its two great evangelical texts seen regularly by the scores who pass by its doors. In the early days Moreton had the help of two converted Roman Catholic priests, Guilherme Dias and Santos Figueiredo, the former of whom had the distinction at that time of filling his unusual preaching place twice every Sunday morning with two distinct congregations.

Moreton's chief helpers for many years were ALFREDO DA SILVA, later (1914-48) General Superintendent, teacher, preacher and for a time member of the Oporto City Council, representative of international committees in the cause of peace, and a founder of the Portuguese YMCA; and José A. Fernandes, the first editor of the periodical Portugal Evangélico, founded in October 1920 and still being published. An earlier publication, A Reforma, a joint enterprise of Moreton and Dias, maintained a very high standard during its sixteen years of existence, 1876-92.

At the beginning of this century work was begun in Lisbon, superintended from Oporto, and under the charge, first of Arthur H. Wilks, and then of Thomas H. Simpson, both ministers of the British Methodist Conference. This venture met with great success, hundreds of people flocking to the services and meetings held in a hired basement room. In 1906 through lack of funds, this work was handed over to another evangelical mission.

Much of the work done in the past has contributed, directly or indirectly, to the life of churches, Methodist and others, in South America, notably in Brazil, where there are many Portuguese immigrants. Valuable contribution has also been made in this way to the work in ANGOLA, MOZAMBIQUE, and other parts of overseas Portugal, although there is no direct association with European Portuguese Methodism. Methodist work at one time existed in Madeira, but this has for many years been in the hands of the Presbyterians.

In 1968 there were five Portuguese ministers, with a British minister as General Superintendent and fraternal worker; there were also thirty local preachers and one Portuguese deaconess. The work is centered in Oporto, and covers mainly the northern half of the country, reaching to Coimbra, the ancient University town, and with the second largest of its churches at Aveiro, the so-called Venice of Portugal. The membership is upwards of 700, in a community of something over 2,500, being part of the estimated 65,000 in the non-Roman Christian community. There is good Sunday school work, as well as four small primary day schools. Other social and benevolent work is carried out, much of it in collaboration with other Protestant Churches; there is some ecumenical outreach. Large scale emigration has tended to keep numerical progress at a modest level, but there is positive growth.

The IEMP is an overseas District of the British Methodist Conference, and has a British missionary as its chairman. There is an Annual Synod with an elected permanent Executive Committee, which supervises the work now divided into two circuits, one centered on Oporto, the other on Aveiro. Plans for increasing autonomy are being studied. The IEMP is a full member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

ALBERT ASPEY

C. W. POSNETT

POSNETT, CHARLES WALKER (1870-1950), British missionary, was born in Sheffield, England, Oct. 7, 1870. Educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and Richmond College, he sailed for India in 1895 and was appointed to Medak, Hyderabad District, in 1896. He was to become the great administrator in the Methodist Church in India. Appointed chairman of the Hyderabad District and of the Provincial Synod in 1916, he established many of the district's most valuable institutions—Annuitant Society for Indian Ministers (1909), Pension Fund for Evangelists (1909), the "cathedral church" at Medak (opened 1924), the Training School for Evangelists (1926), the "Week of Witness" (1929), nursery schools (1936). A great evangelist and preacher, he shepherded tens of thousands of outcasts, mainly Madigas, who responded in the "mass movements" from 1916 onward and the smaller but equally important "caste movement," into the Church from 1926. He began work among Gonds (outcasts) in 1931. He worked constantly for Church union, and organized much relief work in times of famine, especially the great famine of 1918-21. He was decorated with the Kaiser-i-Hing gold medal by the government of India. On his retirement in 1939 the Christian movement in Hyderabad numbered 109,000. He died on Sept. 30, 1950.

POTTER, ANDREW JACKSON (1830-1895), American preacher, was born in Chariton County, Mo., April 3, 1830. In his day he was one of the best known pioneer preachers of West TEXAS. With only three months of schooling, he was left an orphan at ten years of age. He became a horserace jockey and a gambler, and then joined the army when sixteen. In the army he helped to fight Apaches and other Indians in New Mexico and ARIZONA. He married and settled in West Texas in 1853. He was converted in 1856, and joined the Methodist Church in 1858, and became a local preacher in 1859. He served as a chaplain in the Confederate Army throughout the Civil War. In 1866 he joined the West Texas Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

Phelan summarizes Potter's career in these terms: He became "a noted character as an Indian fighter, a tamer of desperadoes and a popular preacher. . . . His rugged character, his courage and ready wit, common sense and sincerity made him a popular hero among the early settlers. In addition to his Bible, hymnbook, and saddlebags, a Winchester and six shooter were a part of Potter's equipment, and he was known on more than one occasion to use his fist as a quelling influence upon frontier toughs who were disposed to disturb public meetings."

Once a caller was sent through a pioneer settlement announcing Potter's preaching engagement that night in these words: "O yes, O yes, O yes. There is going to be some spang-up religious racket on Mr. F's gallery tonight by the fighting parson, a reformed gambler, but now a celebrated gospel sharp. The racket will begin in fifteen minutes."

Potter died in the pulpit at the close of a sermon at Tilman Chapel, near Lockhart, Texas, Oct. 31, 1895.

POTTER, JOHN (c. 1674-1747), Archbishop of Canterbury from 1737, previously Bishop of Oxford was a patristic and classical scholar. He approved of the ministrations of the Holy Club at the Bocardo Gaol, and ordained several of its members including JOHN WESLEY, BENJAMIN INGHAM, JAMES HERVEY, and JOHN GAMBOLD. Potter advised Wesley that it was possible for him to fulfill his ministry in other ways than as a parish priest. In 1739 Potter interviewed John and Charles Wesley, speaking with affection but warning them against rash speaking, and declaring himself to be against any kind of innovation. Potter was inclined to accept the validity of the Moravian episcopal succession. In 1750 Wesley abridged his Grecian Antiquities (2 vols., 1697-99) for the Kingswood scholars.

POTTS, JAMES HENRY (1848-1942), American pastor and long-time editor of The Michigan Christian Advocate, was born June 12, 1848, near Simcoe, Ontario, CANADA.

He was the son of Philip and Fannie Ann (Buck) Potts. He received the A.B. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and ALBION COLLEGE in MICHIGAN awarded him the D.D. and LL.D. degrees in his later life. On Sept. 8, 1869, he married Alonsa C. Cole, and their children were James R., Florence A., and Alice E. As a pastor he served Ganges, Mich. 1869; Cedar Springs, 1871; Allen, 1872; and Plainwell, 1873. He became assistant editor of The Michigan Christian Advocate in 1877, and was with it until his retirement, as he became editor-in-chief in 1884, keeping his membership in the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE.

Potts was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES (ME) of 1888, '92, '96, 1900, and '04, and was appointed a fraternal delegate to the Canadian General Conference from the M. E. Church in 1894. He was also a member of the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE of 1911. He served in the Civil War as a private in the 6th Michigan Volunteer Cavalry for fourteen months—from 1865-66 (being at that time but seventeen years of age). He was the author of Methodism in the Field, 1880; Golden Dawn, 1881; Faith Made Easy, 1888; Back to Oxford, 1903; Upward Leading, 1905; My Gift to Thee, 1909-10; Every Day a Delight, 1914. He was the editor of Perrine's Principles of Church Government brought out by the BOOK CONCERN in 1887; and Living Thoughts of John Wesley, 1891. He exerted great influence as an editor and his memoir in the Michigan Conference Minutes stated that "since his retirement he was a most loved figure in Algonac where he resided with his daughter."

POTTS, JAMES MANNING (1895-1973), American minister, editor, and church executive, was born at Como, N. C., on July 14, 1895. He was the son of Reginald Harrell and Annie Christian (Moore) Potts. His education was at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, where he received the M.A. degree in 1920, and the D.D. in 1935. Princeton University granted him the Th.B. degree in 1924, the Th.M. in 1925, and he did postgraduate work at the University of Virginia and at the University of Chicago. The EWHA WOMAN'S UNIVERSITY in SEOUL, KOREA, gave him the Litt.D. in 1961.

His wife was Agnes Wright whom he married on Dec. 23, 1920, and their children are Reginald Harrell, James Manning, Joseph Christian, Katharine Coleman (dec.), Agnes Withers (Mrs. George Beck), and Ann Wilson (dec.).

Dr. Potts joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1925, and went into full connection in 1927. He served as pastor in Berryman Church, Richmond, 1926-30; Trinity Church, Petersburg, 1930-32; Barton Heights Church, Richmond, 1932-35, was the superintendent of the Richmond District, 1935-40, and was pastor of Greene Memorial, ROANOKE, 1940-44—all in VIRGINIA. At this time he became the associate director of the CRUSADE FOR CHRIST with headquarters in CHICAGO, from 1944-48. He was then elected editor of The Upper Room, NASHVILLE, Tenn., where he served 1948-67, at which time he retired from its editorship.

He was a member of the TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION, 1948-64; the Commission on EVANGELISM, 1940-48; the executive secretary of the Methodist Advance, 1948-50; a member of the General Board of the NATIONAL COUNCIL CHURCHES OF CHRIST, 1952-66; a member of the Broadcasting and Film Commission, 1952-65; a member of the General Assemblies of the Federal Council of Churches and the National Council of Churches from 1938; of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES also. He was a member of the Advisory Council on Naval Affairs of the Sixth Naval District (U.S.) from 1956. He was a trustee of Randolph-Macon College, 1930-67, a Fellow in Methodist History, a member of the World Association of Christian Broadcasting, and his editorship of The Upper Room caused him to travel over world-wide Methodism where he acted as a liaison official between the Methodists in various countries and the Methodism of his own homeland and other denominations.

Dr. Potts wrote in conjunction with Dr. Asbury Smith, Love Abounds, A Profile of Harry Denman, 1965; edited the Prayers of the Early Church, 1953; Prayers of the Middle Ages, 1954; was editor-in-chief of The Letters of Francis Asbury, 1958; Selections from Letters of John Wesley, Francis Asbury, John Woolman, 1957; Listening to the Saints, 1962; Grace Sufficient, The Story of Helen Kim, 1964. He was associate editor of The Journal of Francis Asbury, three volumes, published in 1958; History of American Methodism, 1964; and was a contributor to articles on early Virginia Methodism in various historical and church publications.

Upon retirement in 1967, as editor of The Upper Room, he was elected by the trustees of the LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY to serve as its executive director. He retired from this position in 1970 and resided in Crystal Springs, Fla., until his death on Jan. 31, 1973.

POTTS, JOHN (1838-1907), Canadian minister, was born at Maguire's Bridge, County Fermanagh, IRELAND. As a young man, he emigrated to CANADA and was for a time a student at VICTORIA COLLEGE. Taken on trial in 1858, he was ordained in the CANADA CONFERENCE in 1861.

From the outset Potts demonstrated striking oratorical abilities. A powerful man with a fertile, well-stocked mind, he rapidly gained a great reputation as an outstanding preacher. His talents were promptly put to use in the new Centenary Church (Hamilton), at St. James' Church in MONTREAL, and at the Metropolitan Church in TORONTO.

John Potts was, however, much more than a great pulpit orator. At an early stage, he became interested in the church's educational institutions. He was an active member of the governing bodies of Victoria University and the Wesleyan Theological College in Montreal. In 1886, he became Secretary of Education, which office he held until his death. In this capacity, he strengthened and amplified the Methodist Church's concern for the orderly development of all the educational institutions under its charge.

Potts, who received doctorates from OHIO WESLEYAN in 1887 and Victoria in 1894, was described by one of his contemporaries as a "Methodist of the Methodists." He was, indeed, a keen defender of his church's interests, a powerful orator, a temperance advocate, a man alert to changing trends in education and in politics. Yet he was not a sectarian. He was one of the first to make friendly gestures to the Episcopal Methodists, and he collaborated generously with representatives of other churches.

When he died in 1907, the Methodist Church lost one of the figures most representative of its late-nineteenth-century prosperity.

POTTSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., First Church, is an important church of the PHILADELPHIA Area, and the first Methodist church established in what is known as the Anthracite Region of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. The city itself began in 1806 when a John Pott of Oley Berks County, Pa., came into the region and purchased a small iron furnace which had been built two years earlier by Lewis Reese and Isaac Thomas. The industry grew, a forge was added and houses were built for the workers. Other industries moved into the community and more families settled in the area, among whom were several Methodists. A local preacher, Jonathan Wynn, who also moved into the community, began holding religious services in the homes of the Methodists and has the honor of preaching the first Methodist sermon in Pottsville, although the exact date of its preaching is not known. During the winter of 1827 and 1828, however, the Methodists were visited by preachers from the Lancaster Circuit: GEORGE COOKMAN, David Best, Samuel Grace, and JOHN LEDNUM.

Preaching services began to be held regularly in a small log schoolhouse on North Center Street, and in 1828 a class was formed of thirteen members. Originally served by pastors from the Lancaster Circuit, the church was organized in 1829 with sixty-seven members as a separate appointment of the Philadelphia Conference. In October 1830, the first church building was dedicated, a stone structure 40 by 60 feet. The church continued to grow and some of its laymen assisted in the establishment of churches in neighboring anthracite communities, particularly Port Carbon and Minersville.

In 1854 a second church at 5th and Market Streets was begun in Pottsville by some dissident members of First Church, and it became known as Second M.E. Church. By 1857, however, the two churches had reunited.

First Church continued to grow, and the church building was enlarged. Finally in 1898 the site of the present huge gray stone edifice was purchased for $38,500. Ground for the new church was broken in 1907 and the cornerstone was laid in November of the same year. The entire cost of the building was $126,500, and was paid in full by 1916. It was a large sum to have been raised in those days. The church has had a widening influence in this section of the Anthracite Region. Its leadership is greater than one would expect of a membership of about 1,200 persons.

FREDERICK E. MASER

POWELL, THOMAS (1872-1949), Canadian Methodist and United Church of Canada minister, was born in Radnor, Herefordshire, England, on March 5, 1872. In 1876 he came to Canada with his parents and was educated at Almonte, Ontario. Originally an Anglican, he joined the Epworth League and became a Methodist.

He attended McGill University and Montreal Wesleyan College. Ordained in 1899, he was appointed to Olds in the Northwest Territories. Subsequently he served in various charges in Alberta until in 1918 he became superintendent of missions, a post which he continued to hold after Union. He retired in 1942, and died at Calgary on June 10, 1949.

Powell was president of his conference in 1913 and 1936. He was a commissioner to the first General Council of the United Church and to several subsequent ones. The doctorate of divinity conferred on him in 1928 by St. Stephen's College was indicative of the esteem in which he was held by the church in Alberta.

POWER, JOHN H. (1798-1873), American minister, was born on March 15, 1798 in Montgomery County, Ky. and attended common schools there. He was admitted on trial to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1821 and to full connection in 1823. He served churches in KENTUCKY, VIRGINIA, OHIO and IOWA for eighteen years and was an effective presiding elder in Ohio and of the Burlington, Muscatine and Keokuk Districts of the IOWA CONFERENCE for twenty-eight years. From 1848-52 he was assistant agent for the Western BOOK CONCERN and from 1854-55 he was in a supernumerary relationship because of ill health. He returned to active work in 1865 and continued vigorously until his death on Jan. 25, 1873. A member of the board of trustees of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY 1860-72, he acted as president of the board 1868-72, and was influential in the expansion of the university and the public school system in IOWA. He was an official delegate to eight GENERAL CONFERENCES.

Gaining his education by individual effort, he taught himself both Greek and Hebrew. He was noted as a preacher of power and insight and as an administrator for methodical, exact attention to detail. He never missed a meeting of an annual conference in fifty-two years. Current religious and political controversy attracted his attention and he published pamphlets on: Power on Universalism; Doolittle and Power; Domestic Piety and Letters to Dr. Smith on Slavery. Ohio Wesleyan University granted him an honorary D.D. in 1853.

POYTHRESS, FRANCIS (1732-1818), American minister, was born in VIRGINIA in 1732 and converted there in 1772 under DEVEREUX JARRATT. He was received on trial in 1775, and after preaching ten years in VIRGINIA and MARYLAND he served fifteen years (1786-1800) with distinction as a presiding elder. Although accustomed to settled life, he uncomplainingly endured frontier hardships to establish Methodism in KENTUCKY and to sustain BETHEL ACADEMY. Worn by his labors, he sank in 1801 into a tragic mental illness and died about 1818 in Jessamine County, Ky.

E. W. PRAETORIUS

PRAETORIUS, ELMER WESLEY (1882-1966), American E.U.B. bishop, was born in Dayton, Ohio, Oct. 1, 1882. He was graduated from NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE and EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Naperville, Ill. He was ordained a minister of the INDIANA CONFERENCE of The EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION and through the course of denominational unions served in The Evangelical Church and The E.U.B. Church. He ministered as pastor of congregations in LOUISVILLE, Ky.; Terre Haute and Elkhart, Ind.

Sixteen years as Executive Secretary of the Board of Christian Education followed his service in the parish ministry. In 1934 he was elected bishop and quadrennially thereafter was re-elected by general conference until his retirement in 1954. He died in ST. PAUL, Minn., Feb. 2, 1966.

As pastor, educator and bishop he prosecuted his vocation with zeal, sincerity and joyous faith in God. His diligent efforts as a preacher, expounding the Word of God which he loved, were illuminating and dynamic and persuasive. He promoted programs of Christian Education which enhanced that cause at all levels of denominational life. He rendered inestimable service with his painstaking editorial work in the preparation and publication of successive denominational Disciplines.

PRAIRIE VILLAGE, KANSAS, U.S.A., Asbury Church, is located in a rapidly growing suburban area in Kansas City. Founded in October 1952, under the part-time direction of Mills M. Anderson, the first full-time minister, Al Hager was appointed in 1955 at which time the church moved into its first unit or educational building. Asbury Church has now completed its facilities with a sanctuary, educational building, office-educational wing, and chapel unit. Its membership in 1970 was 2,575.

Asbury Church has been a pioneer in the small group movement. The life of the church is honeycombed with prayer groups, research groups, skeptic groups, and spiritual life encounter groups.

Asbury Church began the one-year lay-missionary program to the Inner-City in 1962-64, which was later adopted as the program of the 1964 GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The church is now in the process of developing a Clinical Pastoral Training program. It has a relationship to ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in terms of its supervisory capacity of seminary students in the life of the local church.

The original two-part saddlebag Bibles of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY are owned and displayed in a special glass case at Asbury Church.

PRATHER'S MEETINGHOUSE in Iredell County, N. C. was organized before 1800. FRANCIS ASBURY visited it in 1797 and 1799, referring to it the first time as "the church in the Forks of the Yadkin," and the second time as "Prather's Meetinghouse." Land for the church was given by Bazil Prather in a deed dated 1800, as he, his family, and some neighbors were moving to southern INDIANA in which locality he became a leader in early Methodism. The name of Prather's Meetinghouse was changed to Mt. Bethel, and it continues as a work on the Harmony Charge, Statesville District. In 1969 Mt. Bethel reported fifty-six members and property valued at $20,695.

PRATT, M. A. RUGBY (1875-1946), New Zealand minister, was born in Gisborne, New Zealand, but grew up in Tasmania. He served as a home missionary, entered the theological college in Melbourne, and then came to New Zealand. For twenty-five years he was a circuit minister and was known as a gifted organizer and also as a close and earnest student. In 1927 he began a term of nineteen years as connexional secretary, and during this time he considerably enlarged the scope of the service rendered by various departments to the church. In 1923, he visited Tonga and helped to reunite the church there in a spirit of harmony. He was keenly interested in the movement for Bible-in-schools and prohibition. He wrote Pioneering Days in Southern Maoriland (London: Epworth Press, 1932), and was a fellow of the Royal Historical Society. He died in Christchurch on March 6, 1946.

PRAYER. (See WORSHIP.)

PRAYER MEETINGS which began in early Methodism as informal gatherings of Christians, came in time to be in Methodist Churches, especially in those in America, stated, formal mid-week evening services. Some historians trace the origin of Methodism to a prayer meeting group (the HOLY CLUB), in which there were earnest inquirers after a more complete Christian life. The GENERAL RULES of The United Methodist Church state in their introduction, "In the latter end of the year 1739 eight or ten persons came to Mr. Wesley, in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired, as did two or three more the next day, that he would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That he might have more time for this great work, he appointed a day when they might all come together, which from thenceforward they did every week, namely, on Thursday, in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their numbers increased daily), he gave those advices from time to time which he judged most needful for them, and they always concluded their meetings with prayer suited to their several necessities." (Discipline, UMC, 1968.)

Wesley himself indicated that this was "the rise of the United Society first in Europe and then in America." The Methodist societies at first met apart from regular church hours for their preaching services, and also in general for their prayer services.

After organization of the M.E. Church in America, CLASS MEETINGS and prayer meetings continued of course to be held, though by now regular Sunday preaching services had begun. However, there grew in local churches as they were established at first the custom and then the rule to have a mid-week evening prayer service. This came to be on Thursday evening over a large section of the church, especially in the North, while Wednesday evening came to be the usual time in the South. Prayer meetings proved to be a great religious service to the church, as in them not only older members were expected and did take part but younger ones also frequently commenced publicly the exercise of their gifts and leadership in prayer and worship.

As the prayer meeting was held other than at the regular church service period, and was unknown in the older liturgical churches as a formal part of the church's program, Methodists were considered by some to be innovators and pioneers in thus dignifying a service of worship apart from the regular ordinances of the church. "In the United States and especially on its frontier where there was no ritualistic established church to preserve the 'dead forms,' the conventional means of grace and worship had little chance in competition with the prayer meeting and the revival." (Bucke, III, 610.) The same authority says that Philip Schaff was more horrified at the liturgical, than at the intellectual and doctrinal state of Methodism in America when he said, "In worship, Methodism is not satisfied with the usual divinely ordained means of grace. It really little understands the use of the Sacraments. . . . It has far more confidence in subjective means and exciting impressions, than in the more quiet and unobserved but surer work of the old church system of educational religion." (ibid.) Schaff further states that he had been prepared to recommend that the formalized churches of Germany consider the adaptation of the prayer meeting to their needs, but after he came to America and saw the usual prayer meeting in action, he was not so impressed.

During the last half of the nineteenth century, the prayer meeting as an institution of Methodist Church life grew in importance, especially after class meetings as such had begun to die away. As travel became easier and the whole congregation could be centered about each individual church, it was easier to gather the congregation together for a mid-week prayer meeting than to continue to depend upon scattered classes as had been the case in early pioneer days, when Methodist families were separated—sometimes at a considerable distance—from each other. The prayer meeting thus came into rather full flower late in the nineteenth century, and Bishop SIMPSON says it was ". . . of great religious service to the church. . . . It has often been observed that wherever a genuine revival has prevailed the social means of grace have also more or less revived, and prayer meetings especially are at once established."

Methodism in America influenced other evangelical denominations with its prayer meetings, and these also adopted the prayer meeting plan on a nation-wide scale. However, with the increasing complexity and tensions of life which have come about toward the middle of the twentieth century, prayer meetings have declined greatly in influence, and indeed in many places have been entirely discontinued. Nevertheless, the Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church still names as one of the duties of the pastor in charge "to hold or appoint prayer meetings, love feasts, and watch night meetings, wherever advisable."

Certain ministers make a feature of their prayer meeting services, and many are known to succeed well in conducting this type of worship. Others, especially in large churches, have discontinued the formal weekly prayer meeting, though encouraging local groups and organizations of the church to meet for prayer and worship in connection with their other duties.

PREACHING. British Methodism. One reason for the success of the eighteenth-century evangelical revival was a change in pulpit style. GEORGE WHITEFIELD and JOHN WESLEY and their imitators dropped the rather impersonal style which had developed in the time of Tillotson, and instead made a direct assault on the minds and feelings of their hearers, seeking to convert them on the spot. Simplicity returned: Wesley constantly advised his preachers to speak in the language of the common people.

At least one reason for this was that eighteenth century Methodist preachers often spoke in the open air, where elaborate periods and over-subtlety or argument were wasted. Open-air preaching was a novelty in the period; John Wesley began to preach outdoors when he was denied the use of the Anglican pulpits; much street preaching took place in the effort to form new societies in places where there was no Methodist building available; in the early nineteenth century the tradition was continued by the BIBLE CHRISTIANS and the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS who imitated the American CAMP MEETING, and spoke to country audiences from farm-carts in the fields; HUGH BOURNE stressed the importance of proclaiming the Gospel in the street, in order that those who refused to come to the chapels should have heard it; belief in the value of "open-air evangelism," as it is now often called, has remained even in twentieth century British Methodism. Nevertheless, most Methodist sermons have been preached indoors, in cottages as well as chapels, and the best eighteenth century Methodist preachers revived the Puritan tradition of preaching, in which the preacher developed his own spiritual experience for the spiritual benefit of his congregation. The eighteenth century sermon often lasted more than an hour; the shorter sermon seems to have come in the later nineteenth century, when HUGH PRICE HUGHES often spoke for about twenty minutes. Between 1791 and 1860 the style of Methodist preaching degenerated, often became very florid (cf. MORLEY PUNSHON). The reasons for the change remain obscure, but certainly early nineteenth century Methodist preachers suffered from their efforts at self-improvement. Thus, in An Essay on the Christian Ministry (1828), by Jonathan Edmundson, written as a guide to young preachers before the start of theological colleges, the author spoke of the necessity of studying rhetoric, which "will enrich your style, enable you to deliver your discourses with gracefulness, and fix the attention of your hearers." Edmundson recommended Claude on the Composition of the Sermon (this was probably the influence of the Anglican Evangelical Charles Simeon, who popularized the book in the Church of England); and Gibbon's Rhetoric: "Gibbon's Rhetoric claims your first attention. He gives you a clear account of the tropes and figures in their origin and powers; with a variety of rules to escape errors and blemishes and to attain propriety and elegance in composition. Examine his work with care, copy all his definitions, and commit them to memory."

The reaction against this tradition was part of the FORWARD MOVEMENT from about 1880. Hugh Price Hughes, SAMUEL COLLIER, LUKE WISEMAN, and others built up large popular audiences by a return to more direct, simple preaching; they also widened the scope of the pulpit, speaking on social and political themes more often than had been customary in the past. A modified version of the rhetorical tradition continued in WILLIAM WATKINSON and F. W. MACDONALD. At the close of the nineteenth century the day of the popular preacher reached its zenith; leading Methodist preachers had congregations which sometimes exceeded two thousand. At the same time thousands of Methodist ministerial and lay preachers continued to deliver sermons of a biblical and practical kind which would have seemed familiar in the eighteenth century. In the twentieth century the preacher's prestige and audience declined. Biblical criticism affected the situation deeply. The rhetorical tradition became rarer in a climate which grew more pragmatic and doubtful of authority. W. E. SANGSTER was the most recent Methodist in this tradition; he also wrote much on the technique of preaching. DONALD SOPER continued the tradition of commenting on social and political affairs. It was often said in the early 1960's, however, that the day of the popular preacher had ended. Television was replacing the church service as the preacher's medium of contact with society in general; it is too early to say how successfully Methodism would adapt to this new opportunity.

American Methodism. The establishment of Methodist Societies in America dates from the preaching of PHILIP EMBURY and Captain THOMAS WEBB in NEW YORK in 1766, and from JESSE LEE's work on the pioneer circuit in VIRGINIA in 1789. ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, an Irish immigrant itinerating in MARYLAND, DELAWARE, PENNSYLVANIA, and VIRGINIA, 1773-75, called forth the first native American preachers: PHILIP GATCH, FREEBORN GARRETTSON, and WILLIAM WATTERS. From the preaching of such devoted men, unordained and largely untrained, grew the Methodism which moved forward with the earliest settlers on every advancing frontier.

Until late in the nineteenth century, this preaching was almost exclusively evangelistic, designed to foster the three steps commonly accepted as structural to salvation—awakening, JUSTIFICATION, and SANCTIFICATION. The first two steps supplied the objective of preaching in mixed gatherings of believers and unbelievers; the last provided the substance of sermons at LOVE FEASTS and other more intimate services of the faithful. The preaching was biblical in method; the preacher was expected to "take a text" and to base both the structure and content of his message upon it. Addresses which did not meet this qualification were carefully designated "exhortations" or "discourses" to differentiate them from sermons.

Such preaching led to great revivals such as developed in Virginia in the years around 1772. The Virginia revival was traceable to the preaching of Devereux Jarrett, a minister of the Established Church who, having gone to England to be ordained, had come under the influence of JOHN WESLEY. Remaining in the Established Church, he preached in a manner largely Methodist in doctrine and spirit. These frontier revivals produced the "sacramental meeting," in which preaching continued daily for weeks on end and in which preachers became adept at reaching crowds of 10,000 or more. Following the revival of 1797-1805, the CAMP MEETING, a western development of the "sacramental meeting," achieved such popularity that by 1812 Methodists were holding at least 400 such meetings annually. Although there were extravagant emotional outbursts, these were discouraged by the circuit preachers, as by John Wesley and FRANCIS ASBURY before them.

Early American Methodist preaching was almost entirely the work of circuit riders, many of whom were assigned to territories requiring five or six weeks of continuous travel and daily preaching to cover. In 1803 a preacher was given the State of ILLINOIS as his charge; in 1806 another was assigned simply to MISSOURI. In such a ministry Francis Asbury traveled 270,000 miles and preached more than 16,000 sermons; on the East Jersey circuit, near the turn of the nineteenth century, EZEKIEL COOPER preached 345 times in a single year. In Illinois, at the same period, PETER CARTWRIGHT won a reputation for his witty, picturesque, resourceful extempore preaching and for his "muscular evangelism"—equally ready to struggle for a man's soul or to beat him in a fight if he interfered with the free expression of the gospel. Supplementing the circuit riders, frontier farmers, serving as LOCAL PREACHERS, shepherded congregations between circuit visits, or gathered the initial congregation in advance of the coming of the itinerant preacher.

With little formal schooling, these early preachers were uneducated only in the sense that Abraham Lincoln was uneducated, as WILLIAM WARREN SWEET observed. Carrying their few books in their saddlebags, they studied as they rode. Preaching his way around a circuit so far-flung that a dozen sermons a year would have guarded amply against repetition to the same congregation, Ezekiel Cooper recorded in his journal the use of seventy-three different texts in a single year. The outlines in his journal show a remarkable penetration in exegesis and an inventive variety in treatment. It was not until 1816 that the GENERAL CONFERENCE prescribed a course of study in which presiding elders were to supervise candidates for the ministry. Yet by 1878 the frontier had produced, in MATTHEW SIMPSON, a national figure known for his eloquence, who made a worthy contribution to the distinguished Lyman Beecher Lectureship in preaching.

Proclamation of CHRISTIAN PERFECTION declined after 1840, as the church found a more established life in cities and towns, with a somewhat more formal worship. In protest, organized emphasis on "holiness" was promoted in many pulpits. A National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness, founded in 1867, had its principal strength among Methodists. A "holiness" revival swept considerable areas in 1880. Preaching tended to divide between this emphasis and the growing modernism, but the "holiness" movement left a limited influence within the church as it gave its strength to the establishment of separate denominational bodies devoted to this doctrine.

The opening of the twentieth century found a social message taking its place in Methodist pulpits, led by the notable preaching of such men as HERBERT WELCH, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, FRANK MASON NORTH, and HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL. It was reflected in the adoption of the first SOCIAL CREED of the Church in 1908. In 1905-1906 Charles Reynolds Brown delivered his first series of Lyman Beecher lectures, devoting them to The Social Message of the Modern Pulpit. Within the span of a generation, other Methodists called to that important homiletic forum took up similar themes: Francis J. McConnell treating The Prophetic Ministry; G. BROMLEY OXNAM, Preaching in A Revolutionary Age; and ERNEST FREMONT TITTLE, Jesus After Nineteen Centuries, with a stress—always present in Tittle's preaching—on the social impact of Jesus. Such preaching fostered a new social conscience in the church.

With the development of electronic mass media, preaching took to the airways. RALPH W. SOCKMAN's long ministry in the National Radio Pulpit dramatized the use of that medium by great numbers of preachers across the country, who preached regularly through more local facilities. Led by the work of the TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION (TRAFICO), ministers in the 1960's were learning to use the more difficult medium of television.

After a generation in which preaching had been mostly topical, the 1950's and 1960's saw the return of an emphasis on biblical preaching in theological seminaries; with the growing concern for the hermeneutic problem in the theological world there were indications that strong biblical preaching might dominate the pulpits of the final third of the twentieth century.

PREDIGERSEMINAR (The Theological Seminary of the United Methodist Church of Germany) is at Frankfurt/Main. Here in 1968 the Predigerseminar der Methodistenkirche and the Predigerseminar der Evangelischen Gemeinschaft (EUB Church) in Reutlingen were united.

The Predigerseminar der Methodistenkirche was opened in 1858 by L. S. JACOBY at BREMEN. The first students were two young Germans and one Swiss who felt the call to preach. After almost ten years in cramped quarters, the seminary was transferred to Frankfurt. The new building was made possible by a gift of $25,000 by the New York textile merchant, John T. Martin, after whom the school was named "Martins Mission Anstalt." Frankfurt was chosen because of its central geographical position.

The last years of the nineteenth century proved fruitful for the seminary, which served the needs of a growing Methodism well. The faculty included German, Swiss, and American professors. W. F. WARREN served on the faculty from 1861-66 and went to BOSTON UNIVERSITY in the United States; his successor was J. F. HURST (1866-71), later to become bishop in the United States and the author of valuable publications. While the Frankfurt theological seminary was serving the needs of the M.E. Church, another theological school was training Wesleyan Methodist ministers in south GERMANY. When the Methodisms of American and British background were amalgamated (1897), the seminary in Frankfurt became the training center for all Methodist ministers. A fine new building was completed in 1914, but before it could be dedicated, the First World War broke out. German theological students were drafted into the army; only the Swiss men temporarily continued their work. A major part of the building was commandeered for a military hospital. Taking on new life in 1920, the seminary began one of its most fruitful decades. The new president, F. H. OTTO MELLE, was a superb administrator. Enrollments rose from twenty-three in 1920 to a high of eighty-eight in 1928. During this period the school trained not only Germans, Swiss, and Austrians, as it still does, but Bulgarians, Hungarians, Estonians, Finns, Lithuanians, Latvians, and Yugoslavs. There was even a Chinese graduate student. There have been exchange students also from ARGENTINA, the United States, JAPAN, Crete, and Great Britain in recent years.

Perhaps the seminary's most difficult period began in 1933 with the ascendancy of Hitler and the Nazis. Young men facing two years of army duty could make no plans for seminary training, and the theological course had to be shortened to four years. Apart from three men who did not become ministers, all students succeeded in holding to the church's viewpoint on public life and pastoral care. In 1936, Melle was elected the first German Methodist bishop; his successor at the seminary became J. W. E. SOMMER. Then came 1939 and war. After a few months the seminary found itself on an uncertain basis. Students attended only between campaigns when their military service permitted. Medical and dental military units took over some of the seminary rooms, thus safeguarding it from Gestapo control. Some damage was done to the buildings. After the war reconstruction proceeded slowly. Sommer having been elected a bishop in 1946, FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH succeeded him as president. The seminary recovered with the help of American Methodist gifts. Enrollment reached fifty-four in 1951. Then in 1952 another blow fell. The seminary was cut off from serving the forty-five percent of German Methodists in the Eastern zone, as it had previously been cut off from Methodists in the Balkans. The East-zone Methodists, however, were able to set up their own theological school at Bad Klosterlausnitz, now under the leadership of Direktor Hans Witzel. Here both Methodist and EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN students are trained. In 1952 Bishop Sommer died, and Wunderlich was elected to the episcopacy. In August 1953, C. ERNST SOMMER, son of the late bishop, became president of the seminary. In May 1968 C. E. Sommer was elected the first bishop of the United Methodist Church in Germany.

Predigerseminar der Evangelischen Gemeinschaft (EUB Church) in Reutlingen was opened July 25, 1877. The first director was John Kaechele. Until 1905 the attics of the Ebenezer-Church were used as classrooms and dormitories. Kaechele was succeeded by G. Heinmiller (1886-91). In 1891 John Schempp, Sr. was elected director. The character of the theological school was very much influenced by him during his almost thirty years of leadership. In 1905 a big and modern building was erected with large classrooms, library, dormitories for the students, flats for the teachers and adjoining rooms. When the building was dedicated in December 1905 the lord mayor declared the seminary on a hill overlooking the city to be an embellishment of Reutlingen, the old Freetown of the Reich. The seminary trained the ministers of the Annual Conferences of Germany and SWITZERLAND and during some years after the First World War, also Estonians and Lithuanians. The most fruitful time of the school was during the years 1925-30 when fifty students were enrolled. During the Second World War the seminary was occupied for military purposes but in 1946 it was reopened under the directorship of John Schempp, Jr. with six students. In 1952 he was succeeded by Reinhold Kuecklich. With the help of the mother-church in the U.S.A. the buildings were enlarged and the enrollment was raised to thirty-four students. After 1954 the students of the German Democratic Republic had to do their studies in the east. Together with The Methodist Church, a new seminary in Klosterlausnitz was founded. When Kuecklich retired in 1966, Karl Steckel was elected director of the seminary in Reutlingen.

After several years of preparation and careful deliberations together at the union of the E.U.B. Church and The Methodist Church, the two seminaries were united, Sept. 15, 1968, in Frankfurt/Main. Karl Steckel was elected the new president. There were forty-one students and six full-time professors of whom two were Swiss. As a united seminary, the Frankfurt theological school has moved expectantly into its second century, ministering and witnessing to the indestructibility of the Christian faith, so that young men shall go forth, trained to meet every need a modern minister may encounter, and strengthened in their faith and their sense of divine calling.

KARL STECKEL

PRESCOTT, C. J. (1857-1946), able scholar and educator, was born at Bridport, England, the son of a Wesleyan minister. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL where he passed through the usual six years course, but being Head Boy was allowed to remain two additional years.

He won the Dux and Arithmetic Medals twice, and twice gained the Medal for Greek Testament. He passed the Junior Oxford Local Examination Twice and subsequently gained a scholarship for four years.

In 1873 he proceeded to Worcester College, OXFORD, where he completed his course in 1880, taking his B.A. degree and gaining honors in Mathematics. He received his M.A. degree in 1893.

He was accepted as a candidate for the ministry and appointed assistant tutor at HANDSWORTH THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION.

In 1882 he accepted an invitation to join the Conference in NEW SOUTH WALES and was stationed at PARANATTIA for three years, during which time he acted as tutor in Classics and General Literature at the Provisional Theological Institution at Stanmore.

In 1886 he was appointed Headmaster of the Methodist Ladies' College at Burwood and in 1900 was made Headmaster at Newington College, Stanmore, which position he held until his retirement.

In 1910 he was elected President of the New South Wales Conference.

When the new Methodist Hymn Book was under revision he gave valuable service as a member of the Revision Committee.

In 1912 he was honored with the D.D. degree by EMORY UNIVERSITY, U.S.A.

He was the author of three books: Romance of a School, Matters for Methodists, and Methodist Churchmanship—Plaint and Plea.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

PRESIDING ELDER. (See SUPERINTENDENT.)

PRESS AND INFORMATION SERVICE, METHODIST (British) was formed as a result of a decision by the 1948 British Conference. Its function is to provide an authoritative channel of communication with the press when they are seeking information and guidance about Methodist affairs. It is responsible for providing newspapers with news about Methodism and with the views expressed by organizations of the church and its leaders on questions of current interest. The service is under the general direction of the CONNEXIONAL EDITOR, who presents its report to Conference, but a lay journalist carries out the actual work to ensure that matter submitted conforms to newspaper needs.

TOM GOODALL

PREST, CHARLES (1806-1875), British Wesleyan Methodist, had great influence in the organization of Wesleyanism after the mid-nineteenth century disputes. He was born on Oct. 16, 1806, at Bath, Somerset, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1829. President of the Conference in 1862, he is best known for his reorganization and extension of Home Missions during the last eighteen years of his life. He was also secretary of the COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES for nineteen years. As treasurer of the Schools' Fund, he was active in promoting the building of the new KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. He established district missionaries and encouraged the appointment of chaplains to the forces. He died at Lee, Kent, on Aug. 25, 1875.

JOHN KENT

PRETTYMAN, FORREST JOHNSTON (1860-1945), American minister and chaplain of the U.S. Senate during the Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson administrations, was born at Brookeville, Md., on April 7, 1860. His father, E. Barrett Prettyman, had been Secretary of Education of MARYLAND, and his mother was Lydia (Forrest) Prettyman. He was educated at the Rockville (Maryland) Academy, at St. John's College at Annapolis, and in part at Washington and Lee University. RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE conferred upon him the D.D. degree later on in life.

On Oct. 17, 1888, he married Elizabeth R. Stonestreet, and to them were born two sons and two daughters, E. Barrett, Edith S., Charles W. and Martha B. The older son is Judge E. Barrett Prettyman, of the Fifth Circuit of the Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. Prettyman served as pastor in the Old BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (MES) including St. Paul in BALTIMORE; Lexington, Va.; Martinsburg, W. Va.; Staunton, Va.; WASHINGTON, D.C. at Mount Vernon Place; and at Emory Church; also Trinity Church in Baltimore. He was the presiding elder of the Washington District for some years, and a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, 1906, 1910, and 1930; and a fraternal messenger to the M.P. General Conference of 1912.

Prettyman was a commanding preacher and after serving as chaplain of the Senate from 1913 until the beginning of the Harding administration in 1920, he was transferred to Church Street Church, KNOXVILLE, Tenn., where he served for a time, and then went to the Gastonia Church in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. On his return to the Baltimore Conference, he was assigned to Wilson Memorial Church on St. Charles Avenue, Baltimore, in 1927, and then to Fredericksburg, Va., from which position he retired.

Prettyman had a presence which added distinction to any occasion in which he participated, and especially in the formal, diplomatic and congressional ceremonies and functions in Washington, D.C., he was able to represent his church and its ministry in an urbane, commanding way. He died at Rockville, Md., in the old family home there, on Oct. 12, 1945.

PRICE, CARL FOWLER (1881-1948), American layman, author, musician, organist, hymn composer, lecturer, historian and churchman, was born May 16, 1881, at New Brunswick, N. J. He was the son of Jacob Embury and Anne Bacon Ware Price. He was graduated from Centenary Collegiate Institute in 1898, and from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1902. On April 21, 1905, he married Leila A. Field of East Hampton. She died March 24, 1906. On June 19, 1913, he married Flora Draper Treat of New York. She died Aug. 30, 1919. They had one son, Sherman.

A man of great vitality, Carl Price was interested in, and served, Wesleyan University throughout his life. He helped found the Alumni Association in 1904, and the Wesleyan Alumnus in 1916. He edited a Wesleyan Song Book and wrote Wesleyan's First Century, a 400-page history of the college, in addition to many other articles and songs. In 1932 Wesleyan conferred upon him the honorary M.A. degree in recognition of his distinguished service to the University.

Carl Price served the church in many capacities. He was Secretary of the National Board of the EPWORTH LEAGUE, 1912-24; President of the Methodist Social Union, 1919-21; member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1931; historian of the Methodist Historical Society, 1937-48; author of Who's Who in Methodism in 1916, and an active lay member of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, serving as president of its Laymen's Association for over twenty-five years.

His greatest contribution to the church was in the field of music. Carl Price composed over 200 hymn tunes, as well as cantatas and canticles. He lectured on hymnody at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and at DREW UNIVERSITY. He was co-founder of the Hymn Society of America, serving as its president from 1922-26. He published many books on hymns, music, and worship. Among them are: Music and Hymnody of the Methodist Hymnal, A Year of Hymn Stories, Curiosities of the Hymnal, More Hymn Stories, 101 Methodist Stories, Songs of Life, Hymns of Worship, 101 Hymn Stories, Hymns, Hymnologists and Their Stories. In all he was the author of eleven books, editor of thirty music collections, published thirty-one songs, 200 hymn tunes, cantatas, festival services, booklets, and other miscellany, in addition to over 400 articles which appeared in various church and secular magazines and newspapers. He earned his living as an insurance broker, but his real vocation was church music.

Carl Price died April 12, 1948, following a stroke. He was buried at Kensico Cemetery, Valhalla, N. Y.

PRICE, FREDERICK ADOLPHUS (1879-1966), Methodist missionary and American consul-general of LIBERIA, was born on April 5, 1879, in Barbados, British West Indies. After receiving his early education in Barbados, Frederick Price traveled to the United States for special training in missionary service. After graduating from the Union Missionary Training Institute, BROOKLYN, N. Y., he was recommended by Bishop J. C. HARTZELL for appointment to Liberia. In late 1904 he began his mission service in Harper, Cape Palmas. Working along the Cavalla River, he established many mission schools.

Among the stations begun by Price was Barclayville, which remains today a strong center for Methodism and one of the fine schools in the Methodist system. In 1934 he became district superintendent of the Cape Palmas District and pastor of Mt. Scott Methodist Church, serving also as field treasurer for the Board of Foreign Missions. He served there until his retirement in 1945. His missionary pension he donated each year to the work of the church in Liberia.

Not content with one career of service, he then became a Liberian citizen and was appointed Liberian Consul General to NEW YORK CITY. This appointment included diplomatic assignments in WASHINGTON, D. C., and service on several delegations to the United Nations. After his retirement in 1958 (the second time), Dr. and Mrs. Price (nee Luna A. Jones) returned to Harper, Cape Palmas. Mrs. Price pre-deceased her husband in 1963. He was decorated several times by the Liberian government and his life remains an example of devotion to the service of his fellowman. He died in Monrovia, Liberia, on Jan. 5, 1966.

PRICE, HIRAM (1814-1901), American congressman, banker and railroad president, was born Jan. 10, 1814, in Washington County, Pa. Removing to Mifflin County in 1819 and later to Huntingdon County, Pa., he was educated in local schools. He married Susan Betts in 1834 and they had five children. Price, described as a man "of determined perseverance, inviolate integrity, good business tact, temperate and conscientious," removed to Davenport, Iowa in 1844 and opened a store. He was school fund commissioner, 1847-56, and recorder and treasurer of Scott County, 1848-56. In the early fifties he occupied himself with railroad enterprises, building a railroad from Davenport to Council Bluffs. When Iowa's state bank was established in 1858, he represented the Davenport branch, serving as its president, 1860-65. Price, a Republican Party member, was U.S. Congressman, 1865-69 and 1877-81, and U.S. Commissioner of Indian Affairs, 1881-85.

He was a member of the Dubuque M.E. Church for over fifty-seven years, served as sexton, recording steward, trustee, class leader, and Sunday school superintendent. He was lay delegate of the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE at two GENERAL CONFERENCE sessions and a trustee of Mt. Vernon's Iowa Conference Seminary. Price, an advocate of temperance, organized a Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance in 1848; edited the Temperance Organ for several years; served as President of the "Maine Law Alliance," 1854; spoke on temperance at Iowa's first State Methodist Convention, 1871, and became the National Anti-Saloon League's first president. He died in Washington, D. C.

PRICE, JOHN WATKIN (1870-1951), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Tamaqua, Pa., on Jan. 30, 1870. Price studied three years at Oberlin Academy then at the Christian Training School in Cleveland, Ohio, and the Christian and Missionary Alliance Training School in NEW YORK CITY. While studying in Cleveland, he met Elizabeth Wittman, a Bible student working among the underprivileged of that city. They were married June 18, 1895, and continued evangelistic work together in Cleveland.

Through reading Guinness' book, The Neglected Continent, Price felt definitely called to Brazil. He offered himself and was sent there in May 1896, by the Christian and Missionary Alliance. In 1898, however, he was moved to BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, where he was received into the River Plate Conference of the M.E. Church, and was soon appointed to South Brazil, then a mission of that Conference. He was appointed pastor of the Central Methodist Church in PORTO ALEGRE, capital of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, in May 1899.

Price began expanding the work at once, established three suburban missions, and founded the first EPWORTH LEAGUE in the state. In 1899, when the South Brazil mission was transferred by mutual agreement to the M.E. Church, South, then operating in other areas of Brazil, Price elected to stay in Brazil. He served throughout the years as pastor, presiding elder, and superintendent of the mission. Though his strongest point was mainly in the field of evangelism, he also contributed to education by founding in 1908 the school in Uruguaiana, União Colegio, now Instituto. Later he also taught at Porto Alegre College.

After forty years on the mission field, the Prices retired to DENVER, Colo., and there continued a ministry to the Latin Americans of the area. In all his work everywhere, his wife was an invaluable helper. She was born in Ohio on March 19, 1872, and from the time she was sixteen, dedicated her life to the Lord's work. When John Price asked her if she was willing to go with him to a foreign country, she replied: "If there are souls to save, I'll go with you."

John Price died in Denver on May 21, 1951; and Mrs. Price in Englewood, N. J. (where she had moved to be with her daughter) on June 6, 1962. They were survived by three children—Thomas, a Harvard Ph.D.; Llewellyn, an archeologist; and Elizabeth Gorsuch, who, with her husband, served as a missionary in Brazil for a period. An older daughter, Margaret, had preceded them in death.

The Prices were considered among the most sacrificial and saintly of all missionaries. Mrs. Price's name lives on in an association of ministers' wives in the state of Rio Grande do Sul, named in her honor the Eliza Price Association.

PRICE, JOSEPH CHARLES (1854-1893), American Negro minister and educator, was born in Elizabeth City, N. C., on Feb. 10, 1854. His father was a slave, but Price followed the condition of his mother who was free born. Educated at first in freedmen's schools, Price studied for a time at Shaw University (Raleigh, N. C.) where he was converted during a revival. In 1875 he was licensed to preach in the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH. He began formal preparation for the ministry at Lincoln University in PENNSYLVANIA where he graduated in classics in 1879. Prior to the completion of his theological training there in 1881, Price was ordained elder. In 1880 he served for the first of four times as a delegate to the A.M.E. Zion General Conference.

While Price was abroad to attend the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at LONDON in 1881, he toured Great Britain to raise funds for his church's Zion Wesley Institute in Salisbury, N. C. After obtaining pledges for nearly $10,000, he returned to America to assume the presidency of the school which was renamed to honor David Livingstone. During the next decade Price attracted national attention for his creative leadership in Negro education, which, he contended, should consist of liberal arts instruction as well as industrial training. He was largely responsible for establishing LIVINGSTONE's reputation as the first successful college in America founded, owned and manned by Negroes.

A nationally famous preacher and skilled orator, Price campaigned in behalf of prohibition and of racial justice. In 1890 the Afro-American National League, a Negro civil rights organization, named him its first president. In ecclesiastical affairs he earnestly supported a merger between the A.M.E. and A.M.E. Zion Churches. At the peak of his career Price was afflicted with Bright's disease to which he succumbed on Oct. 25, 1893 at his home in Salisbury.

PRICE, RICHARD NYE (1830-1923), American minister and historian of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE, was born at Elk Garden, Va., on July 30, 1830. He was educated at EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, from which he received the B.A. and M.A. degrees and the honorary D.D. degree.

He joined the Holston Conference in 1850 and with the exception of one year's location he served continuously until his retirement in 1921. He held every type of appointment in the conference: circuit, junior preacher, presiding elder, conference secretary, college professor and president, editor of the conference paper, and chaplain in two wars.

He married Anne Edgeworth Vance of Marshall, N. C., on May 8, 1855, and was the father of ten children.

Price is best known as the author of Holston Methodism, a history in five volumes which was published in 1908 after ten years of labor devoted to its preparations.

He died at Morristown, Tenn., on Feb. 7, 1923, and was buried there. He was "the oldest in years and longest in ministerial service" in the conference, having been a preacher seventy-three years, including three years as a local preacher.

PRICHARD, JESSE ELI (1880-1957), American M.P. minister and administrator, was born on Nov. 29, 1880, in Asheboro, N. C. He was the son of Isaiah Franklin and Nancy Ellen Conner Prichard. Upon graduation from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in 1909, he enrolled in WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, where he received the B.D. degree in 1912. He was accepted on trial in the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church in November 1911, and in November of the following year was ordained an elder and assigned to Halifax Circuit, which he served until 1915. He afterward served churches in NORTH CAROLINA as follows: Thomasville (1915-1916); Burlington (1916-1921); Henderson (1921-1926); Asheboro (1926-1931); WINSTON-SALEM (1931-1934; 1940-1941); GREENSBORO (1934-1938); Ramseur (1941-1945); and Mocksville (1945-1946).

In 1938 he became President of the North Carolina Conference of the M.P. Church, a position he held for two years. He was a member of the General Board of Education of his Church from 1924-1928 and served that body as Recording Secretary. In 1932 Western Maryland College conferred on him the D.D. Degree. He served for a number of years as a trustee of HIGH POINT COLLEGE and for twelve years as a trustee of the Methodist Children's Home of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in Winston-Salem. From 1934-1936 he was editor of The Methodist Protestant Herald, published at Greensboro, N. C., the official church paper for the North Carolina Conference.

Prichard was a delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M.P. Church, a delegate to the Uniting Conference in 1939, and a delegate to the first SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

On Dec. 12, 1912, he married Laura Vestal of Siler City, N. C. Following his retirement in 1946, Prichard lived in Asheboro until his death on Aug. 10, 1957. He is buried in Asheboro City Cemetery.

Who's Who in Methodism, 1952. RALPH HARDEE RIVES

PRIMITIVE METHODISM, British Methodist denomination (1811-1932), was formed in 1811 by the coalescing of the CAMP MEETING METHODISTS and the COLESWITES, both groups representative of the revivalism which marked the early nineteenth century. The beginnings were set in 1800, on the borders of Staffordshire and Cheshire, when HUGH BOURNE, a moorland carpenter, was working in the region. Converted three years before, he became concerned for the conversion of his cousin, Daniel Shubotham, of HARRISEAHEAD, to whom he gave a written account of his own conversion. Shubotham's spiritual deliverance soon followed, as also that of a collier, Mathias Bayley. By this "conversation-preaching" the work spread, and at HARRISEAHEAD a chapel was built. This revival, though nominally Wesleyan Methodist, went on without the recognition or direction of the Wesleyan Methodist authorities, though in 1802 the chapel and its associated classes were taken over by the Burslem Circuit. A second revival in 1804 arose at Tunstall, and in the Burslem Circuit, largely through a visit to Congleton by a revivalist group from Stockport. An important result was the conversion of WILLIAM CLOWES, a skilled potter who rapidly growing in Christian understanding, began evangelistic work.

The Harriseahead movement found vigorous expression in a CAMP MEETING held on MOW COP on May 31, 1807. Earlier, in 1805, a somewhat eccentric evangelist from America, LORENZO DOW, had labored in South Lancashire and East Cheshire. His utterances had often contained references to the camp meetings begun in America in 1799, and on a visit to Harriseahead he stressed this. Later, at Congleton, in April, 1807, Bourne bought certain pamphlets relating to these American meetings. Already Bourne had planned for a camp meeting to be held at Norton-le-Moors in August 1807, in order to counteract the evils of the local holidays or "wakes," but the Harriseahead people pressed to have "a day's praying on Mow." Official Wesleyan Methodist opposition began to appear on the one hand from the Burslem Circuit, and on the other from a master potter who declared camp meetings to be illegal. A second meeting was however held on Mow Cop on July 19, 1807.

Of these early camp meetings, however, the third held at Norton-le-Moors on August 25, is historically the most important, because the Liverpool Wesleyan Conference of 1807 had pronounced adversely upon such enterprises, and the preachers of the Burslem Circuit implemented the decision locally, with the result that supporters diminished in number. As Bourne was convinced as to the rightness of his judgment, the meeting was duly held and pronounced successful. The direct consequence was his expulsion from the Wesleyan society in 1808. Without complaint he continued his work on evangelization, and the following year engaged JAMES CRAWFOOT as an itinerant evangelist to labor in East Cheshire and Staffordshire. These "Camp Meeting Methodists" were not as yet a distinct community but rather a mission band whose labors were auxiliary to the regular churches. Because the Burslem Circuit refused to take over a new society at Stanley, which had been brought into being by their labors, by March, 1810, the Camp Meeting Methodists came to a separate existence. Written plans were now prepared, and these show some interchange between INDEPENDENT METHODISTS and the Camp Meeting Methodists.

In 1810, William Clowes was deprived of his Wesleyan Methodist membership. Many followed his leadership; and a home for those thus unchurched was found in the house of one Mr. Smith of Tunstall, where for some two years preaching services had been held. So this "house-church" soon became the center of a small circuit, and preparations were made for the building of a chapel at Tunstall. This new group became known as the "Clowesites," and before the opening of the Tunstall chapel they resolved to make common cause with the Camp Meeting Methodists. A joint meeting was held on May 30, 1811, at which union was agreed upon and tickets of membership were printed. In July, 1811, it was further decided that Crawfoot and Clowes should be separated as preachers and be supported by the contributions of the members of the new denomination, now about 200 in number. At a further meeting on February 13, 1812, the name of the new denomination was determined: "The Society of the Primitive Methodists." The source of the name appears to be in the farewell address given by JOHN WESLEY to the preachers of the Chester Circuit in 1790, when, pleading for a ministry of universal evangelism, he declared: "If you have deviated from the old usage, I have not: I still remain a primitive Methodist." These words, recalled by Crawfoot, who had heard Wesley speak, determined the name. They were sometimes called "Ranters" because of their enthusiastic evangelism.

Owing partly to the social conditions of the time and partly to the sparse population of the region, the new denomination did not spread rapidly or widely, and until 1816 it was confined to the Tunstall Circuit. An issue now arose as to whether the policy should be one of consolidation or extension. The majority favored consolidation. Chapels were built, and Bourne became responsible in 1814 for framing regulations. The "Tunstall Nonmission Law" was the name given to the prevailing policy by those who disagreed, among them Bourne himself. Before long, however, the policy of extension reasserted itself, and more camp meetings were held in other counties, bringing spiritual revival especially in Nottinghamshire and beyond. Bourne became general superintendent of the connection and traveled widely. In 1819 Clowes entered Hull and began extension northward, later to be followed by a mission to Cornwall and the West Country. In 1820 the first conference was held in Hull, constituted of representatives from the circuits in the proportion of two laymen to one minister. By this time the membership of the new denomination had risen to 7,842; by 1824 it was 33,507.

The period 1825-28 proved to be a time of crisis, largely owing to the rapidity of growth. Through the courage and insight of Bourne a process of pruning took place. The following years were marked by geographical extension, so that by 1842 the membership had risen to nearly 80,000, with 500 traveling preachers and more than 1,200 chapels. This period of missionary extension was marked by much heroism, for the itinerant preachers had often to contend with hostility and persecution. A further feature in this process of evangelization was the extent to which women itinerant preachers shared in the work.

The decade 1843-53 was a period of transition. The superannuation of Bourne and Clowes in 1842 led to new leadership and far-reaching changes. The Connectional Book Room was moved to LONDON, and a proposal for a general missionary committee moved in the direction of greater coordination of the circuits, the period of circuit predominance gradually giving way to more centralization in missionary enterprise.

The death of the first leaders—Clowes died in 1851 and Bourne soon afterward in 1852—brought the beginning of the middle period of the denomination's history. By 1853 there were ten districts, and each tended to foster its own line of development. The annual District Meeting assumed great importance, and to no small measure at the expense of the overall Conference. Preachers were usually stationed within each district, the boundaries of which were rigidly held. This "districtism" made for an originality which brought denominational enrichment. The Hull District led the way in a bolder policy in chapel building; the Norwich District in overseas missions; the Sunderland and Manchester Districts in ministerial education; the Leeds District in Sunday school advance.

By the Jubilee year of the denomination in 1860 the connection reached a membership of 132,114; by 1875 it rose to 165,410, but the progress was not an uninterrupted one. The years 1852-55 were marked by decreases, largely due, however, to external causes including emigration, the Crimean War, and the FLY SHEETS controversy (1844-57) in Wesleyan Methodism.

Eventually "districtism" was bound to disappear, not least through a regulation of 1879 which encouraged circuit ministerial invitation irrespective of district boundaries. Further a new cohesion in Church polity upon a presbyterian basis was developing, and before the end of the century a more unified denomination had emerged. This is symbolized by the use of the word "Church" instead of "connexion" in the Consolidated Minutes, the codified laws of the denomination.

One feature of development was the expansion overseas. As far back as the Conference of 1820 in the Lincolnshire village of Scotter, it was decided to send a mission to the United States. In 1843 colonial missions were begun in AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND. In 1870 missionaries landed in West Africa. In 1889 missions were begun in South Central Africa and in Southern Nigeria.

The last quarter of the nineteenth century saw great improvement in the general pattern and structure of church administration. Legislation regarding the safeguarding of chapel property was established. There was an expansion of interest in social questions, particularly in regard to London and the provincial centers of population. Orphanages were established. Particular emphasis was given to the uplifting of the working classes, and the trade-union movement derived many of its early leaders from the ranks of the local preachers especially in Northern England and in East Anglia. As early as 1832—under the deep conviction of Bourne—the Conference had emphasized the importance of the formation of temperance societies, and this strong temperance sentiment persisted throughout the denomination.

As early as the middle of the century some concern had been expressed regarding ministerial education, but it was not until 1865 that Elmfield House, in York, was acquired for the double purpose of providing a school for boys and also accommodation for ministerial training. In 1869, however, the latter arrangement was superseded by the purchase of a building in Sunderland for a separate theological institute. In 1886 the Theological College in MANCHESTER was opened, eventually to be known as Hartley College, its name chosen in acknowledgment of the two extensions (1897 and 1906) through the munificence of WILLIAM HARTLEY, and which was associated with the work of A. S. PEAKE, a biblical scholar of international reputation. Elmfield continued as a school for boys and, alongside it, a later foundation (1882) was Bourne College, on the outskirts of BIRMINGHAM.

At the time of the centenary of the denomination in 1907 a hundred thousand people attended the Centenary Camp Meeting on Mow Cop, and a fund of more than £270,000 was raised for the evangelistic, educational and social work. The spiritual results, tabulated in terms of addition to membership were, however, disappointing, though these were lean years for all churches in the land.

The 1914 war inevitably brought problems to Primitive Methodism, not least problems of conscience to many individuals, for Primitive Methodism has been perhaps the most pronouncedly pacifist of all the denominations save the Society of Friends. To meet the needs of the many thousands of Primitive Methodists who had enlisted, the resources of the Church were mobilized, and by the end of the war nearly fifty chaplains were at work in the services.

For some years it had become increasingly clear that some attempt must be made to bring together the differing groups within British Methodism. In 1912 the Wesleyan Conference declared its conviction that serious effort should be made to this end, and in 1917 representatives met to discuss the possibilities; in 1920 a scheme in outline was presented to the three Conferences concerned. By 1925 sanction for such union was sought on the basis of a requirement of seventy-five percent majority vote. The Primitive Methodist Conference secured a ninety-three percent vote, but the Wesleyan Conference fell short of the required majority. Not until 1928 did the latter succeed in fulfilling the condition, but at each intervening Conference the Primitive Methodist vote continued heavily in favor of union. In 1932 the Union was achieved. Into the United Church, Primitive Methodism brought 222,021 members; 1,131 ministers; 12,896 local preachers, 277,792 Sunday school scholars; 4,356 church buildings.

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH (U.S.A.) arrived in the United States by way of migration of laymen from Great Britain. Concern for these members expressed at the 1829 British Conference by the Hull and Tunstall Circuits led to the sending of four missionaries to establish an American mission. Under the joint responsibility of these two circuits, William Knowles and Ruth Watkins from Tunstall Circuit and William Summersides and T. Morris from Hull Circuit sailed for NEW YORK on June 19, 1929. The Tunstall missionaries established work in New York, while the Hull missionaries founded classes at PHILADELPHIA and POTTSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

At the American annual conference, meeting in 1840, it was "resolved that we consider ourselves from this time distinct from and unconnected with the English Conference." An attempt to re-establish ties with the English Conference was made in 1843; and HUGH BOURNE, even though he was over seventy years of age, traveled to the United States as an "Advisor from the English Conference." Relations on an informal basis were re-established, primarily through Bourne's own fatherly status as founder of Primitive Methodism; and with his death all relations ceased. The work continued to grow, although slowly, because of the overwhelming competition of a strongly evangelistic M.E. Church and the continued British-like structure of the Primitive Methodist worship.

Work formed itself very early into three conferences. A general conference was organized in 1889. It became the legislative body for the church, making all rules and regulations in its quadrennial sessions. It also has direct oversight of the general boards: the Foreign Mission Board, the Journal Board, the Publisher, the School of Theology, the Board of Temperance, and the Commission on Chaplains. There are at present four annual conferences: Eastern Wyoming, Schuykill, Pittsburgh, and Western. They provide administrative guidance along with the district and quarterly conferences. The conferences are presided over by a president, as there are no bishops or district superintendents; and laymen are equally represented at all levels.

Mission work is carried on in Guatemala, Kenya, and Brazil. An official organ, The Primitive Methodist Journal, is published monthly. At last report there were approximately 12,000 members in ninety churches.

The Primitive Methodist Church found its way to Canada through the efforts of Mr. William Lawson, a former layman in the Wesleyan Connection in England. Lawson had been expelled from the Connection because of his association with James Johnson, a Primitive Methodist. Lawson joined the Primitive Methodist Church in 1826 and preached in his home town of Bramton. In 1829 he migrated to CANADA and arrived in York (Toronto) on June 11. He gathered a class together and became their leader. In October a meeting home was secured. In 1830, at Lawson's request, William Watkins arrived as the first missionary preacher. Watkins left after a few months because of the weather, and William Summersides was transferred from the United States to take over the work. For the next several years Hull Circuit in England had direct responsibility for the Canadian mission. In 1833 the Niagara Station was set apart from York, and in 1838 the Brampton Station was given an independent status. Josiah Partington and William Lyle were sent from England to enlarge the work. By 1850 the total membership in the struggling church had risen to about 1,500 and nine appointments.

In 1853 the English Conference set the Canadian work apart and the first Canadian Conference met at Brampton, County of Peel. A hymnbook was approved, and plans were laid for a book room and a journal. In 1855 the semi-monthly Christian Journal was begun, and in 1860 the first Book of Discipline was authorized. In 1867 a theological institute was started with Thomas Crompton as tutor.

In 1870 a widespread move to unite all of Canadian Methodism held the attention of the conference. Primitive Methodists by this time were divided into six districts with fifty appointments. Although union was voted down at this conference, it was a continuing issue for future meetings.

In 1883 a plan of union was submitted to the membership and approved by an eighty percent vote. In 1884 final union was accomplished. The Primitive Methodist Church merged with the three other Methodist bodies to become the Methodist Church and thus ceased to exist as a separate body.

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH (1792-1803). Not to be confused with the still existing Primitive Methodist Church founded by LORENZO DOW, this church was the result of the preaching of WILLIAM HAMMETT. It was started by members of the M.E. Church in SOUTH CAROLINA who had responded strongly to Hammett's preaching. Hammett had arrived in South Carolina after having several appointments in Jamaica and St. Christopher where his health had suffered. In 1791 the CHARLESTON congregation requested Hammett's appointment to their church. When ASBURY refused, Hammett developed his following, and they built their own church.

The main characteristic of the new church was its dissent with episcopal authority. The church grew for several years and established sizable congregations in GEORGIA and the Carolinas. A Rev. Meredith formed a large society of Negro members at WILMINGTON, N. C. The church suffered so much under the slipping reputation of its founder, who had difficulty in keeping peaceful relations with his ministers and became a slaveholder and a heavy drinker, that it returned to the M.E. Church soon after the death of its founder in 1803.

PRIMITIVE PHYSICK. JOHN WESLEY's interest in medicine, fostered by wide reading of the available literature, enabled him to meet the desperate need of the poor for inexpensive and sensible guidance in matters of health and sickness. Primitive Physick, written by him and published in 1747, was of prime importance in furthering his purpose.

Wesley's approach to healing was by way of observation and experiment, in contrast to the generally accepted approach of eighteenth-century physicians by way of theory, e.g. Humoral, Brunonian. Wesley incisively castigates such theoretical approach in his Preface.

Primitive Physick defines in alphabetical order a variety of complaints, and applies to each disorder a number of simple remedies. These remedies form a wide selection from the plethora of eighteenth-century cures, many of which were nauseating, some dangerous, and most of which were useless.

Included in the Preface are excellent rules for maintaining health, and in the 1760 edition and thereafter, the use of electricity is recommended for some illnesses.

ARTHUR HILL

PRIMITIVE WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNEXION (Ireland) began in 1818 in IRELAND and consisted of those Methodists who wished to maintain the position of being a Society inside the Established Church. They opposed the 1816 decision of the Irish Conference to grant limited permission for Methodist preachers to administer the Sacraments. Their leader was ADAM AVERELL, a deacon of the Church of Ireland and a leading Methodist evangelist.

While the main body of Methodists ("Wesleyans") rapidly assumed the functions of an independent church, the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Connexion remained officially a Society inside the Church of Ireland, though with its own Conference, District and Circuit organization. It was strongest in numbers in the Enniskillen and Clones area.

One effect of the Disestablishment of the Church of Ireland in 1870 was to re-emphasize the common Methodist heritage of the two Methodist bodies. After discussion, in 1878 the Primitives re-united with the main body, henceforth known as "The Methodist Church in Ireland."

PRIMM, HOWARD THOMAS (1904-), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Brentwood, Tenn., on June 23, 1904. He was educated at WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY and Payne Theological Seminary (Ohio), from which institutions he received the A.B. and B.D. degrees in 1924 and 1927, respectively. He has received honorary degrees from Wilberforce and Allen Universities, and MORRIS BROWN, EDWARD WATERS, Payne, and Monrovia (Liberia, W. Africa) COLLEGES. He was ordained deacon in 1922 and in 1928, held pastorates in TENNESSEE, LOUISIANA, MISSISSIPPI and ARKANSAS. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1952 from the Union Bethel Church in NEW ORLEANS, La. He presently resides at NASHVILLE, Tenn. and supervises the work of the Fifth Episcopal Area District which includes the Puget Sound, California, Southern California, Colorado, Kansas-Nebraska, North Missouri and Missouri Annual Conferences.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

PRINCE OF WALES COLLEGE: PRINCE OF WALES COLLEGIATE (formerly Wesleyan Academy; Methodist College), St. John's, Newfoundland. In education, as in other areas, voluntary agencies were the first to attempt provision for the needs of the scattered people of Newfoundland. Schools were founded by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and by the Newfoundland School Society, which were supplemented by Sunday schools and charity schools. Their efforts, however, were sporadic and unsystematic, and they reached comparatively few of the settlements.

As early as 1844, the provincial legislature passed an act to establish a non-denominational academy, but the institution was unsuccessful. This stemmed in large measure from the increasing clamor for the recognition of denominational interests in the schools, an attitude which was recognized by a new bill in 1850. The latter provided for three academies, representing the Roman Catholics, the Anglicans, and the other denominations.

At this juncture, the growing Wesleyan Methodist constituency protested against sharing the Protestant grant with other bodies. They regarded themselves as unfairly treated, in comparison with other groups. In their petition of 1857, they stressed that the Anglicans and Roman Catholics were receiving grants for their schools, but the 15,000 Methodists were lumped with minor Protestant bodies.

In response the legislature passed an act (1858) authorizing a Wesleyan Academy in St. John's, and an annual grant of £200. In September of that year the governor-in-council appointed the first board of directors.

When in 1874, the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Eastern British America was incorporated in the Methodist Church of Canada, the academy became the Methodist Academy. Under its third principal, R. E. Holloway, the school flourished in the next decade. New buildings were opened in 1887, leaving the old edifice as a home for boarders and ministers' children. In the same year a new charter was issued providing for the appointment of the board of governors of the St. John's Methodist College, by the Newfoundland Conference of the Methodist Church. The college remained subject to annual inspection by the relevant provincial superintendent.

Since 1887 the college has sustained much physical damage through repeated fires. The lost buildings have been replaced by a new main structure, known as Prince of Wales College, Pitts Memorial Hall, the Ayre Memorial Gymnasium, the Harrington building for elementary classes, and the Prince of Wales Arena.

Despite its difficult history, Prince of Wales College, as it was called after 1925, had an enviable academic and athletic record. Twenty of its students won Rhodes scholarships; many others secured various scholarly awards. Graduates of the college have acquired important places in the professions and in business.

From the start, the college balanced academic achievement with concern for the religious life. George P. Story, first chaplain and guardian of the home, was followed by Mark Fenwick, T. B. Darby, S. G. Garland, L. A. D. Curtis, W. E. Stanford, and J. A. McKim. All of these men gave outstanding service. The most recent was appointed religious instructor for all United Church schools in St. John's.

In 1962 the college system and the other United Church schools in St. John's were placed under a new board drawn from the college board of governors, the former United Church School Board and from local interested laymen. The new board, known as the St. John's United Church School Board, operates ten schools. The senior high school, called Prince of Wales Collegiate, is housed in a new building; the former Prince of Wales building is now known as United Junior High School. In these institutions the traditions of the Wesleyan Academy and the Methodist College are continued.

PRISON MINISTERS (British). It may almost be said that Methodism began in prison; for the concern of JOHN WESLEY and his fellow members of the HOLY CLUB for those imprisoned in Oxford Gaol, and their methodical visits to and services in the jail partly led to their being called Methodists. CHARLES WESLEY frequently visited the prisoners in Newgate; and his work was carried on by other Methodists, such as Sarah Peters, who died of jail fever contracted during her visitations. SILAS TOLD became famous for his ministrations to condemned criminals.

Under the Prison Ministers' Act of 1863, denominations other than the Established Church were given the right to appoint ministers to visit their members in prison. Since that date Methodist ministers have been appointed to every prison and subsequently to every Borstal and detention center. Nominations are made by the Home Mission Department Prison Committee and submitted to the secretary of state, who makes the appointment of these ministers and thus ensures that they have the benefit of official recognition. The oversight of the work is the responsibility of the chaplain general of prisons, and of the Home Mission Department acting on behalf of the Methodist Church.

It is the duty of each visiting minister to visit his prison or institution at least once a week. He visits the prisoners in their cells in private; and, wherever numbers make it practicable, holds a regular service to which all under his care are permitted to come. This service is held either in the prison chapel or in some other conveniently arranged place. There is also opportunity for the regular celebration of Holy Communion, and the minister is permitted to use the prison communion vessels supplied by the prison authorities. By reason of his official appointment, the prison minister is in direct contact with the welfare and after-care agencies of the prison, both statutory and voluntary. Through these agencies he is often able to arrange visits to and aid for prisoners' families, to help in reconciliations, and to assist in providing contacts, work, and accommodation on release. In special cases he can also communicate direct with prisoners' families for the purpose of helping them and providing for the prisoners' after-care. All these tasks he undertakes as a spiritual ministry in order that he may effectively offer Christ and his saving power to those in need.

PRITCHARD, JOHN (1746-1814), British itinerant, was governor of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL from 1802-7. Born December 1746, at Arthay, IRELAND, educated locally, afterward at Dublin Academy, he disappeared to London about 1763, suffering ague, poverty and spiritual despair. At the Foundry under PETER JACO in 1765 he found peace. Traveling with WESLEY in 1770-71, Pritchard was received into Full Connexion in 1772. After tramping four Irish circuits, he served in England—North, Midlands, East Coast, and West Country, from 1772-1802. Pritchard was frequently ill. Originally excessively nervous—leaving Norwich after only one week—he became a bold, undeterred preacher and pastor. He died in Bristol in 1814.

PROBERT TRUST, at AUCKLAND, New Zealand, administers funds left to the Methodist Church by John Probert, an early Auckland settler who prospered with the growth of the city. He was also a loyal Wesleyan, being attached to Pitt Street Church. At his death in 1890 he left approximately £12,000 to be devoted to theological education in the City of Auckland. Invested in city property, the capital of the trust has multiplied in value, and the trustees are now able to contribute substantially towards the maintenance of TRINITY COLLEGE.

PROCTER, JOHN ERNEST (1918-), American layman, was born July 23, 1918 in Gainsboro, Tenn. to Leon C. and Mary (Poteet) Procter. Schooling was obtained at Memphis State College, George Peabody College, VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, University of Miami, and University of Tennessee. He was married to Jane Christine Sprott, May 23, 1941.

He rose to rank of captain while serving in the USAF, 1943-45, 1950-52. He was decorated with the Certificate of Valor and the Air Medal, receiving seven oak leaf clusters. Mr. Procter became manager of the Accounts Payable Department, the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, 1946-58; system analyst, 1958-64; vice-president of the Publishing Division, 1964-70; and Publisher from that date.

As a member of the NASHVILLE Administrative Management Society, he has held the offices of secretary, treasurer, vice-president and president, receiving the Outstanding Service Plaque for service to the national office, the Gold Merit Key (1961), and the Diamond Merit Key (1967). He has served as chairman of several committees for the Protestant Church-Owned Publishers Association. He is also a member of Nashville Chamber of Commerce, American Book Publishers Council, and the Publishers Section of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

PROGRAM COUNCIL, THE, of The United Methodist Church. This organization, called for and created by the Uniting Conference of 1968, is new to American Methodism, but was known to the E.U.B. Church as part of their conference administrative work before union with The Methodist Church in 1968 (Discipline of the EUB Church, 1967, paragraph 1012-1017). As adopted and created for The United Methodist Church, it takes as its aim "to provide a consultation process wherein the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, the COUNCIL OF SECRETARIES, and the representative laymen and pastors may discuss, choose, correlate and coordinate program emphases of The United Methodist Church." It is also "to provide services to assist in the selection and coordination of the program emphases and in the interpretation and promotion of them in the Annual Conferences and local churches."

As organized this powerful body took over from The Methodist Church the functions of the Commission on PROMOTION AND CULTIVATION; the Coordinating Council; the Interboard Commission on Local Church; and the Department of Research of the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE; and incorporated the TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION as a full division within its structure. It also took over and continues the former Program Council of the E.U.B. Church.

Fifteen bishops were made members of the Program Council—three from each JURISDICTION and four ministers from each Jurisdiction, at least three of whom are to be pastors at the time of their election; and seven laymen of whom at least one should not be over twenty-one years of age at the time of election. Two of these laymen also were to be women. All members of the Council of Secretaries were made members of this body but had no vote.

Lengthy disciplinary directions were given for the organization and functioning of this Council with specific directions regarding division of the body for purposes of administration, and further directions as to meetings, staff, secretariat, and the like.

In general the functions of the Program Council are to give leadership in and participate in the coordinate research and planning for The United Methodist Church, and to assist the general agencies of the Church in the interpretation and promotion of the cooperative program of all such agencies.

Since the Program Council takes over the work formerly done by the Coordinating Council, much of its work will be in the nature of correlating the different plans and moves of a Church as large as The United Methodist. Plans ahead, of course, will be made by the Council, especially when a new quadrennium is near. The Program Council must report directly to the General Conference upon its work.

A full secretariat is provided with executive officers who let the entire Church know of moves being made and planned for; and there is also a central promotional office for the purpose of advancing throughout the Church a program of World Service, Advance Specials, One Great Hour of Sharing, the Television-Radio Ministerial Fund, the Fellowship of Suffering and Service, the Interdenominational Cooperation Fund, and other general benevolence causes except as otherwise directed by the General Conference.

In each Jurisdiction, there may be a Jurisdiction Program Council designed to coordinate and make the work of the Boards and Agencies of the Church effective within such Jurisdiction. Likewise, in each Annual Conference, there must be organized an Annual Conference Program Council. This is to develop all recommendations from the local churches, the district agencies, the annual conference agencies, and the general Program Council and make all such available and useful in each Annual Conference.

In the local church, instead of a Program Council, a Local Church Council on Ministries is created which "shall consider, develop, and coordinate proposals for church's strategy for mission. It shall receive, and where possible, utilize resources for mission provided by the District, Annual, Jurisdictional and General Conference Program Councils, boards, and agencies, and shall coordinate these resources with the church's plan for ministries in its local and other settings."

PROGRAM-CURRICULUM COMMITTEE. When The United Methodist Church was formed in 1968 the responsibility for planning curriculum for the educational ministry of the local church was delegated to a Program-Curriculum Committee of the General Board of EDUCATION. It was similar to former curriculum committees in the uniting churches, with the significant addition to its scope of program elements related to curriculum.

The great growth of church schools and church school literature during the early years of the twentieth century, including various church school publications and lesson materials and the like, called in time for an over-all, authoritative, broadly based curriculum plan that Board staff alone could not properly develop. In the former M.E. Church the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1928 authorized the Board of Education to "appoint a Curriculum Committee of such number and in such manner as it may determine, always including the BOOK EDITOR, the Editor of Church School Publications, and the Editor of The Epworth Herald." The function of the committee was to "determine standard curricula for all church schools, including vacation and week-day schools, the EPWORTH LEAGUE, and other agencies within the local church, and to recommend to the Board books and other literature which may be found desirable for use in religious education and in the training of leaders and teachers." (Paragraph 500.4, Discipline, 1928.)

In the former M.E. Church, South, there was a staff Committee on Curriculum and Program after 1930 (Discipline, 1934, Paragraph 414), but at Union in 1939 a Curriculum Committee very much like that of the M.E. Church, and patterned after it, was established for The Methodist Church. The Committee consisted of seventeen voting members and of various important officials of the General Board of Education and The METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, as well as representatives of the Board of MISSIONS, the Board of EVANGELISM, the Board of Christian SOCIAL CONCERNS, and the Board of LAY ACTIVITIES.

In the former E.U.B. Church there was a Church Curriculum Committee with twenty voting members representing the major boards and agencies of the church. Its function was to carry on curriculum research and to develop a curriculum design, including objectives, outlines, and courses of study. Writers and editors were responsible to the denomination's publishers.

In the current Program-Curriculum Committee there are thirty-five voting members. Among them are representatives of the major program agencies of the church, pastors, professors, lay workers, conference directors of education, and public school leaders. The committee meets semiannually, and is charged with planning a curriculum that "is graded, based on sound educational principles, and on the universal gospel of the living Christ . . . [and] related to the traditions, purposes, programs, and movements of the church." Resources based on these curriculum plans are developed by the Board of Education through its Division of Curriculum Resources.

PROMOTION AND CULTIVATION, COMMISSION ON, an agency of The Methodist Church was organized in 1952. The purpose of the commission was "that duplication, overlapping, and competition may be eliminated in the promotion of the general financial causes of the church, and to the end that our people may be informed about, and may adequately support the general agencies of the church," . . . and to promote "throughout the church the program of World Service, Advance Specials, Week of Dedication offerings, and other general financial causes except as otherwise directed by the General Conference." (1952 Discipline, Paragraphs 750-4)

The 1956 GENERAL CONFERENCE renewed this mandate and added specifically for promotion the Fellowship of Suffering and Service offerings, and the Television Ministry Fund. In 1960 the Week of Dedication offerings became the One Great Hour of Sharing offerings, and the Interdenominational Cooperation Fund was included for promotion. In 1960 and 1964 the General Conferences reaffirmed the mandate of the Commission to inform Methodist people that adequate support might be given the general agencies, and to promote the program of world service and other general benevolence causes.

Since 1952 the commission has informed Methodist people and encouraged their support of World Service and other general benevolences. The record written by Methodists during this sixteen year period shows that the total amount contributed to World Service, General Advance Specials, for Special Appeals such as Emergency Help for India, the Week of Dedication, and the One Great Hour of Sharing, the Fellowship of Suffering and Service, the Television-Radio Ministry Fund, Temporary General Aid and World Service Specials was $375,161,801.

A variety of means and materials were used by the commission to promote benevolence causes. The Methodist Story, a program journal, was sent free each month to ministers and key laymen in each local church. The Methodist Story and Spotlight, the program journal of the E.U.B. Church were merged in May of 1968. As Methodist Story—Spotlight it was mailed to over 315,000 persons in that month. Other printed materials include free Fourth Sunday World Service leaflets, leaflets about each general benevolence cause, World Service and general benevolence charts, and materials for special observances. Films and filmstrips have been developed as well to dramatize and pictorialize benevolences.

In 1952 the entire staff of the Advance For Christ and His Church office became the staff of the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation, with Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN serving as chairman and E. Harold Mohn as secretary and executive director. Related to the commission was the Advance Committee. From 1952-56 Bishop COSTEN J. HARRELL was chairman and Dr. Mohn was executive director. Bishop Martin served as chairman of the commission until his retirement in 1964 and E. Harold Mohn until his retirement in 1960. Bishop HAZEN C. WERNER became chairman of the Advance Committee in 1956, and was the chairman at the time of his retirement in 1968. In 1961 headquarters of the Commission were located in Evanston, Ill., and ELLIOTT L. FISHER became general secretary. Howard Greenwalt was chosen general secretary of the Commission in 1966, following the death of Dr. Fisher. Bishop DONALD H. TIPPETT served as chairman of the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation from 1964 to 1968.

The General Conference of 1968 (The Uniting Conference) created an organizational union of the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation, the Coordinating Council, the Interboard Commission on the Local Church, and TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION, and the Department of Research of the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE of The Methodist Church; and The PROGRAM COUNCIL of the Evangelical United Brethren Church. The Commission on Promotion and Cultivation became The Division of Interpretation of The Program Council.

PROTESTANT METHODISTS, a British secession from the Wesleyan Methodist connection which took place in 1828. The affair began when a group of trustees from the Brunswick Chapel, LEEDS, applied to the Leeds District Meeting for permission to ask Conference to sanction the building of an organ in their chapel. (There still existed a residual Puritan objection to the use of such instruments in religious services, hence the complicated nature of the procedure.) The trustees were refused permission by a large majority, but nevertheless made their request to the Conference of 1827, which, despite the warning of the Leeds superintendent and a deputation of protest from the Leeds circuit involved, gave the desired permission. The trustees sent out orders for the building of the organ, but the local preachers and leaders who had originally objected to the idea on ritualistic grounds now decided to resist on constitutional grounds. The conflict soon turned on the rights of the ministry as opposed to the rights of the laity; at a special district meeting in Leeds, JABEZ BUNTING upheld the authority of the pastoral office as he saw it; in turn, he was supported by the Conference of 1828. The secession which followed was small; in 1830 there were 3,997 members, scattered thinly over Lancashire and Yorkshire, apart from 402 in the London South Circuit.

The Rules of the Leeds Protestant Methodists (Leeds, 1829; there was a final version in September, 1830) reacted so strongly against Wesleyanism that the ministry was replaced with an eldership, and the annual meeting was stripped of the enormous powers wielded by the Wesleyan Conference. The survivors of the secession joined the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION in 1837. The principal leader in Leeds was a local schoolmaster called James Sigston, who had written a biography of the revivalist, WILLIAM BRAMWELL. The Leeds secession was important because it marked the climax of Jabez Bunting's career; his autocratic behavior at Leeds was never forgiven by his opponents, and his refusal to make any significant concessions to the laity made inevitable an internal Wesleyan struggle which lasted until 1857. Many pamphlets were written at the time; see especially, three Letters to the Protestant Methodists, by Daniel Isaac (Leeds, 1830); An Affectionate Address . . . to the South London Circuit, Richard Watson (1829); the Protestant Methodist Magazine, 1829-30; and An Essay on the Constitution of Wesleyan Methodism, John Beecham (London, 1829)—virtually a book, and a classic statement of Jabez Bunting's case, which was more coherent than is often allowed.

PROUTY, FLORENCE J. (1908-), American missionary to CHILE, was born in Ollie, Mont. She was sent to Chile as a nurse in 1940 to reorganize the medical work at Sweet Memorial Institute, SANTIAGO, which was a part of the program for training young women for work in the local church.

As a specialist in pediatric nursing, Miss Prouty was concerned about the high infant-mortality rate in Chile and embarked on a campaign of educating the mothers on how to take care of their children. Under her leadership the kindergarten and day nursery were reorganized and have become the outstanding teaching center of its kind for all Latin America.

In 1946 Miss Prouty organized the medical work of The Methodist Church with the Mapuche Indians in southern Chile, a small clinic being set up in Nueva Imperial. The work has been extended into the nearby communities, and emphasis has been given to child care under the leadership of a missionary doctor and a Mapuche nurse.

The Bernardo O'Higgins Award was bestowed upon Miss Prouty in 1960 in recognition of her work and concern for the Chilean child. This is the highest award Chile gives to a foreign resident. In 1965 Miss Prouty received the Javier Spencer Award from the Association of American Women in Chile as the woman who had rendered outstanding service to the community during the year.

JOYCE HILL

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND, U.S.A., the state capital, had a population of about 177,000 in 1970. Founded by Roger Williams in 1636, it was incorporated in 1832. FREEBORN GARRETTSON preached the first Methodist sermon in the city in April 1787, and the second was delivered by JESSE LEE, July 4, 1790. Bishop Asbury visited the community as early as 1791, and in 1792 the Providence Circuit was organized. The circuit included Bristol, Cranston, Newport, and Warren along with some towns over the line in MASSACHUSETTS. Designated as Warren Circuit in 1792, it reported fifty-eight members.

In 1815 the first Methodist church building in Providence was erected with Van Rensselaer-Osborn as pastor. Following a successful revival in 1820, a new and larger building called Chestnut Street Church was dedicated in 1822. Chestnut Street sponsored Power Street Church in 1833, and in 1848 Mathewson Street sprang from the latter. In 1876 there were eight churches in Providence, including one in East Providence, with a total membership of 2,197. At that time the A.M.E. and A.M.E. Zion Churches had two congregations each in the city.

For many years during the first half of the twentieth century, Mathewson Street Church was one of the strongest and most influential churches in the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE, reporting at one time more than 1,400 members. In more recent years it has declined in strength; in 1968 it had 768 members. Since that time Mathewson Street and Broadway Churches together have been called Christ Methodist Parish. In 1970 the parish reported 894 members and property valued at $1,231,546.

In 1970, The United Methodist Church had, in addition to Christ Methodist Parish, four churches in Providence—Cranston Street, Friendship, Trinity Union, and Washington Park. The statistics for the five units were: 2,282 members, property valued at $2,582,986, and $165,090 raised for all purposes during the year.

ALBEA GODBOLD

PROVIDENCE CONFERENCE (ME), was organized June 9, 1841 at PROVIDENCE, R. I., with Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING presiding. The 1840 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the Providence Conference by dividing the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. The territory of the new conference was the part of Connecticut east of the Connecticut River, RHODE ISLAND, and southeastern MASSACHUSETTS. The Providence Conference began with three districts, Providence, New London, and Sandwich. It had sixty-four charges, eighty-five preachers, and 10,664 members.

The successive divisions of the New England Conference to form the MAINE CONFERENCE in 1825, the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference in 1830, and the Providence Conference in 1840, reflect the statistical increase of Methodism in New England during that period, and the consequent advisability, under existing conditions, of organizing the several socio-economic parts of the region into separate annual conferences.

Two notable enterprises promoted by the Providence Conference were the East Greenwich Academy (See Rhode Island), and the MARTHA'S VINEYARD Camp Meeting. President U. S. GRANT had a "conversion experience" at Martha's Vineyard in 1874.

The Providence Conference was renamed the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1881. In 1880 the conference reported 178 charges, 181 preachers, 23,147 members, and property valued at $1,669,250.

ERNEST R. CASE

PRUSSNER, AUGUST HENRY (1884-1947), missionary, educator, writer, was born in Kreis Herford, Westphalia, GERMANY, April 23, 1884. As a very young man he emigrated to America, and settled down in Iowa. His desire for knowledge led him to Charles City College, from which he received his B.A. in 1914. In 1916 he was graduated with highest honors from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE with a B.D. degree, and in 1917 he received his M.A. from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. Three years later he had completed his work for a Ph.D. from Chicago University in the field of Semitic languages.

In 1921 he had the choice of going to the Methodist Seminary in Frankfurt Am Main, Germany, or to a newly organized Theological Training School in JAVA, and decided in favor of the latter. He became Principal of the Training School, where he served 1921-1926. After his first furlough he was asked to go to SUMATRA and work as District Missionary, later District Superintendent, and in 1935-1940 as Principal of the Methodist Boys School in Palembang, where he built a beautiful new school building. Being a very able writer in the Indonesian (Malay) language, he translated a number of books and wrote several tracts and books, the most important of which was a scholarly study of Amos and Hosea (1935). Not able to return to Indonesia on account of the war, he transferred to the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE. At the time of his death he was pastor of Immanuel and Sacred Heart Methodist Churches in SOUTH BEND, Ind., U.S.A. He died Dec. 13, 1947, and was buried in Highland Cemetery, South Bend.

THOMAS M. PRYOR

PRYOR, THOMAS MARION (1904-), American bishop was born in Cairo, Ill., on Feb. 28, 1904, the son of Thomas J. and Esther (Handley) Pryor. Later his family moved to MICHIGAN where he has lived and served the church.

His undergraduate work was taken at the University of Michigan, from which institution he also earned the M.A. and Ph.D. degree, the latter being in the field of Urban Sociology. He also earned the S.T.B. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and took additional graduate training at the Sorbonne in France and the University of Heidelberg in Germany. ADRIAN COLLEGE awarded him an honorary degree in 1962.

He married Alice Wuertel on Sept. 5, 1925. They have four children: Thomas H., a copywriter; David B., a clinical psychologist on the staff of the University of Michigan medical school; Nancy S. (Mrs. Karl Kienholz) and Mary Ann (Mrs. Roderick Daane).

Thomas M. Pryor is a member of Theta Phi (honorary theological fraternity) and Alpha Kappa Delta (honorary social fraternity). He has served as special lecturer at both the University of Michigan and Wayne University, Detroit.

He has served Methodist churches in both the DETROIT and MICHIGAN CONFERENCES. He was senior pastor at First Church, Kalamazoo, when elected to the episcopacy in 1964. Previously, he served for thirteen years as pastor of First Church, Royal Oak, Mich. His student pastorates included Whitmore Lake, Montrose, Newberg, and Detroit, Whitefield.

Bishop and Mrs. Pryor have traveled widely throughout the nation and the world. He was with the Sherwood Eddy Seminar to Europe in 1951; journeyed through the USSR with the Board of Christian Social Concerns in 1961; made an around the world tour of Methodist missions in 1958, and has traveled twice for the I.R.O. and the Y.M.C.A. as an observer in displaced persons camps. In 1955 he spent three months in Nottingham, England as an exchange minister. In 1965 he and Mrs. Pryor made an episcopal visitation to missions in Africa.

Upon his election to the episcopacy in 1964, he was assigned to the CHICAGO Area where he is serving at present. He is a trustee of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, KENDALL COLLEGE, GARRETT SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE, and Chicago Wesley Memorial Hospital. He was president of the Church Federation of Greater Chicago for the year 1968-69. He serves as a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the Commission for Ecumenical Affairs, the PROGRAM COUNCIL, and the National Board of Education.

PUBLICATION, BOARD OF (EUB), was the printing and publishing agency of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH in America with headquarters in DAYTON, Ohio. The Board was first organized immediately after union of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST and the EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1946. From 1946 until 1962 the publishing work of the church was carried on by the two church publishing houses: The OTTERBEIN PRESS of Dayton, Ohio (United Brethren) and The EVANGELICAL PRESS of Harrisburg, Pa. (Evangelical). In 1962 the GENERAL CONFERENCE approved a plan of restructuring its Board of Publication to provide for all general church publishing by this Board under the administration of one publisher.

Publishing in the church has been an important function since the first years of the Evangelical and United Brethren Churches, beginning early in the nineteenth century. In The Evangelical Church the first publishing house was established in New Berlin, Pa., in 1817, being constructed side by side with the first church of that denomination which was erected in the same year. During the years other publishing centers for The Evangelical Church were located in Cleveland, Ohio, and Harrisburg, Pa. The original Harrisburg location of the publishing house was Second and Locust Streets (1894). A new, modern building was erected in 1918 at the corner of Third and Reily Streets which has been the site of The Evangelical Press from that time to the present. This is a three-story modern brick building with printing and binding equipment and administrative offices. An additional printing building (Plant No. 2) was erected in 1955 and is located a few blocks from Plant No. 1.

The United Brethren in Christ in its early years published disciplines, hymnals and church school literature, with printing being done by private printers. In 1834 printing equipment was purchased and a Printing Establishment opened at Circleville, Ohio. One of the first publications was the Religious Telescope, published Dec. 31, 1834. This publication was to continue without interruption until church union with The Evangelical Church in 1946. The publishing house was incorporated in the State of Ohio in 1839, by an act of the General Assembly as the Printing Establishment of the United Brethren in Christ.

Within a few years there was a demand to move the publishing center to a larger city. After considerable heated discussion, the General Conference in 1853 authorized the Printing Establishment to be relocated in Dayton, Ohio. The first location was at Fourth and Main Streets. Publishing continued there in several different buildings until 1914. The publishing house was then removed to its present location at Fifth and Perry Streets. In 1935 The Otterbein Press was incorporated in the State of Ohio to become the successor to the Printing Establishment corporation as the official publishing agency of the United Brethren Church. The Printing Establishment corporation was continued as the holding company for the twenty-one-story office building which was erected at Fourth and Main in 1925. This building was sold in 1952 and the Printing Establishment corporation dissolved in 1966, after transfer of over $2,000,000 in assets to the Board of Pensions of the church.

Purpose and Objectives. The E.U.B. Church restated its publishing purpose and objectives in the General Conference of 1962 at the time the constitution of the Board was approved. The objectives as stated were as follows:

The primary publishing objective of The Evangelical United Brethren Church shall be to foster Christian thought and action through the wide distribution of Christian materials.

To accomplish this objective, the Board of Publication shall produce, publish, purchase and distribute Christian literature, printed, audio-visual and other materials for the church. The Board of Publication shall share with other agencies in the total Christian education program of the church, providing printing and publishing services to church boards and agencies in implementing the total program of the church.

Primarily, the publishing was for the churches and members of the denomination; however, from time to time the church had published religious books, periodicals, and additional material for other denominations and for the Armed Services Curriculum Committee.

Board Organization and Meetings. The Board of Publication was made up of eighteen members, two of whom were bishops of the church. Fourteen members were elected by the General Conference, seven of whom were laymen and seven ministers. Two members at large were elected by the Board of Publication. The Publisher of the Church, the General Conference-elected executive editors, and one representative from each of the following boards were advisory members: General Council of Administration, the Board of Christian Education, the Board of Evangelism, the Board of Missions, the Board of Pensions. All active bishops of the church were advisory members. All elected members of the Board constituted the Board of Trustees of The Evangelical Press and of The Otterbein Press.

The Board of Publication met annually or upon call. An Executive Committee of the Board met quarterly. The Board had the "responsibility for and supervision of all the publishing interests of The Evangelical United Brethren Church."

The Publisher was the chief executive officer and treasurer of the Board.

Church Publishing-Educational. The Board published a complete line of Sunday school literature for all ages, including graded and uniform lesson materials. Supplemental materials were provided in the form of age level reading papers: Builders for senior high and above; Friends for junior high; Boys and Girls for juniors; Children's Stories for primary. Power, with daily meditations for youth, was printed and distributed for Christian Youth Publications to our church as well as several other denominations. Teacher's helps included materials for adults, youth, junior children, primary children and nursery-kindergarten.

Church and Home was a monthly magazine for the Christian home with a circulation of about 225,000.

Executive and administrative offices were located in the new Board of Publication Center building at Fifth and Perry Streets, Dayton, Ohio. The Publication Center also provided commodious quarters for a full staff of church school literature and Church and Home editors. The Board of Publication maintained an art department for its own publications and for art service to all of the departments of the church.

The Board held title for the church to several real estate properties, including two printing manufacturing buildings in Harrisburg, Pa., the five-story Otterbein Press building in Dayton, Ohio, and the new Board of Publication Center, with total assets aggregating over nine million dollars.

Grants for Pensions. The Board of Publication made annual grants from its net proceeds for the aid of retired ministers and their dependents. This had been a policy of both of the uniting churches since the beginning of publishing. These grants were made to the Board of Pensions and to the annual conferences. The annual grant for 1966 and 1967 each had been over $400,000.

Bibles, Books and Merchandise. The Board of Publication was responsible in the church for the promotion, sale and distribution of Bibles, religious books and other religious merchandise for the church and the home. Two modern bookstores were situated in Dayton, Ohio, and Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. A large part of this religious merchandising was carried on through a well organized mail order service.

In addition to church and religious printing, both of the printing plants did commercial work. This had been a policy of the church from its early years. The Board of Publication provided modern printing and binding equipment incorporating the latest printing processes and methods. Since much of the church printing was on a monthly or quarterly mailing basis, additional printing was required to keep employees and equipment busy throughout the year. The current dollar volume of the printing and publishing operation in 1967 was about $10,000,000 per year.

Throughout the years the church served its constituency and many others with Christian printed materials, challenging them to more active and meaningful Christian living.

With the formation of The United Methodist Church, the work of this Board was transferred to the new Board of Publication and the Methodist Publishing House.

L. L. HUFFMAN

PUBLICATION, BOARD OF and BOOK COMMITTEE. The Board of Publication is the directing and controlling

Board or Agent of The United Methodist Church which manages and directs the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE. This Publishing House "comprises the publishing interests of The United Methodist Church."

The Baltimore CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784 was the first ancestor of the Board of Publication, creating this role for itself by inserting the following paragraph in the Minutes of the Conference: "... the Advice of the Conference shall be desired concerning any valuable Impression, and their consent be obtained before any Steps be taken for the Printing thereof." The first Book Committee (so called in the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South, until unification) was appointed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1792 and had three members: JOHN DICKINS, first Book Steward; Henry Willis and THOMAS HASKINS; and two duties: "to determine . . . on the amount of the droughts which may be drawn from time to time on the book-fund," and "to publish . . . such books or treatises as members of the Book Committee shall unanimously judge proper." The yellow fever epidemic of 1798 and Dickins' resultant death wiped out these brave beginnings of a book committee, since the Discipline for that year makes no mention of the Book Committee as originally set up, but lays the responsibility of the publishing interests of the church upon the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, with a conference-appointed committee to examine quarterly the state of the Book Concern. No books or tracts were to be printed without the consent of one bishop and two-thirds of the Philadelphia Conference.

For nearly fifty years the annual conference in which the Book Concern was located appointed the Book Committees. In this responsibility, the NEW YORK CONFERENCE replaced the Philadelphia Conference when the Concern moved to New York under the stewardship of EZEKIEL COOPER in 1804. When "the Concern for the Western Country" was created in 1820 and located in CINCINNATI, the OHIO CONFERENCE appointed the Book Committees for the Western part of the church. Membership and responsibilities of the committee waxed and waned with the fortunes of the Concern, the general trend being onward and upward. By 1836, the Book Committee of the eastern Concern included all the preachers stationed in New York, including the editors of the periodicals and literature, the resident corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society and the presiding elder of the district. This arrangement held until 1844 when the General Conference ordered the first geographical distribution of the committee, specifying that both Eastern and Western Concern Committees be limited to six members each—two elected annually by each of these three conferences in the East: New York, Philadelphia, and NEW JERSEY—and two elected annually by each of the three Western conferences: OHIO, KENTUCKY, and INDIANA. The term "Book Steward" was dropped in favor of "Agent." The Western agent and assistant could be taken from any annual conference, not simply the Ohio Conference, and both Eastern and Western agents needed only the approval of the editors instead of that of the Book Committee to publish any new works.

In 1848 the General Conference assumed responsibility for appointing the Book Committees and gave the bodies expanded powers. In 1868, the two Committees were combined into one. In 1872, however, to assure local supervision, subordinate local committees were authorized for New York and Cincinnati. It was at the General Conference of 1872 that laymen, first elected delegates to that General Conference, became members of the Book Committee. In 1912, the Eastern and Western Concerns were unified under one charter and management and the Book Committee became a corporation.

The Book Committee of the M.E. Church, South, was created by the 1846 General Conference following the separation of the two Methodisms in 1844. From a membership of three, it grew to a thirteen-man body in 1878, with heavy lay representation: nine laymen and four ministers, reflecting this church's greater dependence upon the laity in business matters during the post-war and Reconstruction era. In 1890 the lay-clerical representation was adjusted to seven lay, six cleric. As the Eastern and Western Book Committees of the Methodist Episcopal Church were in the early years dominated by the annual conferences, in which its publishing houses were located, so was the Southern Book Committee membership made up largely of Nashvillians. Residential restrictions were instituted in 1898 when the Discipline specified that of the thirteen members, only five could be residents of Nashville and vicinity. In 1906 the Book Agents were made coordinate in rank, the title of the chief executive officer was changed to "Publishing Agent" and it devolved upon the Book Committee to determine their functions and prerogatives. In 1918 the Book Committee assumed the responsibility of electing the Publishing Agents, a responsibility of the General Conference since the founding of the church.

The Book Committee of the M.P. Church was created in 1830, following the 1828 split in the ranks of American Methodism over lay representation. The committee, accountable to the Maryland Conference in the interim of the General Conference, had both lay and ministerial members on it from its inception, more clearly defined duties than M.E. Church or M.E. Church, South, counterparts, but approximately the same powers. The rise of the North-West M.P. Book Concern, with headquarters ultimately at Pittsburgh, caused administrative problems, and at the 1854 General Conference a Plan of Division of the Book Concern was adopted, creating separate, self-sustaining Concerns, each operated by its own Book Committee, known as Directories. Four years later the church followed its Book Concerns into separation along the same geographical lines. Although the Church reunited in 1877, the publishing concerns continued to function separately, but under the control of the General Conference and a twenty-member Board of Publication, composed of the corporate bodies of the Pittsburgh and Baltimore Directories. The two M.P. Publishing Houses united in 1932.

The Present Board. At the time of church union of the three Methodisms in 1939, the term "Book Committee" was considered a bit archaic for the new union, and the "Board of Publication" supplanted "Book Committee" as the managerial group to control the Methodist Publishing House.

Regulations in the present Discipline call for the members of the Board of Publication to be elected largely by the Jurisdictional Conferences, and a ratio which provides for an equitable distribution among the various Jurisdictions has been worked out based upon their membership. The membership of the Board is equally divided, as far as practicable between ministers and laymen. Two bishops since 1952 have been members of the Board, selected by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS; and five persons are put upon the present Board by election of the Board itself. Careful disciplinary regulations govern the proceedings and define the functions of the Board of Publication. These from time to time are changed, usually in minor ways that seem good to the directing General Conference.

The Board of Publication has since 1956 elected one general executive known as the president, who is the president of each corporation under the direction of the Board and who is also known as Publisher of The United Methodist Church. The Board also elects the Book Editor of the Church, the editor of Church School Publications—in conjunction with the action of the Board of Education—and elects also the editors of the general church periodicals, as the Christian Advocate and Together. Such editors are elected quadrennially.

The Board organizes, as do other Agencies, by electing its own president and officers and as it has traditionally had upon it laymen of unusual ability in the field of business and wide enterprise, its meetings are in the nature of the annual meeting of any other large manufacturing or business company.

This incorporated board functions through a chairman, vice-chairman, and secretary, an executive officer (the president already described), and a sixteen-member executive committee which exercises all the powers of the Board except those expressly reserved for Board action by the Discipline or by the corporate charter and by-laws. Board officers also serve as executive committee officers; the two bishops serving on the Board are ex officio members of the committee with vote; the president (publisher) is an ex officio member without vote.

In its directing and controlling of the Publishing House, the Board acts through the president (publisher) elected by the Board and answerable to it. For legal and historical purposes, the members of the Board of Publication are the successors of the incorporators named in the charters of the Methodist Book Concern (M.E. Church), the Publishing Agents of the M.E. Church, South, the Board of Publication of the M.P. Church, and the Board of Publication of the E.U.B. Church. The president (publisher) is the successor of the Book Agents of the M.E. Church, South.

Broadly speaking, it is the responsibility of the Board to direct the operations of the Publishing House in the channels laid down for it by the Discipline; to appropriate money from net income, above adequate reserves, and distribute this appropriation annually to the annual conferences for the conference claimants; to hold, use, manage, and operate all property and assets of the corporations that make up the body of the publishing operations of The United Methodist Church, and to see that all legal obligations of these corporations are fulfilled; and to make a written report of its action and proceedings to the church through the General Conference. The Board not only elects, but fixes the salaries of, and can suspend the following officers: president (publisher), book editor, editors of the official church papers, editor of church school publications, and other salaried officers provided for in the Discipline. It bonds the president and other corporate executive officers, and blanket bonds all staff personnel whose responsibilities justify such coverage, fixing the amount of the bonds and paying the premiums.

The Board of Publication controls an enormous business under the direction of the Discipline, which states that the objects of the Methodist Publishing House shall be: "The advancement of the cause of Christianity by disseminating religious knowledge and useful literary and scientific information in the form of books, tracts, and periodicals; the promotion of Christian education; the transaction of any and all business properly connected with the publishing, manufacturing, and distribution of books, tracts, periodicals, materials, and supplies for churches and church schools; and such other business as the General Conference may authorize and direct." PUBLISHING HOUSE CONTROVERSY (1897-1902). The Union Army during the Civil War took over the relatively new M.E. Church, South Publishing House building and printing plant when NASHVILLE was occupied by the Union Army. They used and abused the building and equipment for approximately four years. In 1867 the War-Claims Committee appraised the rent and damage at $500,000. This claim was unsuccessfully pressed by various attorneys for over thirty years. Then Barbee and Smith, the Publishing House Agents, employed Major E. B. Stahlman, an eminent attorney in Nashville, "to secure the most favorable settlement possible." He was to receive thirty-five percent of the amount collected. The attorney spent much of 1896-97 in WASHINGTON seeking Congressional approval of the claim bill.

After the House voted in 1898 to pay $288,000 on the claim, it encountered opposition in the Senate. Senator PASCO of FLORIDA, the sponsor of the claim, wrote BARBEE that "there is a rumor in the Senate that Mr. Stahlman is to receive forty percent of the amount recovered. If this is so, I believe it will defeat the bill. I need a denial from you to read in the Senate." Before this letter could be answered, Senator BATES of MAINE made a request for denial or confirmation of the rumor. Barbee wired: "It is not true that Stahlman will receive forty percent." Stahlman gave the Senators the impression "that he was not interested in the case on account of monetary considerations."

After the Senate passed the bill and the $288,000 were paid, it became known that the attorney's fee was thirty-five percent. A Senate Investigating Committee was appointed on the grounds that the Senate had been deceived.

The Agents and their attorney insisted that "the Senate consider the claim on its merits: that the fee was a matter of the Publishing House Agents' discretion." Therefore the Agents felt that they were under no obligation to divulge the details of their contract with their attorney.

The Senate Investigating Committee summarized their findings as follows:

First: That the Book Agents purposefully withheld facts.

Second: That if there was any mistake or omission on the part of the Senate, it was in failing to protect the beneficiaries against the Book Agents.

Third: The Committee deems it proper . . . that no censure should rest upon the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Fourth: The Committee . . . suggests that no action be taken by the Senate . . . but that the Church be allowed to take such measures as it deems proper.

W. P. Lovejoy, a member of the Book Committee (the Administrative management of the Publishing House) moved that the Book Committee ask the Agents to resign. This motion was rejected twelve to one.

This issue was debated all over Southern Methodism for over three years—in Annual Conferences, in the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1902, and in the church papers. One side denounced the Agents for what they termed "un-ethical conduct." The defenders as vigorously denied the charges. They maintained that the Agents were victims of a chain of unfortunate circumstances. The facts are detailed by the Senate Committee Report No. 1416, and the Church Investigating Committees.

The College of Bishops, speaking for the whole Church, officially reported to the Senate "that if the Senate by official affirmative action, declare that the passage of the payment bill was due to misleading statements, we will . . . have the entire amount returned." The Senate however "refused to recommend any further action."

The 1902 General Conference Committee investigating the Agents, found no cause for trial, and the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE also found no grounds for trying J. D. Barbee. However, Barbee declined to be considered for reelection as BOOK AGENT. He was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the Nashville District.

DuBose, in his History of Methodism, gave the General Conference summary of the controversy as follows:

First: the Church had a historic, just and legal claim against the Government.

Second: that the amount finally recovered and accepted as payment in full for the claim, was not equal to the loss sustained.

Third: that in answer to the complaint that this payment had been secured through misleading statements of the churches representatives had not been substantiated by the Senate.

Fourth: that the Church repudiates all acts of concealment.

Fifth: that this action is declared to be a final settlement of the whole matter. (See the biography of J. D. BARBEE in this Encyclopedia.)

PUBLISHING HOUSES, Br. (See BOOK ROOMS, Br.)

PUERTO RICO, a hilly tropical island southeast of CUBA, is 105 miles long and 35 miles wide, and has a population of about 2,700,000. As a possession of the United States, it has commonwealth status and chooses its chief executive by popular vote. Puerto Rico's largest income is from manufacturing—textiles and apparel, electronic equipment, chemicals, etc. Spanish is the official language, but the study of English is compulsory in the schools.

When the United States received Puerto Rico from Spain in 1898, Protestant missionaries entered the island at once. The Methodist Episcopal Church transferred CHARLES W. DREES from URUGUAY in 1900, and he immediately organized English and Spanish-speaking churches in San Juan, the capital. Other Methodist missionaries soon arrived, and in 1902 the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the denomination inaugurated several projects, including the George O. Robinson School for Girls in Santurce. By a comity agreement among several Protestant denominations, the Methodists were assigned a segment of territory running north and south through the center of the island and including the important cities of San Juan, Ponce, and Arecibo.

The Puerto Rico Mission (MEC) was organized at San Juan, March 7, 1902 with Bishop JOHN M. WALDEN presiding. The territory of the mission was Puerto Rico and adjacent islands. The mission reported 195 full members and 640 probationers. Appointments were made to ten charges.

The 1912 GENERAL CONFERENCE adopted an enabling act permitting the Puerto Rico Mission to become a mission conference, and it was organized as such at San Juan on Feb. 27, 1913 with Bishop WILLIAM BURT presiding. It began with thirty-five charges, eighteen ministers, twenty supply preachers, and 3,052 members plus 2,612 probationers. In 1939 the mission conference reported twenty-three charges and 2,800 members. In 1940 it became a provisional annual conference.

Today Methodism in Puerto Rico joins other denominations in supporting the Evangelical Seminary of Puerto Rico. The conference helps to maintain Middleton House, the Methodist student center which adjoins University Church in Rio Piedras. The George O. Robinson School has become coeducational, offering courses (English) from kindergarten through the twelfth grade. The pupils study religion as well as pursue a regular public school curriculum which is in Spanish.

In 1968 the Puerto Rico Provisional Conference reported two districts, fifty-six charges, sixty-nine ministers, 11,763 members, property valued at $4,994,780, and a total of $233,970 raised for all purposes during the year.

The 1968 General Conference elevated the Puerto Rico work to the status of a full annual conference. The Puerto Rico Conference was organized Jan. 23, 1969 at University

PUGH, ABRAM WESLEY (1894-), American minister, member of JUDICIAL COUNCIL, was born at Perkaspie, Pa., June 7, 1894, son of Joseph M. and Harriett (Moyer) Pugh.

He received the A.B. degree from Taylor University in 1922, and was awarded the D.D. degree by that institution in 1936. DePAUW UNIVERSITY also conferred the D.D. degree upon him in 1954.

He served as supply pastor in Cameron, Ohio, 1916; Marion, Home Park, Ind., 1920-22. He was admitted on trial into the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE, M.E. Church, 1919, and ordained deacon, 1921. He was received in full connection and ordained elder in 1923.

His pastorates were: Uniondale, 1922-26; Churubusco, 1926-28; Albany, 1928-32; Noblesville, 1932-36; superintendent, Richmond District, 1936-37, and again 1959-61; pastor, High Street Church, Muncie, 1937-49; superintendent, Fort Wayne District, 1949-55; pastor in Marion, 1955-59 (all Indiana). He was president of the Preachers Aid Society, North Indiana Conference, 1937-61; member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1936-56; he was chairman of the committee chairmen, 1956, and chairman of the Rules Committee, 1948-56. He was a member of the Board of Publication of The Methodist Church, 1944-56, and a member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church, 1956-68 and secretary of the Council, 1960-64.

He has served as trustee of Taylor University, 1932-44; trustee and member of the executive committee of the Indianapolis Methodist Hospital, 1939-61; and as a member of the board of directors of Parkview Memorial, Fort Wayne, 1949-55. He served to 2nd Lieutenant, U. S.

Army, 1918-19. In 1944 he was chairman of the Kiwanis International Committee on support of Churches in their Spiritual Aims.

He was married to Sarah Essa Pence on Aug. 24, 1920. Their children are: Geraldine Joy (Mrs. James C. Barr) and Miriam June (Mrs. Warren L. Bergwall). On June 6, 1967 he was married to Marguerite Deyo.

PULPIT ROCK, The Dalles, Oregon, U. S. A., is a slender basalt pillar, rising abruptly near the south boundary of the city of The Dalles, forming a natural pulpit from which the early Methodist missionaries were accustomed to preach to the Indians in pleasant weather. It was used first in 1838 when, on March 22, JASON LEE, DANIEL LEE, and H. K. W. Perkins arrived from the mission on the Willamette to found the mission at The Dalles.

The rock originally had two pinnacles rising about twelve feet from the base. Daniel Lee chiseled off one of the points for a table on which to place his Bible and the other was used as a seat by the minister.

An eye witness reported that customarily at dawn the minister mounted Pulpit Rock and blew a horn that could be heard across the Columbia. In response the Indians crossed the River in canoes while others came by foot to assemble about the rock to listen to the preaching of the Gospel.

The rock was dedicated and a memorial tablet set upon it, March 22, 1908, by the Old Fort Dalles Historical Society and the Good Intent Society of The Dalles Methodist Church. The tablet was unveiled by Miss Ethel W. Crubbs, granddaughter and only descendant of Jason Lee, first missionary in OREGON.

PUMPHREY, REASON (1736-1812), so far as is known was the first American Methodist to move west of the Appalachian Mountains after the Treaty of Fort Stanwix of 1768 opened the way to the issuing of land titles on the western PENNSYLVANIA and western VIRGINIA frontier. Pumphrey moved west from Anne Arundel County, Md., in 1772, accompanied by his wife, eight sons, seven servants, and four slaves. He first settled on a claim of 308 acres of land on the headwaters of Chartier's creek near the Indian village of Catfish within the bounds of the present city of Washington, Pa. Pumphrey had become a Methodist in one of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE's classes. He was accompanied to the west by Eli Shickle, one of Strawbridge's local preachers, who conducted religious services in the camp on Sundays en route west, and who preached in the Pumphrey and other frontier cabins until his return to Maryland in 1776.

Pumphrey was a cousin of RICHARD OWINGS, Strawbridge's leading local preacher. According to the Journal of JOHN LITTLEJOHN the BALTIMORE Circuit in MARYLAND in 1777-78 was an eight-week circuit with four preachers on it. Preaching points on it included the widow Ann Murphy; Edward Teal; the widow Pumphrey, Reason's mother; Joshua Owings, father of Richard; Hawkins; and William Ridgely, Pumphrey's father-in-law. In the early 1780's ANN MURPHY, Edward Teal, William Hawkins and others of the Maryland Methodists moved to western Pennsylvania. In the fall of 1783 Richard Owings visited these settlements west of the mountains and made plans for a Methodist circuit among them. In the spring of 1784 FRANCIS ASBURY appointed two preachers to the new Redstone Circuit.

In 1785 Pumphrey moved farther west to a bottom land farm on the Ohio River at Beech Bottom in Brooke County, Va., (now W. Va.), and almost immediately Methodism again followed him, a Society of the REDSTONE CIRCUIT being organized in his home in 1786. This Society became the Kadesh Chapel Methodist Church when the first church building was erected in 1788. This church continues today as one of the historic churches of the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

PUNJAB UNITED CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS. These schools consist of two higher secondary schools—one for girls, the other for boys—and an industrial training center. They have been developed by the Punjab Synod of the United Church of North India, the Delhi Annual Conference of the Methodist Church of Southern Asia, and the related boards of missions. After years of delays caused by the Second World War and by the slow process of land acquisition, classes were opened in 1944. Initially 207 acres had been obtained, but the army took over the entire property for defense purposes during the war and has retained use of a large portion.

The enrollment figures for 1965 were: 333 (of which 137 were Christians) in the boys' high school; 218 (of which 151 were Christians) in the girls' high school; 34 (of which 18 were Christians) in the industrial center. Of the 306 Christians enrolled, 276 were in the boarding department and were under Christian supervision and instruction in the dormitories and in recreation.

The need for these schools has long been urgent, and their potential for service is immense. The master plan was drawn by a professional missionary architect. The first two stages of the building program have been completed.

Many students develop a strong sense of mission. This is helped by the Sunday school, which has an enrollment of 330. The school chaplain conducts weekly classes for teachers. During the last summer vacation fifty-five of the older students conducted daily vacation Bible schools in their villages. Some also had classes for illiterate Christians, teaching them to read and to witness to their faith.

PUNSHON, WILLIAM MORLEY (1824-1881), British Methodist, was born at Doncaster, Yorkshire, May 29, 1824. The son of a draper, he entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1844. In the 1850's he established a reputation as the giver of highly rhetorical lectures: The Huguenots, Wilberforce, Science, Religion and Literature, Daniel in Babylon, etc.; the real subject of most of these was progress in the nineteenth century. In 1862-67 he raised £10,000 by lecturing, and built a series of Methodist chapels in seaside towns. He helped to found and edit the Methodist Recorder. From 1868-73 he was virtually the head of Canadian Methodism. In 1868 and 1872 he was fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He returned to England, and was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference of 1874. He was appointed to the Home Mission Department in 1875; in 1876-78 he was the leader of those who persuaded the Wesleyan Conference to admit lay representatives. Apart from his lectures and sermons, he published a series of devotional poems, Sabbath Chimes (1867), a Wesleyan imitation of Keble's Christian Year. He died at Brixton Hill, April 14, 1881.

PUNTAMBA, India, is the headquarters of a district of the same name in the BOMBAY CONFERENCE. It is located 200 miles east of Bombay City on the Godavari River, which is regarded by Hindus as sacred. Many thousands of pilgrims visit the town annually. It is within the civil district of Ahmednagar.

Methodism has a strong self-supporting church and operates a service program that includes (1) the Bowen Bruere Hospital, named for a greatly loved and fervent young second-generation Methodist missionary who died while serving here; (2) a rural high school, coeducational, which extends preferential treatment to boys and girls from villages and tries to maintain an atmosphere of rural simplicity; (3) hostels for selected boys and girls; and (4) an extension agency that promotes adult literacy, church membership, evangelism, and training for community service.

One of the circuits in the district centers in Sanganner, where Samuel Rahator and others representing The Methodist Church, British connection, carried on an active and productive evangelistic program for years. The work was made over to the Bombay Annual Conference in 1944.

PURCELL, CLARE (1884-1964), American bishop, was born on Nov. 17, 1884, at Columbia, Ala. He was educated at BIRMINGHAM SOUTHERN COLLEGE and the Divinity School of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and received honorary degrees from three other institutions. He joined the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South in 1906, and was appointed to Wedowee. His other appointments in North Alabama included Madison, Owenton Church in BIRMINGHAM, Sylacauga, Hartselle, Talladega, Tuscaloosa and Gadsden, and superintendents of the Jasper District. He was a chaplain of the 131st Infantry, U.S. Army, with the American Expeditionary Forces during the first World War.

Clare Purcell was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, 1930, 1934, and 1938—at which last he was elected bishop and assigned to the CHARLOTTE Area. His brethren credited a speech he made in favor of unification during the debate on this matter as having much to do with his election, as this speech came at a critical moment and was noteworthy as coming from a delegate from the deep South. As bishop he served on the powerful COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, becoming its president in 1940. He also served on the Board of EDUCATION and Board of MISSIONS and then was chairman of the Trustees of LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY, 1938-48. He was assigned to the Birmingham Area in 1948, where he served until his retirement in 1956. He was president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1955-56. A man of great balance and sagacity, he enjoyed the respect and esteem of all his compeers.

After retirement, he continued to live in Birmingham until his death on Feb. 8, 1964, and is buried there.

PURITANISM AND METHODISM. The term "Puritan" may refer to any person concerned with renovation of religious thought and practice from the earliest centuries to the present. In late sixteenth-century England it referred to those who sought to continue the Protestant Reformation by establishing what they understood to be "pure" forms of doctrine, worship and church polity. Often these attempts to reform the church involved political action aimed at religious liberty and constitutional rights. Convinced that Christianity demanded a vibrant faith based on an experiential relationship with the God revealed in Christ, the Puritans took scripture as their primary guide of thought and action. Their ethical idealism, when rigidly practiced, tended to separate them from their neighbors.

Methodism's well-disciplined, circumspect, and sometimes austere mode of Christian living revived for many of JOHN WESLEY's contemporaries the spirit and practice found in Puritan models of the previous century. Bishop Warburton, Samuel Johnson, Horace Walpole, and others could, in Warburton's words, identify the "true character of Methodism" with that of the "old Precisians, Puritans, and Independents." This similarity in teaching and practice, so often recognized by friend and foe alike, denotes only one among several points of contact between the two movements.

The interconnection of Methodism with Puritanism has its origin in John and Charles Wesley's own Puritan heritage. Both their grandfathers and two of their great grandfathers had been Puritans of some renown. SAMUEL WESLEY's grandfather, Bartholomew Westley, and his father, John Westley, were ejected from their churches when they refused to accept the requirements of the Act of Uniformity imposed on Church of England clergy in 1662. SUSANNA WESLEY's maternal grandfather, JOHN WHITE, a member of the Long Parliament, took an active role in the examination and ejection of many Anglican clergymen during the Puritan regime. Her father, SAMUEL ANNESLEY, one of the most eminent ministers of London, unwilling to conform in 1662, became a leader of the disenfranchised Puritan community.

While Samuel and Susanna left this Nonconformist heritage to return to the Church of England, they carried with them many emphases of their early religious training. Samuel Wesley's disciplined daily scholarship concentrating in biblical study may perhaps be traced to his Puritan preceptors. Exposed in his Puritan home to the reality of a personal religious experience, Samuel proclaimed "the inward witness" to his sons even from his death bed. Susanna's influence through her typically Puritan regulation of the family household can hardly be overestimated. The rigid discipline; the careful timetable which left little room for "light" diversions; the insistence on personal and family meditation, devotion, and religious study; the expectation of genuine piety are all strikingly similar to Puritan prototypes. Influenced, perhaps unconsciously, by these Puritan emphases the Wesley brothers retained them throughout their own lives.

John Wesley readily admitted his public and university education had prejudiced him against the Nonconformists. Nevertheless, when his own study led him to Puritan writings he found there many qualities and teachings congenial to his own religious experiences. Overcoming his prejudices, he did not hesitate to abridge and publish numerous Puritan tracts and treatises for the instruction of the Methodists. Of the some fifty abridgments and abstracts published by Wesley as separate volumes, more than a third are by Puritan authors. In his Christian Library, designed specifically for guidance in Christian thought and life—termed by him "practical divinity"—Puritan authors predominate both in number and space allotted. Wesley's introductory comments to these works in the Christian Library expresses his opinion of their value: "The peculiar excellency of these writers seems to be, the building us up in our most holy faith . . . They lead us by the hand in the paths of righteousness, and shew us how we may most surely and swiftly grow in grace." Wesley found in the Puritan writings sound doctrine scripturally grounded and practical instruction in Christian living which might serve as guidance for his followers. Guided by the MORAVIAN pietists Wesley had come to an insistence on the priority of God's grace appropriated by man through faith alone and witnessed to by a believer's knowledge of his own relationship with God. When he looked for English material stressing these doctrines he found them among the Puritans. Supporting his position that a believer might enjoy personal assurance of God's grace, Wesley identifies this doctrine with that held by Puritans such as William Perkins, Richard Sibbes, and John Preston.

Wesley and the Puritans shared the conviction that SANCTIFICATION as well as JUSTIFICATION rested on faith alone. The Puritan doctrine which recognized sin and repentance even in believing Christians became one of Wesley's defenses against Moravian quietism for he saw it as "continually tearing up the roots of Antinomianism." Of course, Wesley rejected the Calvinistic predestinarianism accepted by most Puritans and corrected this in his abridgments, although he did find support for his own position in the works of Puritans Richard Baxter and John Goodwin. Richard Baxter also held a theory of "final justification" which is similar to that taught by Wesley.

Not only these theological affinities to the Puritans but also their practical instructions in daily living attracted Wesley to these works. JOSEPH ALLEINE'S An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners and Richard Baxter's A Call to the Unconverted became standard Methodist evangelical publications. Wesley's insistence on self-examination and holiness found able representation in several Puritan works. For his explication of Christian conscience Wesley turns to that offered by his grandfather, Dr. Annesley. Christian family worship as delineated in Philip Henry's Method of Family Prayer became instruction for Methodists in this area. Wesley issued at least three editions of William Whately's Directions for Married Persons, commenting, "I have seen nothing of the subject in any either ancient or modern tongue, which is in any degree comparable to it." Wesley's own educational philosophy certainly paralleled that of the Puritans and it may be that KINGSWOOD SCHOOL was patterned at least in part on the Dissenting Academies. A succinct abridgment of Richard Baxter's The Reformed Pastor incorporated in Wesley's Minutes became the standard outline for Methodist pastoral visitation and religious instruction.

In the independent Methodist worship services supplementing regular Anglican services, Wesley appropriated several distinctive Puritan forms of worship. His use of extemporaneous preaching and "free" prayers to appeal to those uncomfortable in formal worship had certainly been anticipated in Nonconformist worship. One of the unique services of Methodist worship—the service of covenant renewal—was patterned after JOSEPH and RICHARD ALLEINE's formula and directions for making a personal covenant with God. John and Charles Wesley found in the hymns of ISAAC WATTS a model for their own remarkable hymnody. Wesley's abridgment of The Book of Common Prayer for American Methodism may also have followed the suggested changes offered by the Presbyterian Divines at the Savoy Conference (1661). At least, most of their suggested changes are incorporated in Wesley's abridgment.

Wesley's Puritan selections constitute only a part of his genuine eclecticism which drew from any source materials expressing a useful interpretation of the Gospel and offering practical instruction in Christian living. Nevertheless, Wesley's extensive appropriation of Puritan teachings and patterns guaranteed a significant Puritan impact upon later Methodism.

Many of Wesley's co-workers shared his appreciation of the Puritan tradition and teachings. JOHN FLETCHER, his chief ally in theological controversy, extensively quoted Baxter, Matthew Henry, John Owen, Daniel Williams, and others. Often dependent on the Biblical exposition of Matthew Henry, Charles Wesley also credited Baxter with helping him combat Antinomianism. THOMAS COKE acknowledged the influence of Alleine's Alarm. FRANCIS ASBURY's Journal and Letters make frequent reference to Puritan works and he, like Wesley, understood Baxter's The Reformed Pastor to be the pattern for Christian ministers. Early American Methodists printed and sold many of Wesley's Puritan abridgments.

Later Methodists continued this interest in the Puritan tradition, as is seen in the extensive Puritan library amassed by THOMAS JACKSON, nineteenth-century editor of Wesley's Works. ADAM CLARKE, author of the most famous Methodist Biblical commentary, acknowledges his indebtedness to Henry Ainsworth's notes on the Pentateuch and recommends the interpretations of many Puritan commentators. A modern revival of Puritan study by Methodist scholars such as Gordon Wakefield, John Wilkinon, Gordon Rupp, FRANK BAKER, and John Newton indicates the continuing interconnection of the two traditions.

A common concern for a genuine personal religion dependent on God's grace and evidenced in a recognizable Christian mode of life brought the Puritan and Methodist traditions together. Perhaps, in the words of Horton Davies, Methodism revived "the evangelical passion and experiential religion" of Puritanism. Methodist interest in Puritanism has continued because of these central values found in the genuinely Christian life.

PUSEY, GEORGE B. (1845-1933). American layman and philanthropist, was born at PITTSBURGH, Pa., on Oct. 22, 1845, the son of William B. and Jane H. Pusey. In his youth George Pusey learned the ways of business by serving as retail clerk, salesman, and manager in various mercantile businesses in Pittsburgh. As a young man he established his own wallpaper business. This business prospered and enabled him to accumulate a fortune estimated to exceed two million dollars at the time of his death.

Pusey never married. Beyond his business his chief interest was his church. He was a member of the former downtown Christ M. E. Church in Pittsburgh and a member of its board of trustees at the time the church was destroyed by fire in 1892. Along with other members of Christ Church residing in Pittsburgh's Northside area, he led in organizing Calvary M.E. Church, becoming one of the first trustees of the church. This congregation built a fine stone building in 1893 which remains as an excellent example of truly Gothic architecture. During his lifetime Pusey contributed liberally to his local church and to the conference and missionary organizations of Methodism. He died on Aug. 31, 1933 at his winter home in Orlando, Fla. After several bequests to employees and friends, the bulk of his estate was distributed to the charities he had supported during his lifetime. Chief beneficiaries were Calvary Church, the M.E. Board of Foreign Missions, the Methodist Church Union of Pittsburgh, the Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A. of Pittsburgh and several local hospitals. Pusey's bequest has enabled Calvary Church to continue an effective service in a neighborhood which has become an area of typical innercity bi-racial population.

PUTINI, EPIHA (c. 1816-1856), prominent NEW ZEALAND Methodist Maori layman, was born son of Chief Te Rangitaahua Ngamuka, was baptized in 1835, and took the name of Epiha Putini (JABEZ BUNTING). He was trained at Mangungu and became teacher and preacher among his own people at Pehiakra and Ihumatao until his death at about the age of forty in 1856. He was prominent in efforts to bring about cooperation between the missionary societies of the various churches and exerted himself for the welfare of his own people.

FRITZ HONG-KYU PYUN

PYEN, FRITZ HONG-KYU (1899-), a bishop of the Korean Methodist Church, was born in Chunan, KOREA, on May 28, 1899. He studied in Kongju Methodist Mission School, and finished high school at the German-Chinese High School in Tsingtao, China in 1919. He graduated from HAMLINE UNIVERSITY in 1926, and received the B.D. and Th.D. degree from DREW THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL in 1928 and 1931 respectively. While a student at Drew, Dr. Pyen was an instructor in German. The German language, as well as that non-Korean first name, was acquired while interned with a German Lutheran missionary in Tsingtao, China, during the first World War.

He was ordained in the NEWARK CONFERENCE in 1929, and then held pastorates in Honolulu, 1931-33, and Harbin, Manchuria, 1933-34. In 1934 he joined the faculty of the Methodist Theological Seminary in SEoul, and four years later became its first Korean president (1938).

The anti-Christian government closed the seminary in 1940, and Dr. Pyen served as pastor of Chong-Kyo Church, Seoul, 1941-43, and East Gate Church, Seoul, 1943-46. In 1942 he was elected by the General Conference as the "Director-General" of the interim "Korean Methodist Block of the Japanese Christian Church in Korea" but was forced to resign after six months by the Japanese officials.

Shortly after the Japanese surrender, he reopened the Methodist Seminary which he headed until 1948 when he assumed the pastorate of South Mountain Church in Seoul. When the Seoul churches were closed by the Communist invasion he organized a church in Pusan. When Seoul was reopened in 1953, he resumed the pastorate of the South Mountain Church and continued to serve there until elected bishop of the Korean Methodist Church by the General Conference of that Church on March 4, 1967.

Bishop Pyen's first wife, Ban-Syuk Kim, perished in a tragic fire. She was the sister-in-law of Bishop J. S. RYANG and quite prominent. Bishop Pyen married Naptuk Kim on June 10, 1955.

Bishop Pyen was present and sat in and with the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS OF THE United Methodist Church at the Uniting Conference in DALLAS in 1968.

Having reached the age of retirement in 1970, he attended the General Conference meeting at St. Louis, and then stepped aside to accept the presidency of the Los Angeles Bible College and Seminary, newly established under Korean auspices.

PYKE, JAMES HOWELL (1845-1924), a pioneer missionary in NORTH CHINA, was born near Glenwood, Ind., July 9, 1845. He was educated at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY. In 1873 with Anabel Goodrich as his bride, he sailed for China, where he served as organizer of churches, as district and conference evangelist, and as missionary-in-charge of two districts. He was a charter member of the North China Conference when it was organized in 1893, and was a presiding elder (1884-1908). In 1903 he was decorated by the Emperor of China for his handling of the indemnity claims growing out of the Boxer Uprising.

W. W. REID

PYKE, RICHARD (1873-1965), British Methodist, was born at Sampford Courtney, Devon, in 1873. He entered the ministry of the BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH in 1894, and his long and successful ministry was largely confined to the West Country. From 1915 to 1922 he was governor of Shebbear College, and from 1922 to 1949 bursar of Edgehill College. A tall, thin, commanding figure, he was chosen as President of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH in 1927, and as president of the Methodist Church in 1939. He retired to BRISTOL in 1949 and continued to preach for many years. He died on Sept. 20, 1965.

QUAKERS AND METHODISM. Like the Methodists, the Quakers had originated as a movement dedicated to the inculcation of personal religious experience and to securing the spiritual reform of the Established Church; they called themselves a "society," but accepted as their most familiar title a derisive nickname. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the early days of the revival it was frequently a friendly Quaker who gave protection and support to the persecuted Methodists. Although drawn together against their common enemies in the world, however, rivalry did develop between the two groups, who remained so far different in their views that they continued to seek proselytes from among each others' members. The Friends' quietist views on the MEANS OF GRACE especially distressed WESLEY, who maintained that because of this "a great gulf" was fixed between them. This was widened by the Quakers' formal insistence upon their peculiar and superficial "testimonies" in dress and speech, which Wesley termed "mere superstition."

Nevertheless the Society of Friends did exercise a beneficial influence upon Methodism. In himself insisting upon plain speech and simple dress Wesley acknowledged his debt to the Quakers. The Methodist QUARTERLY MEETING owed at least some of its inspiration (through JOHN BENNET) to the Friends, and they strongly influenced Methodist opposition to the slave traffic, just as Wesley's Thoughts upon Slavery was largely an abridgment of Anthony Benezet's Some Historical Account of Guinea—an abridgment warmly approved by the original author. Throughout the succeeding generations the Methodists and the Society of Friends have similarly maintained parallel courses, the social witness of Methodism enriched by that of the Friends, and they in turn gaining some warmth and flexibility in their spirituality in part at least from Methodist influences. Rarely, however, have Methodists been able to understand the more mystical aspects of Quaker teaching upon the "inner light," nor Friends to appreciate the sacramental emphasis which the Methodists derived from Wesley.

QUARTERAGE. The word "quarterage," meaning quarterly payments for the support of the ministry, is used in the 1796 Discipline, but it is not found in the book after that date. RICHARD BOARDMAN and probably ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE held quarterly meetings of societies and circuits.

In describing the work in 1772, JESSE LEE said the preachers regulated their business at different quarterly meetings. The quarterage was collected in preparation for the quarterly meetings and it was distributed or paid to the preachers at the meetings. Asbury's Journal for Dec. 22, 1772, says that at a quarterly meeting in MARYLAND, "Brother Strawbridge received eight pounds quarterage; brother King and myself six pounds each." Incidentally, that is the earliest known documentary reference to "quarterage" in Methodist writings. In explaining the word "quarterage" Simpson's Cyclopaedia of Methodism, published in 1876, says, "on stations and in cities this term is not so generally employed as formerly; but it is still in use on the circuits." Perhaps it is fair to say that as long as presiding elders were required to hold a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE on each charge every three months, and as long as it was the custom to divide the amount raised for the support of the ministry during the preceding quarter on a percentage ratio between the presiding elder and the preacher in charge, apparently the word quarterage was used on some circuits down to the beginning of the twentieth century and a little later.

QUARTERLY CONFERENCE, THE. The Quarterly Conference (renamed by the United Methodist Church in 1968 the Charge Conference) has been the traditional business and governing body of the local charge or station in American Methodism. It has continued to be so to the present time, though it may abrogate its rights in certain important particulars to the OFFICIAL BOARD of the church—or to a Church Conference—should it decide to do so. Recent changes have been made in this Conference—now the Charge Conference—under the Constitution of 1968, but it yet remains the sovereign and controlling body in each local charge.

Apparently called Quarterly Meetings at first in America—as the equivalent body is still called in Britain—in time the name came to be Quarterly Conference instead of Quarterly Meeting. ASBURY and COKE in their Notes on the Discipline indicated that the ruling elder, then becoming known as the presiding elder, should always preside at the several Quarterly Conferences under his charge, and this presidency came to be an established rule in Methodism as Quarterly Conferences grew in status and in standing.

The DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT, however, as the presiding elder is now called, in presiding has no vote since he is not a member. He cannot even resolve a tie if there is a tie vote. In the absence of the district superintendent, an elder "designated by him" is empowered to preside. Sometimes the pastor himself is so designated. The Quarterly Conference is and in general always has been composed of all the traveling, supernumerary, and retired preachers residing within its circuit or charge. To these were added in time local preachers, exhorters, deaconesses, and thus this body has always been fully representative of the ministry. But making up the vast majority of the Quarterly Conference have always been local church lay officials—at first stewards and trustees, but in later years added to them, financial secretaries, treasurers, church school superintendents, and other ex officio members.

In the United Methodist Church, the members of the newly named Administrative Board—who are to all intents practically the same as those formerly known in The Methodist Church as stewards and official board members—now are members of the Charge Conference. The name steward, except that of the district steward, does not appear in the 1968 Discipline as the name of a church officer. The members at large of the administrative board are referred to by the Discipline of 1968 not as stewards, but as members of this board.

Traditionally no quorum has ever been required for a Quarterly Conference, as the members present at the time and place regularly appointed for a Quarterly Conference constitute a quorum. Occasions have been known where only the district superintendent and the pastor in charge were present, but if proper announcement had been made, a Quarterly Conference could be held and was valid. However, there has been a regulation within recent years that no property can be sold, purchased, nor any lien created upon church property unless ten days' notice has been given of such intent.

Also in a circuit where there are two or more churches, where real or personal property of a separate church is involved, or a merger of churches is to be considered, each local church shall organize a church local conference. This gives a local church a right to represent its own interests apart from the larger church conference of the circuit.

The Quarterly (Charge) Conference has electoral powers. It elects its own members once a year for the succeeding year, except the clerical or ministerial members who belong to the Annual Conference, and this automatically puts them in the Quarterly Conference. It elects stewards, trustees, and church school officials, and the like, though under certain circumstances it may provide for the election of these officials by a formal church conference. In addition to officers of the local church, the Quarterly Conference elects the church's lay representative to the Annual Conference, and to the District Conference when there is one.

For long years in Episcopal Methodism the preacher in charge had the sole right to nominate the lay officials of the church, and since these lay officials made up and make up, as they do now, the majority of the Quarterly Conference, to that extent the pastor exercised potential control of that body. However, in The Methodist Church after 1939, a nominating committee was created to nominate all the officials to be elected by the Quarterly Conference, though the pastor was made chairman of this committee and if there was no committee, he himself was to make all nominations. This power granted the pastor has been greatly criticized and has been so since earliest days of American Methodism. In their Notes appended to the Discipline of 1796, Bishops Asbury and Coke defended the pastor's right to name the stewards by himself, saying that the pastor was the one who "is likely to be the best judge of the society at large and of each member in particular." Later on stewards came to be elected by the Quarterly Conference, but as described above, on nomination of the pastor.

The Quarterly Conference formerly had the right to license men to preach, but in The United Methodist Church this right has now been placed for many years in the hands of a committee of ministers headed by the district superintendent. However, no one can be licensed by this ministerial committee unless his Quarterly Conference has nominated or approved him.

In its supervisory powers, the Annual Conference creates many committees which have to do with the ongoing of the work. Up until 1968 certain commissions were obligatory in each local church, and these were to be elected by the Quarterly Conference though they were responsible to the Official Board. This regulation has been somewhat changed, though the Committee on Pastor-Parish Relations, that on Finance, and that on Nominations and Personnel are mandatory.

There can scarcely be a conflict between the Quarterly (Charge) Conference and the Official (Administrative) Board since they are both composed of the same persons and work generally in the same field. The Quarterly Conference, however, presided over by the district superintendent who represents the general Church, is the connective link between each local church and the general Church. The district superintendent must ask the same questions at every Charge Conference which he asks at any one, and so connective uniformity is maintained all up and down the line. The Official (Administrative) Board represents a local church only, and without the connective bond of the Charge Conference may tend to keep the individual church somewhat isolated in its own plans and life. The Charge Conference "is the basic unit in the connective system of The United Methodist Church." (Discipline, P. 144.)

The name Charge Conference was adopted in 1968 for Quarterly Conference in the United Methodist Church. All other Methodist Churches continue to use the name Quarterly Conference, which had been the name since the early days of Asbury. It is understood that each General Conference may make minor alterations in matters of membership, powers and specific duties of this body, as has always been the case, and may revise it at any session as was done in 1968.

QUARTERLY REVIEW OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1889. The first issue appeared in January 1890, with J. W. Etter, editor. It began with a circulation of 625 subscribers, but at the end of the quadrennium there were only 152 remaining. In mid-1891 the editor was elected professor of systematic theology in Union Biblical Seminary, Dayton, Ohio. He enlisted the support of his fellow faculty members, so that the General Conference of 1893 gave editorial responsibility to the faculty as a group. However, at the end of the year 1893, the Publishing House discontinued the magazine.

A group of nineteen church leaders organized "The Review Publishing Association" and revived the magazine without losing an issue. GEORGE M. MATHEWS, pastor of First Church, Dayton, voluntarily served as editor without remuneration for the remainder of the quadrennium. The General Conference of 1897 gave official recognition to the magazine with continued supervision by the Review Committee. When Mathews became associate editor of the Religious Telescope in 1898, he was replaced as Review editor by H. H. FOUT, pastor of Oak Street Church, Dayton.

The publishing house was directed by the 1901 General Conference to take full responsibility of the Quarterly Review. H. A. Thompson, associate editor of Sabbath School literature, became the new Review editor. In 1902 the magazine was increased to six issues and renamed the United Brethren Review. After continued losses, the publishing house discontinued the magazine at the end of 1908.

WILLIAM A. QUAYLE

QUAYLE, WILLIAM ALFRED (1860-1925), American bishop and renowned orator, was born at Parkville, Mo., on June 25, 1860. His father was a miner and both parents were born on the Isle of Man. They had come to the United States in search of opportunities for more comfortable living. They were journeying to the west across MISSOURI when the baby was born a few miles from the KANSAS line. As the child grew he had the physical characteristics and the whimsical imagination of his Manx ancestors and was always proud to think he was a Manxman.

While his father was working in the mines of COLORADO his mother died, and there were years of search for her unmarked grave when he had grown to maturity. As a boy he found a home with a Kansas farmer. He went to BAKER UNIVERSITY at Baldwin, Kan., and there he graduated. Having been licensed to preach, his first pastorate was Osage City, Kan. He was called to the faculty of Baker University, and while he was still a young man, after a few years of teaching, he was elected to the presidency of his alma mater.

In many ways Quayle was a genius, and his preaching as he visited communities in behalf of the University gave him such a reputation that he was sought by large churches. He resigned the presidency of Baker to become pastor of Independence Avenue Church in KANSAS CITY. From there he went to the Meridian Street Church in INDIANAPOLIS. He returned to Kansas City to the pastorate of the Grand Avenue Temple. His fourth large city church was St. James in CHICAGO. He was so brilliantly gifted and such a unique phraser and preacher that one of the Chicago daily papers printed every Monday one of his Sunday sermons. He became a bishop in the M.E. Church in 1908 and served until retirement in 1924.

There was too much individuality in him for him to fit into any pattern, even that of the episcopacy. He was never at home in administrative tasks, but people would journey hundreds of miles to hear him preach at conference. At each conference session he gave a lecture for which tickets were sold for the benefit of some church fund. His famous lecture on "Jean Valjean" is remembered today by hundreds. Another remembered lecture of his was "Napoleon Bonaparte—Democrat."

He loved books and acquired a large library. He would deny himself food and raiment to buy valuable books, and there is found today in the library of Baker University one of the most valuable collections of Bibles in the world which he brought together. In his pastorates he used once a month to give a lecture on a literary theme. One of his themes for such lectures in Chicago was "Shakespeare's Heroines." He loved nature, birds, flowers, and trees. This love was a heritage from the ancestors who lived on the picturesque Isle of Man. His descriptions of the beauties of God's out-of-doors were so thrilling that his greatest biographer, MERTON S. RICE, called him "The Skylark of Methodism."

Because of ill health he retired as bishop in 1924, writing to the General Conference, "Mine has been a sunny life, radiant as spring." He died on March 9, 1925.

IVAN LEE HOLT

QUEEN, LOUISE LEATHERWOOD (1923-), American lay woman, was born in Haywood County, N. C., on March 9, 1923, the daughter of William Pinckney and Margaret Kirkpatrick Leatherwood. She attended Woman's College of the University of North Carolina, Greensboro, N. C. She was married to Earl Wilson Caldwell (deceased 1947) on June 20, 1942, and to them were born two sons, William Earl and Wayne Wilson. In 1949 she married Kenneth A. Stahl (divorced 1962), and on July 9, 1963, she married Rufus G. Queen, who had two daughters, Pamela June and Dariacia Jan.

Louise Queen was employed as secretary to the Superintendent of Haywood County Public Schools from 1946 to 1951. She then assisted ELMER T. CLARK in setting up his office at Lake Junaluska, N. C., acting as his secretary in the work of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies and the World Methodist Council until his retirement as executive secretary of those bodies. She continued in the same office under ALBEE GODBOLD, who became executive secretary of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies in 1963, and she is now administrative and editorial assistant to JOHN H. NESS, JR., in the Commission on Archives and History. She has served as illustration editor and copy editor of this Encyclopedia, in addition to preparing the general index for this work.

Mrs. Queen's local church membership is in Long's Chapel United Methodist Church, LAKE JUNALUSKA, where she has held numerous offices. She has served as secretary of the Wesleyan Service Guild of the Western North Carolina Annual Conference, and has been active in numerous other church and civic organizations.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF MELBOURNE

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia. As early as 1855, only a year after the Melbourne University was founded, the idea of a College affiliated with each of the universities of SYDNEY and MELBOURNE found voice in the first Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Conference.

Though ten acres in the University reserve at Carlton had been set aside by the Government for this purpose, over twenty years were to pass before the VICTORIAN AND TASMANIAN CONFERENCE took steps to utilize the concession.

The efforts to found a Central Theological Institution for the whole of Australia, made during subsequent years, broke down, on the matter of finance, and arrangements were made to train the men in existing establishments. In 1871 the Provisional Theological Institution for Victoria and Tasmania was linked up with Wesley College, Melbourne—students going into residence for both general and theological training.

In 1878 the Conference appointed a committee to raise funds for the purpose of building a College for general educational purposes, and also "if possible to house theological students." W. A. Quick undertook the task of canvassing for money, and by December 1884, was able to report money in hand and promises amounting to £6,370. A small endowment fund was also provided, chiefly from a half share in the land of an earlier Wesleyan Immigrant's Home in Carlton. With further help from the Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund in 1886, the Conference resolved that the College should be erected in the Jubilee year of Queen Victoria's reign and for that reason, be called "Queen's." The foundation stone was laid on June 19, 1887, by His Excellency Sir Henry Brougham (later Lord Loch).

EDWARD HOLDSWORTH SUGDEN, an English Wesleyan minister, was appointed its first master. He arrived with his wife and family to take charge in January 1888. On March 14, 1888, the College was officially opened by the Governor.

The Council appointed by the Conference to administer the affairs of the College, elected W. A. Quick as its first chairman and E. W. Nye as its secretary. Quick was President of the Council for twenty-one years, contributing more than anyone else, outside the master, to the well-being of the College. Its first master, E. H. Sugden, gave outstanding service for forty years, from 1888-1928. He was followed by Rev. Kennwick from 1928-33 and Raynor Johnson from 1934-66. A. E. Albiston was Professor of Theology from 1920-38, followed by Calvert Barber, 1937-59 and Norman Lade, 1959-66.

Although the College was in financial difficulties in its early days, the gifts of many liberal benefactors have enabled it to steadily expand. In 1889 the College had thirteen students; by 1968 there was accommodation for 220 students and ninety non-resident students. Alongside it stands St. Hilda's Methodist-Presbyterian University College for girls.

The Theological Hall (founded 1871) is the organ of the Victorian and Tasmanian Conference charged with the training of men accepted as candidates for the ministry. It is not a separate College, but is associated with Queen's College where almost all of its students are in residence. It is under the direction of a principal, Professor Norman Lade; with whom are associated Professors of Biblical Studies and Systematic Theology. The Methodist Theological Hall works in close collaboration with that of the Presbyterian Church.

When Queen's College was founded the Conference resolved that "such College be made available, as far as practicable, for the training of our Theological students." Efforts were later made to establish a central Theological Institution for the whole of Australia. These broke down, and subsequently the provisional Theological Institution for Victoria and Tasmania was formed and linked, first with Wesley College (1871) and in 1889 with Queen's College. Here the students were under the direction of the Master, E. H. Sugden. In 1892 the Conference set up a separate committee to administer the Theological Institution. In 1920 A. E. Albiston was appointed as Theological tutor (later Professor of Theology) with full oversight of the curriculum of five years, three of which are spent chiefly in University studies and two in the B.D. course of the Melbourne College of Divinity and in other theological and pastoral studies.

QUEENSLAND CONFERENCE, Australia. Methodism in Queensland dates from 1847 when William Moore, Wesleyan Methodist minister from SYDNEY, began services in a hired hall in the main street of BRISBANE, at South Brisbane and in the nearby settlement of Zion Hill. Brisbane was then a struggling township of a few hundred people; today it is the capital city of the State and has a population of over 600,000. In less than a year Moore began the work at the mining township of Ipswich, twenty-five miles west of Brisbane. He was followed by a succession of ministers who established Wesleyan Methodist preaching places wherever possible.

In 1855 AUSTRALIA became an independent Conference with William B. Boyce as President, and headquarters at Sydney, New South Wales. Queensland then became a circuit in the New South Wales District. It was constituted a separate District in 1863. Complete autonomy was attained in 1893 when it became a separate Conference, having thirty ministers. Henry Youngman was the first President.

Its Jubilee was celebrated in 1897. By that time the church was represented in every important center and in a great many small townships throughout the State. There were ninety-four churches and seventy-seven other preaching places; thirty-two ministers and 139 local preachers; 2,742 church members, 18,109 adherents and 101 Sunday schools with 9,337 scholars and 938 teachers. A Thanksgiving Fund of £5,000 was fully subscribed.

The PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH began in Queensland in 1860 under the auspices of the British Conference with W. Colley as minister. The first church was built in Brisbane in 1861. The work spread quickly and widely.

The UNITED METHODIST CHURCH was introduced in 1873, but its activities were limited. The BIBLE CHRISTIANS began in 1886 and soon had several churches in Brisbane and Ipswich. Before the turn of the century the Bible Christians and the United Methodist Church were merged with the Wesleyan Methodist Church. After some years of negotiation the Primitive and Wesleyan Methodist Churches were united in 1898, and HENRY YOUNGMAN was the first President of the Conference.

In 1905 Conference made the first organized effort to provide the ordinances of religion in the scattered communities in the vast inland of the State. A minister, equipped with a horse-drawn wagon, travelled extensively under difficult conditions, visiting the cattle stations, mining camps and sheep properties, conducting services and counselling the people in need.

As a result a number of home mission stations and circuits were created and young ministers appointed to them. Eventually three large mission areas were constituted and sturdy motor vehicles provided, making it possible to patrol thousands of miles and extend a ministry to lonely settlers, shearers, drovers and others.

The Centenary of Methodism in Queensland took place in 1947. The programme included a Crusade for the renewal of the Church and a Thanksgiving Fund of £100,000. The secretaries, C. A. Read and A. W. Preston, visited every circuit and home mission station, conducting evangelistic missions and quickening the interest of the members of the Church in the celebrations. R. S. C. Dingle compiled a history of the Church in Queensland, which was published in a 300-page book entitled Annals of Achievement.

At this time there were 126 ministers, 16,000 members of the Church, and 16,279 Sunday school scholars.

The Centenary ushered in an era of prosperity in which many handsome church buildings were erected and new activities introduced. Special emphasis was placed upon Christian education for young people. The programme was carried out in holiday camps, a Training College for Christian workers in Brisbane, in Teacher and Leader training courses, and through the mail bag Sunday school for the children of the inland. The work was under the direction of a succession of gifted ministers—H. A. Denny, H. W. Prouse, T. N. Deller, and I. W. Alcorn.

Statistics for the Queensland Conference as of May 1969, were as follows: 149 ministers in active work; 440 churches; 21,035 members.

The Home Mission Society was formed in 1864 for "the evangelization of Queensland without respect of colour, class or creed." This aim has been pursued persistently and is prominent today. The Society has been responsible for initiating numerous circuits and has provided from its agents many candidates for the ministry. It has been associated directly with the Methodist Inland Mission which is an activity of the General Conference for sending ministers into the vast areas in the central, western and northern parts of the country.

The Methodist work in many new housing settlements has been undertaken by the Society; it has administered hostels for students, homes for underprivileged children and homes for discharged men and women prisoners as well as supplying chaplains for hospitals and public institutions.

It introduced the Order of Deaconesses into the State and undertook the training of young women for the work.

Some of these activities are now conducted independently, while the Society turns its attention to other pressing needs—including a Mission to Aborigines and Islanders in North Queensland. A recent feature of the Home Mission work is its cooperation in new housing areas with the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches. The Society has been administered by a succession of competent superintendents—W. H. Harrison, A. A. Mills, J. A. Pratt, C. A. Read, N. H. Grimmett, and G. D. Smith.

Life Line is an organization which offers help to distressed people twenty-four hours a day. Thousands of men and women with fears and worries, beset by personal and domestic problems are counselled every year under the direction of the Rev. Alan Kidd, who is assisted by scores of voluntary workers. The well-known slogan is "Help is as near as the telephone." This social service enjoys public appreciation and support.

Inland Missions. In 1905 Conference made the first organized effort to minister to the scattered communities in the vast inland of the State. As a result of much sacrificial giving and prayer, a minister equipped with a horse-drawn wagon travelled extensively under difficult conditions over a wide area. This work was developed when young ministers were stationed at strategic centers. Eventually three large Mission areas were constituted. Today ten men with mobile units patrol thousands of square miles to minister to lonely settlers, shearers, drovers and others.

Church Schools. The Queensland Conference conducts six Church Schools in cooperation with the Presbyterian Church, which are administered by the Presbyterian and Methodist Schools' Association. They are Brisbane Boys'

College, Somerville House (girls), Clayfield College (girls), and Moreton Bay Girls' High School in the Brisbane area and Thornburgh College (boys) and Blackheath College (girls) at Charters Towers, North Queensland. They cater to students from primary classes to matriculation and are amongst the most reputable public schools in Australia.

Young People's Department H. A. Denny, first full-time direction appointed in 1920, began an era of extraordinary development. He introduced teacher and leader training and modern equipment into Sunday schools; began a "Mail-Bag" Sunday school for out-back children; opened a holiday camp at the seaside where thousands of young people have received intensive Christian education at vacation times. There are now eight such camps serving the entire State. A Training College for Christian Workers is conducted by C. D. Alcorn and H. C. Krohn, where nearly 100 are in residence each year. The present Director, I. W. Alcorn, has two ministerial colleagues and one lay assistant. Young people constitute a large and lively part of the Church today. (See also BRISBANE.)

QUETTA, Pakistan. This city is about 550 miles west of Lahore and a similar distance north of Karachi and has train and air connection with both these important cities. There is also rail connection with Zahidan, a Persian frontier town to the West. Quetta is capital of Baluchistan Province, and the Administrative center for the Tribal Area. It has a large, well-organized Cantonment. Not far distant is a fine Thermal Plant completed in 1963-64. Quetta occupies a strategic location in case of an invasion from the West.

Methodist Work: The destructive Quetta earthquake of 1935 demolished the former church building. A temporary building then erected was replaced by the well-built Bethel Church, in 1959. Its pastor, K. L. Peter (who serves also as district superintendent) is supported by the congregation, and his wife is principal of the thriving Primary School which meets in the old temporary church building. A well known and very popular Mission Hospital belonging to the Anglican Church is widely known because of two of its famous eye surgeons, father and son, the Drs. Holland.

CLEMENT ROCKEY

QUILLIAN, JOSEPH DILLARD, JR. (1917-), American minister and seminary dean, was born at Buford, Ga., Jan. 30, 1917, the son of Joseph Dillard and Jeannette (Evans) Quillian. He was graduated from Piedmont College, B.A., 1938; VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1941; Yale University, Ph.D., 1951. On Dec. 15, 1944, he was married to Elizabeth Mary Sampson. Their children are: Suzanne Elizabeth, Alma Jeannette, Mary Shannon, Joseph Dillard III, Ellen Evans.

He was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational Church. In 1943 he was received in full connection and ordained elder in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. He was pastor of Hillsboro Circuit, Tennessee, 1938-41; NASHVILLE, 1941-42; Stamford, Conn., 1946-50; president of MARTIN COLLEGE, Pulaski, Tenn., 1950-54. In 1954 he went to be professor of worship and preaching at PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and since 1960 he has been dean of that institution.

Since 1964 he has served as vice chairman of the Commission on WORSHIP. He served to lieutenant commander as chaplain, U. S. Naval Reserve, 1942-46. He is a member of the Association of Methodist Theological Schools, of the Association of American Theological Schools, and of the Council of Southwestern Theological Schools. He is the author (with H. Grady Hardin and James F. White) of The Celebration of the Gospel, 1964.

J. MARVIN RAST

QUILLIAN, PAUL WHITFIELD (1895-1949), American pastor, was born Dec. 19, 1895, at Conyers, Ga., the son of John W. and Lucy (Zachry) Quillian. He was educated at EMORY COLLEGE, A.B., 1914, and SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1924. HENDRIX COLLEGE and Southern Methodist awarded him the D.D. degree, and FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE gave him the LL.D. On July 4, 1916, he married Eula Dupree in Sandersville, Ga., and they had one daughter.

After teaching school, 1914-16, Quillian entered business in 1917, and was president of the Arkansas Soft Drink Manufacturers, 1920-21. Feeling the call to preach, he entered the Southern Methodist ministry and was ordained in 1923. His appointments were: Camden, Ark., 1924-27; Winfield, LITTLE ROCK, 1928-32; St. Luke's, OKLAHOMA CITY, 1933-36; and First Church, HOUSTON, Texas, 1936-49. Under his leadership, First Church was then the world's largest Methodist church with 7,800 members and a staff of twenty-five.

Quillian was a delegate to the UNITING CONFERENCE, 1939, and to five GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1934-38, and 1940-48; to the 1947 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, and to the 1948 ASSEMBLY of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. An able pulpit preacher, he served as a member of the National Christian Mission Team, 1941-42, and 1944. He contributed to the American Pulpit Series, 1945-46, and to Best Sermons, 1946.

He served on the Commission on Unification of American Methodism; was chairman of the Committee on Education in the Uniting Conference; and was a trustee of SOUTHWESTERN and DILLARD UNIVERSITIES, and of the Methodist Hospital in Houston. He was a member of the WESLEY FOUNDATION in TEXAS, the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church, the National Advisory Commission on the Negro College Fund, and the Commission on the resettlement of the Japanese in the United States. He delivered the Thirkiel Lectures at GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1945. A contributor to religious journals and books, he also wrote church school lesson material.

Quillian received large votes for the episcopacy in 1938, 1944, and 1948. In the latter year at the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, he was one of the chief contenders for twenty-six ballots, after which he graciously withdrew. Since he had a brilliant mind and was an excellent preacher and an able administrator, many in the church were surprised that he was never elected a bishop. Bishop PAUL E. MARTIN said, "Paul Quillian was one of the most brilliant and dedicated men the Methodist Church has ever had . . . he was a great administrator, a gifted minister and a wise counselor."

Quillian died suddenly of a heart attack in Houston, March 28, 1949.

QUILLIAN, WILLIAM FLETCHER (1880-1960), American college president and church executive, was born on Dec. 21, 1880, at Lithonia, Ga., the son of William Fletcher and Lucy Ann (Vail) Quillian. EMORY COLLEGE gave him the A.B. degree in 1901, the D.D. in 1921; at VANDERBILT he took post graduate courses, 1912-14. SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY granted him the LL.D. in 1931.

He married Nonie Acree on June 1, 1910, and their children are William Fletcher, Jr. (president, RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE), Christine Mason (Mrs. Hubert Searcy).

Quillian, after serving in various posts including being missionary to MEXICO and editor of the El Educaudo, 1907-11, became president of WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Macon, Ga., 1920-31, at which time he became general secretary of the General Board of Christian EDUCATION of the M.E. Church, South. In 1940, upon Methodist union, he was elected Cultivation Secretary of the Board of Missions and Church Extension of The Methodist Church and resided in NEW YORK from 1940-44. In that year he was elected executive secretary of the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION and moved to ATLANTA, Ga. Upon the sudden death of the president of Wesleyan College at Macon, in October 1950, Quillian acted again as president of that institution until the new president was elected and assumed charge in January 1952. During this time he commuted between Macon and Atlanta, continuing to hold his position as Executive Secretary of the Southeastern Jurisdiction. He occupied this position until his retirement in June 1952.

Quillian was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, 1922, '26, '30, '34 and '38, and of The Methodist Church, 1940 and '44, representing the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE. He was also a member of the Uniting Conference in 1939.

He was on the Executive Committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1940, and of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST COUNCIL, 1930. He wrote A New Day for Historic Wesleyan, 1928; Christ and the Coming Kingdom, 1932.

On his retirement he continued to live in Atlanta, with a summer residence at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C. He enjoyed the complete confidence of his peers in both the educational and executive world of American Methodism.

He died in Atlanta on Oct. 26, 1960.

QUIMBY, SILAS EVERARD (1837-1913), American clergyman, was born in Haverhill, N. H., Oct. 19, 1837, the son of Silas and Penelope C. (Fifield) Quimby. Under the inspiration and guidance of his preacher father, Quimby made a public profession of his faith when he was fourteen years of age, and united with the M.E. Church at Unity, N. H., in 1852. He then attended TILTON SEMINARY, where his father had been a trustee since its founding in 1845. He later attended WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and graduated there in 1859.

Taking up the teaching profession, he taught Greek and Latin in the Newbury Seminary in VERMONT, and while there he went into the VERMONT CONFERENCE on trial and was ordained deacon by Bishop OSMON C. BAKER in April 1862. In 1863 he was transferred on trial to the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE and stationed at Littleton, N. H. The next year he was again assigned to a professorship at Newbury Seminary. In 1866 he was ordained elder and received into full connection at Keene, N. H., by Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON and was appointed president of Newbury Seminary.

When plans were made to transfer the school to Montpelier, Vt., Quimby was appointed to Lebanon, N. H., where he served two years. In 1869-70 he was appointed to Plymouth; 1871-73, Exeter; 1874-76, Sunapee. In 1877 he was appointed to Tilton, but the next year when the president of Tilton Seminary died, Quimby was sought to replace him. He held that office for seven years, 1878-85, during which time he raised the standard of the institution, organized the scientific department, instituted a special course of study in industrial science, and added a year to the course in preparation for college. During these years a spirit of revival was manifested among the students.

Resuming the pastorate, Quimby served the following New Hampshire appointments: Whitefield, 1886-87; Laconia, 1888-89; Newmarket, 1890; Exeter, 1891-93; Rochester, 1894; Penacook, 1895-96; Pleasant Street, Salem, 1897-1900; Conference evangelist, 1901; Milton Mills, 1902-03; Derry, 1904-07; Conference evangelist, 1908-12.

Silas Quimby was one of the great men of the New Hampshire Conference. He was twice elected delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1880 and 1896; was for thirty-four years secretary of the New Hampshire Conference, 1877-1910; was a trustee of Tilton Seminary from 1871 until his death; and was recognized by SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY in 1910 with the D.D. degree.

He died on Feb. 23, 1913, at the home of his daughter in Bellefont, Pa., and was buried in Tilton, N. H.

QUINCY, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. Quincy E.U.B. Orphanage and Home originated under the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, was incorporated Aug. 2, 1902, and started operation in 1903 in the farm home of Henry J. and Henrietta Middour Kitzmiller, who gave the home and 164 acres of land. Kitzmiller became the first superintendent and served until Jan. 25, 1936. Originally the home was opened only to children, and during the earlier half of the operation cared for as many as 155 youngsters at one time.

Z. A. Colestock opened his home in Mechanicsburg, Pa., to retirement residents early in the century as the first such home in the denomination. By 1913 it became evident that age would no longer permit him to care for those whom he served. Approaches were made and a building built, and in 1915 the Colestock residents became the first eleven occupants in the retirement section on the Quincy campus. The original capacity was thirty. Retirement population was increased by new buildings in 1927, 1954, 1961, 1963, and 1966, and today on the Quincy campus and in the new Lititz, Pa. off-campus unit, Quincy Home is caring for 175 senior citizens.

At the inception of the retirement section of Quincy all programs were quite conservative, and all residents entered on what today is known as "life care." Applicants turned over to the home all assets and then the home accepted responsibility for the care of the person for the remainder of life. Today there is Plan II for persons with insufficient resources to meet the cost of care, and support is available to the resident from the State.

Care Programs today cover a much more complete medical and infirmary service, improved food service, recreation and activity facilities and direction, increased safety standards, higher staff ratio, and higher wages across the board. Some of these are dictated by the state and some by the times, and most are specific improvements and necessary; but they mark, in the history of the benevolent home, a move from a place to stay and be fed only, to a way of total life experience. The great increase in costs for such care in recent years has caused a great deal of concern for each applicant, as well as for the home administration, in working out equitable solutions for the retirement residents entering Quincy, or other homes.

JAMES QUINN

QUINN, JAMES (1775-1847), American preacher was born in Washington County, Pa., where his parents were among the earliest settlers west of the Appalachian mountains. In 1786 the family was received into one of the Methodist Societies of the REDSTONE CIRCUIT and the five children were baptized, James being the oldest. James was admitted to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1799. He married Patience Teal in 1803 and in 1804 followed his father-in-law, Edward Teal, to near Lancaster, Ohio. He served in OHIO, in the WESTERN CONFERENCE, until the OHIO CONFERENCE was organized in 1812. When the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE was organized in 1825 he remained with the Ohio Conference. Much of his service, before 1825, had been in that portion of Ohio which was included in the original Pittsburgh Conference. James Quinn was a circuit rider for twenty-two years and a presiding elder for twelve years. He was a delegate to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES. John F. Wright of the Ohio Conference published a biography of Quinn in 1851 titled, Sketches of the Life and Labors of James Quinn. The volume incorporates a considerable section of autobiographical material written by Quinn himself and is a valuable portrait of early Methodism in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio.

QUINN, WILLIAM PAUL (ca. 1788-1873), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH and instigator of the home missions movement in African Methodism, was born in Honduras, Central America, about 1788 of Roman Catholic parentage. He was taken to the United States at an early age, converted in 1808 in Bucks County, Pa., licensed to preach in 1812, and admitted in the Philadelphia Conference of the A.M.E. Church in 1816. He was ordained DEACON in 1818, but was not ordained ELDER until 1838.

Quinn, who was present at the organizing convention of the denomination at PHILADELPHIA in 1816, held pastorates in NEW JERSEY and PENNSYLVANIA before embarking on a missionary itinerary during which he founded seventy-two new congregations and organized forty-seven churches west of the Allegheny Mountains in OHIO, INDIANA, MICHIGAN, ILLINOIS, KENTUCKY, and MISSOURI between 1840 and 1844.

He was elected assistant bishop in 1841 and bishop in 1844. He died on Feb. 3, 1873, after having served the longest term as senior bishop in the denomination up until that time.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

RACE, JOHN H. (1862-1954), American preacher, educator, and publishing agent, was born at Paupack, Pa., on March 6, 1862. In 1858 his father, Ernest Race, came from England and settled within the boundaries of the WYOMING CONFERENCE.

As a young man, John H. Race thought of business as a career and took a position in a planing mill, where in an accident, he lost his left hand. This misfortune marked a turning point in his life. He entered Wyoming Seminary, where under the influence of LEVI L. SPRAGUE, he decided to enter the ministry and prepared for Princeton University. On graduation from college in 1890, he returned to Wyoming Seminary, where he taught in the English department for two years. Then he was sent to Centenary Church, Binghamton, N. Y.

In 1898 he became chancellor of Grant University in CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. During his administration the name was changed to Chattanooga University.

In 1913 the BOOK COMMITTEE of the M.E. Church elected him as one of the publishing agents of the BOOK CONCERN in CINCINNATI, Ohio. In June 1924, he was transferred to NEW YORK CITY, where he served as Senior Publishing Agent until his voluntary retirement in 1936 at which time he was elected Publishing Agent Emeritus by the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

He was a trustee of Wyoming Seminary from 1914 until the date of his death.

RADER, DANIEL LEAPER (1850-1910), American pioneer minister, was born Aug. 27, 1850, in Rose Hill, Johnson Co., Mo. He was converted in 1864, after his family had moved to Salina County, where, since there was no Methodist organization, Daniel joined the Presbyterian church. He studied under a Presbyterian minister before attending Shelbyville High School for two years, and after this he taught school briefly.

In 1866, he joined the M.E. Church, South; and, in 1871, became a minister and a member of the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE of that church. He was immediately placed in charge of the Oskaloosa Circuit in KANSAS. Shortly thereafter he was sent to the Broadway M.E. Church, South, in Leavenworth, and then to Council Grove in 1873. He married Eugenia Shackelford on Sept. 18, 1872.

Returning to MISSOURI, Rader developed a respiratory ailment which compelled him to move to COLORADO in 1879. After a rest of more than two years he joined the DENVER CONFERENCE and was made presiding elder of the Denver District, a task he prosecuted with great vigor. Under his leadership, southern Methodism was established in the remote towns of Grand Junction and Fruita, substantially in advance of the work of the northern church.

Feeling that there was no need for two Methodisms in Colorado, he sought to transfer to the M.E. Church. The southern church, however, was unwilling to grant this request, so D. L. Rader located in 1885, and then entered the Colorado Conference of the northern church. Appointed at first to Cheyenne, Wyo., he became in 1888 the first superintendent of the Wyoming Mission Conference. Again, he distinguished himself, pushing the work of the church into the most isolated portions of the area assigned to him.

Later (1892), he became presiding elder of the Pueblo District of the Colorado Conference, and still later was associated with The Rocky Mountain Advocate, published briefly in DENVER. He was serving as editor of The Pacific Advocate at the time of his death in 1910.

WALTER J. BOIGRAIN

RADHAKRISHAN, JOHN (1916-), is a minister in INDIA. He was born in an orthodox, priestly Brahman home, and was taught Brahmanic rites and discipline in his home. He attended a high school maintained by the Arya Samaj, did his undergraduate studies in a college run by an atheistic society, and did postgraduate studies in a Muslim college.

He developed an intense interest in religion, questioning and eventually rejecting the daily worship of gods and goddesses. His college principal, who was the founder of the atheistic society, hoped that he would join that organization. But Radhakrishnan was led (in some way) to obtain a Bible for his own personal study. His first reaction was very unfavorable. He had begun his study with Genesis. With much difficulty, he met a Christian minister who advised him to study the New Testament. After two years of desultory reading, he developed a new and great interest in Christianity. He was nearing graduation, when he met a woman missionary who talked Hindustani beautifully and explained many passages that had puzzled him. Seeing his contact with Christians, many Hindus expressed shocked surprise that he would even consider becoming a Christian. On completing his B.A. examinations, he declared his Christian faith and was baptized. After gaining his Master's degree and teaching for three years in a Christian college, he was sent by the Presbyterian mission to Leonard Theological College and graduated at the head of his class.

Since there was no Presbyterian opening when John Radhakrishnan completed his studies, he sought and obtained an appointment in a Methodist high school as warden of the hostel for Christian students. A call was made for CHAPLAINS to serve the needs of Christian troops in the army of India, and he volunteered. He was ordained and served as chaplain for five years. He then became a teacher in the BAREILLY Theological Seminary.

In 1949, he was awarded a scholarship for advanced study in the United States. He was accepted by BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY as a candidate for the Doctor of Theology degree and was awarded that degree in the shortest possible time. His thesis on The Bhagavad-Gita and the Fourth Gospel was highly acclaimed. Again he went to Bareilly Seminary, but a year later he was appointed superintendent of the Shahjahanpur District, where he served for four years. In 1955, he was appointed to a professorship in Leonard Theological College. In March 1966, he became principal of the college. He is a member of the Faith and Order Commission of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, a member of the executive Committee of the National Christian Council's Board of Theological Education, vice-president of the Madhya Pradesh Christian Council, and a member of the CENTRAL CONFERENCE Commission on the Structure of Methodism and on Church Union. He has written many articles for church papers on India and abroad.

RAGSDALE, RAY WALDO (1909-), American minister, city pastor and church leader, was born at Washington, Ind., on Aug. 22, 1909, the son of Tilman L. and Clara E. (Johnson) Ragsdale. He was educated at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, receiving the B.A. in 1931 and the D.D. in 1955; BOSTON UNIVERSITY, S.T.B., 1934; and the D.D. from the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC in 1951. He married Eleanor Hughes on Aug. 9, 1931, and they had two children.

He was admitted on trial in the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1928 and after full ordination as elder in 1934, transferred to the west where he was pastor at Holbrook, Ariz., 1934-36; Flagstaff, Ariz., 1936-40; Fullerton, Calif., 1940-47; Westwood Church, LOS ANGELES, Calif., 1947-54; superintendent of the Los Angeles District, 1954-60; pastor of the First Church, Whittier, Calif., 1960-63; and is presently at the Catalina Church, TUCSON, Ariz. He has been a delegate to the WESTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1944 to 1964 inclusive; and a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1952 to 1964 inclusive. At the General Conference of 1960, he was the "chairman of chairmen" of the various legislative committees, and thus the director of the presentation of all legislation of the Conference. He has been a member of the executive committee of the General Board of EVANGELISM, 1946-64; of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, Central Committee, Nyborg, Denmark, 1958; a delegate to the third Assembly of the World Council of Churches at New Delhi, India, 1961. He is a trustee of the Methodist SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT CLAREMONT, Calif. He is the author of Self Help for Church Members and The Work of the Official Board.

RAGSDALE, THOMAS CHARLTON (1863-1945), American pastor, was born Dec. 26, 1863, in Laurens County, S. C., the son of E. C. and Elizabeth Calhoun Ragsdale. While Thomas was still a child, the family moved to TEXAS. In 1888 he was admitted to the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE and was appointed in succession to Temple, Cisco, and Missouri Avenue Church in Fort Worth. He married and had five children. The writer of his memoir does not mention his education. It is known that in mature life he was awarded an honorary D.D. degree.

In 1894 Ragsdale transferred to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, and in the next forty-five years served thirteen appointments: Fayetteville, West Nashville, Madison Street in Clarksville, West End in NASHVILLE, Murfreesboro, Pulaski, McKendree and Tulip Street in Nashville, Murfreesboro District, Nashville District, East End in Nashville, Springfield, and Dickson. An able preacher with a good sense of humor, it was said that he served more leading churches in Nashville than any other preacher in his day. He was a member of the 1922 and 1926 GENERAL CONFERENCES, leading his conference delegation both times. After his retirement in 1939, Ragsdale lived at Springfield, Tenn. He died there, Dec. 22, 1945.

RAHATOR, SAMUEL (1866-1936), Indian minister, was born at Nasik, Western INDIA, and was converted at a mission conducted by Major Campbell of the Royal Engineers, 1885. Immediately Rahator gave up his work as a clerk on the railways and moved into the chawls (slums) of BOMBAY. He was accepted for the ministry in 1892; his work falls into three parts: in 1892-1911 in the slums of Bombay, where he founded the Marathi Methodist Church, opened orphanages, and often mediated in Hindu-Muslim disputes; in 1911-25, when he trekked through the Maharashtra villages beyond Nasik, and opened up the country circuit of the Methodist Marathi Mission under the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY; and in 1925-36 when, at the government's request, he worked among the criminal tribes in Maharashtra and helped to resettle many of them in Bombay. The first Indian minister to undertake pioneer missionary work to his own people under British Methodism, he died in Bombay, April 13, 1936.

CYRIL J. DAVEY

RAIKES, ROBERT (1735-1811), Sunday school promoter, was born in Gloucester, England, Sept. 14, 1735. He was the son of the proprietor of the Gloucester Journal, founded in 1722, and on his father's death in 1757 succeeded to the business. Raikes was a humanitarian member of the Church of England, but seems to have had very few direct links with the Methodist societies. HANNAH BALL had founded a SUNDAY SCHOOL at High Wycombe in 1769, and several years later Thomas Stock began one at Ashbury, Berkshire. Stock moved to Gloucester, and Raikes cooperated with him, in July 1780 opening his own Sunday school in the parish of St. Mary le Crypt, where GEORGE WHITEFIELD had been born and educated. One of the earliest Sunday school teachers employed and paid by Raikes later married the Methodist preacher SAMUEL BRADBURN. In November 1783 Raikes inserted in his Gloucester Journal a long letter describing the work of the Sunday school. This was reprinted in the Gentleman's Magazine for June 1784, and may be regarded as the beginning of the widespread Sunday school movement. JOHN WESLEY's Journal for July 18, 1784 describes his visit to a recently founded Sunday school in Bingley, Yorkshire, noting: "I find these schools springing up wherever I go. Perhaps God may have a deeper end therein than men are aware of. Who knows but some of these schools may become nurseries for Christians?" In his Arminian Magazine for January 1785, Wesley printed an independent account by Raikes of the beginning of the Gloucester experiment. Raikes never claimed to be the founder of Sunday schools, though this title was accorded to him by Samuel Bradburn and others, but his advocacy undoubtedly led to their almost universal adoption.

RICHARD C. RAINES

RAINES, RICHARD CAMPBELL (1898-), American bishop, was born at Independence, Iowa, Dec. 23, 1898. He was the son of Robert Bielby and Cora Belle (Curtis) Raines. He was educated at CORNELL COLLEGE, A.B., 1920; D.D., 1931; BOSTON UNIVERSITY, S.T.B., 1924, S.T.D., 1950; at Oxford University, 1924-25. He holds a number of honorary degrees including the LL.D. from Yonsei University, SEOUL, KOREA, in 1958. He married Lucille Marguerite Arnold on July 14, 1920, and their children are Rose Lucille, Robert Arnold, Richard Campbell and John Curtis.

He was ordained to the ministry of the M.E. Church in 1926, and after serving brief pastorates in MASSACHUSETTS and the Mathewson Street Church in PROVIDENCE, R. I., 1927-30, went to the Hennepin Avenue Church, MINNEAPOLIS, as pastor. There he served from 1930 to 1948 when he was elected bishop of The Methodist Church by the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTION meeting that year. Bishop Raines was then assigned to the INDIANA Area of The Methodist Church, and was reassigned to this area for five quadrennia until he retired in 1968.

He was a delegate to the General and Jurisdictional Conferences of the Church, 1948; to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Amsterdam in that same year; to the World Council of Churches in Evanston, 1954; to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE at Lake Junaluska in 1956, and to the World Council of Churches, New Delhi, India. He served upon the COMMISSION ON THE STRUC-TURE OF METHODISM OVERSEAS (COSMOS) 1956-64. He was one of the consultants to the Commission on WORSHIP for the revision of the Methodist Hymnal in 1960-64; member of the Commission on CHAPLAINS; of the Commission on Camp Activities; of the Executive Committee of the World Methodist Council; and of the Assembly of the World Council of Churches. He served as president of the Division of World Missions of the Board of MISSIONS of The Methodist Church, 1952-60; and as president of the Board of Missions, 1960-64. He was also the chairman of the Commission on PUBLIC RELATIONS AND METHODIST INFORMATION of The Methodist Church 1952-60.

Bishop Raines has been a trustee of Cornell College, Iowa; DEPAUW UNIVERSITY; and was in demand as a lecturer at various institutions of learning.

Bishop Raines was the first bishop to appoint a fulltime administrative assistant, which type of appointment later became a common and helpful procedure in many areas. He established the first full-time area program of public relations, and the first area program of pastoral care and counseling. He served as president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of The Methodist Church, 1966.

His episcopal travel included two visits to South America in 1946, and 1963; and he was liaison bishop between American and Korean Methodists, 1952-60. He made an around the world tour, stopping in KOREA, while Korean churches were being rebuilt. In 1952 he visited Korea, JAPAN, and FORMOSA, conducting a series of seminars for chaplains in Japan and Korea on the invitation of the Chief of Chaplains' of the United States Army. He was also in Korea in 1954 and 1955, in Africa and the Near East in the same year, and in the spring of 1957, Korea and Japan.

Since retirement he and his wife reside in Pompano Beach, Fla. He has been assigned by the Council of Bishops to work in the area of recruitment.

RAIWIN D CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE, Raiwind, Pakistan, is twenty-one miles south of Lahore. There are two departments included in the Institute. The high school has an enrollment of about 450. Of the twenty-five taking the final government examination in the high school graduating class of 1964, only one failed to pass. The high school enrollment is 427 of whom 351 are Christian. Fifty-three of these are girls. The second Department is the Training Class, preparing high school graduates to become teachers in primary schools, urban or rural. It is a one-year course finishing up with a government examination, and those passing receive a teaching certificate. This institute is the only approved non-Government training institution. Reporting the examination results conducted by government and noting that out of the 152 candidates for the high school and the Teacher's Training examinations only one failed, Inayat S. Mall, the capable principal, remarked: "These fine results bear testimony to the team work of the teaching staff."

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. FRANCIS ASBURY and JESSE LEE preached in Wake County, N. C., in 1780, twelve years before the city of Raleigh was founded as the capital of the state. JOHN KING, the first Methodist preacher to reside in the county, came there about 1790. A Scotsman, WILLIAM GLENDENNING, is credited with introducing Methodism into the village of Raleigh in 1799, and although he was not ordained, Glendenning built his own house of worship, thought by some historians to have been non-denominational, and officiated at its altar. Bishop Asbury preached at the North Carolina State House in Raleigh in 1800 and, assisted by Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE, presided at the first Methodist conference held in Raleigh in 1811. Following this conference, the present-day Edenton Street Church was organized, although no specific date for its founding can be determined. The Raleigh Circuit was formed in 1807 by action of the VIRGINIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church which met in New Bern, N. C., and three years later the Raleigh District was established. Ten years later the Edenton Street Church became a separate station. Bishop Asbury last visited Raleigh in 1816. A mission chapel, later known as the "Central Church," was built in 1846 under the leadership of Bennet T. Blake, who also conducted a female seminary. Prior to 1852, when a PARSONAGE was first provided, Methodist ministers in Raleigh were obliged to room and board in the town. In 1849 the congregation of St. Paul's A.M.E. Church was formed as an outgrowth of the Edenton Street Church. This congregation purchased its own church site in 1853 and since that date has served as the parent of several other Negro Methodist churches organized in Raleigh.

The NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church was organized in 1837 and met in Raleigh in October 1841. Following the establishment of the North Carolina Conference of the M.E. Church, South, annual conferences were held in Raleigh in 1853, 1862, 1865, 1874, 1882, 1897, 1909, 1922, 1927, 1937. Following the unification of the three major branches of Methodism in 1939, the North Carolina Annual Conference has been held in Raleigh in 1944, 1954, and 1965.

The Methodist Home for Children, supported by the North Carolina Conference, was established between Glenwood Avenue and St. Mary's Street, in 1899.

Raleigh Methodist churches in existence today are: Jenkins Memorial, established in 1907 from the former Brooklyn Church, which was established in 1878; Fairmont and Hayes Barton, both established in 1937; Person Street, established in 1939 from the Central Church which was established in 1846; and Epworth Church, established in 1893. Since 1945 the following new churches have been organized in Raleigh: Layden Memorial, Wesley Memorial, Westover, Highland, Longview, St. Mark, Cokesbury, Trinity, St. James, Wynnwood Park, Macedonia, Millbrook, Pleasant Grove. The Benson Memorial Church, located just outside the city limits, was organized in 1965.

For more than a quarter of a century, Raleigh has been the residence of the district superintendent of the Raleigh District. Following the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1964, it also became the episcopal residence of the Raleigh Area, including fifty-six eastern North Carolina counties.

On April 29, 1962, Bishop GARBER, president-elect of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, presided at the consecration of "The Methodist Building" on Glenwood Avenue. This building houses the bishop's offices and serves as the headquarters for the various boards and agencies of the North Carolina Conference.

In 1970 there were nineteen United Methodist churches in Raleigh, reporting a total membership of 14,230.

Edenton Street Church is the oldest congregation in North Carolina's capital city, and the present structure stands on the same spot Methodism has occupied in Raleigh since 1811.

In 1831 MELVILLE COX, its pastor, left to go to LIBERIA as a missionary. For several years the church has supported several missionaries on the foreign fields.

The original church building was destroyed by fire in 1839, and replaced in 1841. In 1881 a church school building was erected, and the sanctuary was torn down and replaced by a larger structure. In 1912 a new Christian education building was erected, which stood until 1937, when it was replaced by the present Poindester Memorial Building. The sanctuary was renovated and enlarged in 1950-51, but it was destroyed by fire July 28, 1956. On Feb. 2, 1958, a new sanctuary, a distinctive new building, yet one in the spirit and form of the old building, was opened for worship.

BRAXTON CRAVEN, who served Edenton Street in 1864-65, commanded the Confederate Military Post at Salemburg and in the fall of 1865 became the president of Trinity College (now DUKE UNIVERSITY) until 1882. WILLIAM WALTER PEELE, who served the church from 1918-23, was elected bishop in 1938, the only minister of Edenton Street to become a bishop and the only native North Carolinian to enter the episcopacy from this state.

Among the prominent laymen who have been identified with Edenton Street Church were: JOSEPHUS DANIELS, secretary of the Navy, 1913-21, and Ambassador to Mexico, 1933-42; and Willis Smith, president of the American Bar Association, 1945-46, and U. S. Senator, 1950-53. Although not a member of the church, Governor Clyde R. Hoey of Shelby, N. C., served as teacher of the Men's Bible Class during his gubernatorial administration, 1937-41.

The 200-foot, cross-tipped spire of Edenton Street Church is a prominent Raleigh landmark. Only two blocks from the Capitol Square and the principal downtown business district, this church continues to serve North Carolina's capital city. In 1970 it reported 3,339 members.

Methodist Home for Children is a multi-service agency for the care of orphan, dependent, and neglected children. It is owned, operated, controlled and financially supported by the North Carolina Conference of The United Methodist Church.

In 1873 the North Carolina Conference adopted a resolution authorizing the churches to raise money to assist the Masonic Orphanage at Oxford to care for orphan children, many of whom came from Methodist families. In 1898 the Conference decided to establish its own orphanage. As a result a corporation entitled "Trustees of the Methodist Orphanage" was incorporated by an act of the State Legislature in 1899. A site was purchased in the city of Raleigh, the state capital. J. W. Jenkins was elected the first superintendent. J. B. Hurley was appointed "agent" to solicit money from the Sunday schools and churches of the conference. The first children were admitted in January 1901. In 1955 the name of the agency was changed from "Methodist Orphanage" to "Methodist Home for Children."

The Methodist Home, with a plant valued in excess of $1,600,000, occupies a sixty acre campus within easy walking distance of schools, churches and shopping areas. Children of school age, both boys and girls, may be served in group care at one time. Younger children are placed in foster homes. A competent staff provides professionally trained workers in social service, health, education and religion. Children attend public schools, go to a community church, participate in community life and live in family type cottages under the supervision of houseparents. The home cares for 150 children.

RALEY, GEORGE HENRY (1864-1958), Canadian Methodist and United Church of Canada minister, was born in Yorkshire, England, on Feb. 14, 1864, and came to Canada in 1882. He was received on probation for the ministry in 1884 by the Bay of Quinte Conference, and ordained in 1889. On May 12, 1890 Rayley married Maude Giles of Brockville, Ontario. After four years in Ontario pastorates, Rayley volunteered for Indian work and came to British Columbia in 1893. He was the first ordained missionary in the northern village of Kitamat, one of the most isolated spots on the coast. During his thirteen years there, he served in many capacities—Christian minister, postmaster, lay doctor, justice of the peace, and trusted counselor. By taking a number of orphaned boys and girls into their home, the Raleys began what was to become the Elizabeth Long Memorial Home, a residential school.

Rayley quickly mastered the language of the Kitamats, as well as other northern Indian dialects. He compiled the first dictionary. With a small hand press he turned out, in 1896, the North Coast's first newspaper, called Nanakwa (The Dawn). Rayley also established the first meteorological station in northern British Columbia.

In 1906, he was transferred to Port Simpson—a large Indian village some thirty miles north of Prince Rupert. While here, he rebuilt the historic church after a fire. It had been built first by the veteran missionary, THOMAS CROSBY. A new mission house was also erected. After eight years at Port Simpson, Rayley was appointed to the principalship of Coqualeetza Residential School at Sardis, B. C., an office he filled with distinction until his retirement in 1934.

In 1912 he was president of the Conference of British Columbia. He held a D.D. degree from Union College of British Columbia, as well as fellowships in the Royal Geographical Society and the Royal Society of Arts. He died in Vancouver on Sept. 14, 1958.

Rayley wrote profusely. His writings covered almost every phase of Indian life, legend, and culture, on which he was a recognized authority. He was a collector of choice specimens of native art. His collection, said to be one of the finest in the province, now belongs to the University of British Columbia.

RALL, HARRIS FRANKLIN (1870-1964), American theologian, was born at Council Bluffs, Iowa, Feb. 23, 1870, the son of a minister in the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. He was a graduate of University of Iowa, and of the Divinity School of Yale University in 1897. He engaged in two years study abroad at University of Berlin, and of Halle-Wittenberg. A Ph.D. was granted him by the latter in 1899 magna cum laude.

Before going abroad, he married Rose St. John. Two daughters were born to them. Mary, the one surviving, holds an important position with the United Charities of Chicago.

After his return from Europe, Rall spent a year as student and lecturer at Yale and then served as pastor of the M.E. Church at East Berlin, Conn.; of Trinity in New Haven and the historic First Church of BALTIMORE, Md.

In 1910, Rall became president of ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, Denver, Colo., where he had to select and organize a new faculty, bring together a student body of promise, and establish the school on a substantial foundation. He accepted an invitation to the chair of Systematic Theology at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1915 in which position he was to continue his creative work until his retirement in 1945. Rall was made a member of the Commission on COURSE OF STUDY by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1916, became its recording secretary and in many ways its directing spirit. He prepared much of the necessary literature, helped organize the summer schools for the annual conferences, and the coaching conference for leaders held annually for many years at EVANSTON, Ill.

The bibliography of the writings of Harris Franklin Rall as given in a testimonial volume published in 1940 as part of the recognition of his twenty-five years of service at Garrett covers twelve pages. It lists, of course, all his books up to 1940, articles in scholarly journals, volumes to which he contributed a chapter or more, books reviews, etc. Not all the fourteen full length books he wrote can be listed here. Those best known are given in chronological order: A Working Faith; New Testament History; The Life of Jesus and The Teachings of Jesus; Modern Premillenarianism and The Christian Hope; The Meaning of God (Quillian Lecture); A Faith For Today (similar to his Working Faith of an earlier day); Christianity; An Inquiry Into Its Nature and Truth (this volume was selected out of over two hundred manuscripts submitted for the Bross Prize Award which in that anniversary year amounted to $15,000). Other books followed after 1940, chief of which were Religion As Salvation; Paul and the Faith of Today; The God of Our Faith. He ran a long series of articles in the Christian Advocate entitled "Doctor Rall Answers" and book reviews in the Garrett Tower, which journal he founded and edited for many years.

In 1949, Garrett established the Harris Franklin Rall Lectureship, a doubly appropriate recognition since he had given the Nathaniel Taylor Lectures at Yale as well as the Quillian and Ayer as noted above.

Rall's theology was discussed briefly in the December issue, 1964, of the Garrett Tower by his former colleague, GEORGIA HARKNESS. His social concern is discussed in the same issue of the Tower by his former student and colleague, MURRAY LEIFFER. This concern runs through all his writings as it did his teaching. He was active in the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE as he was also in the early stages of the ecumenical movement. He attended the conference at Edinburgh and did much writing in preparation for the gathering at Lund.

Toward the end of his long ministry at First Church, Evanston, ERNEST F. TITTLE asked the official board to name Rall as adviser to the senior minister of that church. Tittle once said to a colleague: "I preach the gospel according to Frank Rall."

Harris Franklin Rall served the church in the following conferences, NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN, BALTIMORE, COLORADO and ROCK RIVER. He died Oct. 13, 1964.

RALSTON, THOMAS NEELY (1806-1891), American minister, southern leader and theologian was born in Bourbon County, Ky., March 21, 1806, son of John Ralston and Elizabeth Neely Ralston. He was educated at Georgetown College, Ky. Converted at the age of twenty, he was licensed to preach the following year. He first joined the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE about 1833, and was ordained elder there in 1834. The following year he transferred to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. Strongly evangelistic, in one year on Mt. Sterling Circuit he brought 600 persons into the church. He was president of the Methodist Female High School in Lexington, Ky., 1843-47, and in 1851 he edited the Methodist Monthly. He was a delegate to the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION of 1845 of Southern Methodist Conferences. He was elected secretary pro-tem as the convention opened, later becoming assistant secretary; and at the first GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) in 1846 he was chosen secretary. He was also a delegate to the General Conferences of 1850 and 1854. He was given the D.D. degree by Wesleyan University, Florence, Ky., in 1857. He edited four volumes of Posthumous Works of the Rev. Henry B. Bascom (1856 ff.), and was the author of Evidences, Morals, and Institutions of Christianity (1870), Ecce Unitas, or a Plea for Christian Unity (1875), and of Elements of Divinity (first edition, 1847, last one, 1924). For many years the latter book was in the minister's COURSE OF STUDY. Thomas J. Dodd of Kentucky and VANDERBILT called it "the first theological treatise in the way of a body of divinity that ever came from the American Methodist press," and GILBERT ROWE said that "it will long remain as the chief exponent of the religious thought of one of the most vital periods in the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South." Ralston died near Newport, Ky., on Nov. 25, 1891.

RAMOS, RUY VITORINO (1909-1962), Brazilian layman and federal congressman, was born in Itaquí, state of Rio Grande do Sul, on Sept. 9, 1909. He was the son of Colonel Laurindo Ramos. While studying at the Methodist Instituto União, Ruy was converted and became an active Christian. He afterwards studied at the University of Porto Alegre, from which he received a bachelor's degree in law, and became a district attorney in Alegrete, where he lived the greater part of his life. He married Nehyta, and they had four children—Eclia, Cosete, Ruy, and Rosete.

Becoming interested in politics, and convinced that the evangelicals should take a more active part in government, Ruy campaigned for the office of Federal congressman from the state of Rio Grande do Sul, and was elected. In 1954 he tried for the Senate but lost due to very strong Roman Catholic opposition. He tried again in 1958, and was elected. Ramos was a leader in the Labor Party, the first president of the Movement for Landless Farmers, a strong advocate of the land reform in BRAZIL. Despite the fact that many disagreed with the principles he advocated, all admired Ramos for the fact that he was honest and not ashamed of his evangelical faith, and never bowed to the pressures of the ecclesiastical majority.

In the Methodist Church, he occupied several positions as layman. He was a member of the General Board of Social Action from 1950-60; was a delegate to the Latin American Evangelical Consultation in LIMA, PERU, in 1961; and was twice a lay delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Brazil (1946 and 1950). In 1962, he was promoting a plan for the development of Brazil's southwest frontier, in his native state, when an airplane accident took his life and that of his wife Nehyta.

Funeral rites were conducted in the Government Palace in Porto Alegre, capital of the state, with Bishop JOSE PINHEIRO officiating, and was attended by thousands including the highest state and local authorities.

ISNARD ROCHA

RAMSEY, FRED W. (1880-), American E.U.B. layman, was born Aug. 16, 1880. He was a member of Calvary Church, CLEVELAND, Ohio, and rendered distinguished service as executive director of the Forward Movement Campaign of the former EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in the early part of the century. The Campaign raised $1,000,000, a considerable sum at that time and the largest financial effort of the denomination to that date.

At that time, Dr. Ramsey was president of the Perfection Oil Stove Co., Cleveland, Ohio. He resigned this position to devote his time to philanthropic enterprises. He was chairman of the Cleveland Community Fund for years, raising millions of dollars for charitable institutions and enterprises. Then he served for three years as General Secretary of the International Council of the YMCA taking the place of the well-known JOHN R. MOTT. In this position he traveled to Europe and Asia continuously. OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Delaware, Ohio, honored him with the LL.D. degree.

Dr. Ramsey served as superintendent of Calvary Sunday school, Cleveland, Ohio, for forty-five years. For several decades this was the largest Sunday school in the former EVANGELICAL CHURCH, enrolling 1,800 pupils. When Dr. Ramsey's office as International YMCA Secretary was in New York, he would commute by Pullman Saturday nights to be in this place of leadership in Sunday school, returning Sunday nights to New York. Over the years he has addressed many prominent gatherings within his own and other denominations.

RANCHHOD, KERSHAN, a bhagat, or leader of the Kabir Pant sect of reformed Hindus, was converted in BOMBAY in 1889 and baptized with three of his associates in the Grant Road Methodist Church by the pastor, HOMER C. STUNTZ (later bishop). Caste wise Ranchhod was regarded as very low in the social scale, but he was strong in personality, an able and energetic leader of his people, and had amassed some property. At the time of his conversion he was a labor contractor, recruiting and managing workmen for the conservancy department of the city of Bombay.

"With overflowing love for the Saviour and great eagerness for his people to know what he had learned," wrote The Missionary Advocate in 1874, he returned to Gujarat and urged his people to trust in Christ rather than in Kabir or any other. Several groups of his fellows in Gujarati towns and villages were converted. They were the first people to turn to Christ in considerable numbers, using group solidarity as a means of spreading the Gospel instead of allowing it to be an obstacle.

Another humble group had begun to learn of Christ through some of their number who were employed as house servants for members of the English-language Methodist Church that was established in Baroda in 1875. In 1895 a movement began among this second group, known as Dheds, also regarded as low-caste, but in their own thinking and in public esteem of higher rank than the conservancy group (commonly called sweepers). This second group is much larger in Gujarat than Ranchhod's people who first began moving together into Christian faith and purpose. And as the new movement grew in power, unfortunately caste prejudice prevailed over grace, and both the pioneer movement which began among the conservancy group and the later movement among the Dheds suffered serious retardation. Innumerable victories over the caste system have been won, but much remains to be done before this peculiar Indian form of segregation is completely overcome within the church in INDIA.

RANDLE, BARTON (1796-1882), pioneer IOWA circuit rider, was born in Screven County, Ga., the son of a local Methodist preacher. In 1811 the family removed to the vicinity of Edwardsville, Ill. Barton was converted in 1812 and was licensed as exhorter and preacher. In 1831 he filled a vacancy on Spoon River Circuit, and that year he was ordained DEACON and received on trial into the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, and assigned to Shelbyville Circuit. In 1832 he traveled the Henderson River Mission and organized a circuit with several societies. While on this charge he gave BARTON H. CARTWRIGHT, who was destined to plant Methodism in southern Iowa, his first preaching assignment.

Randle was ordained elder in 1833, received into the Conference in full connection, and assigned to Galena and Dubuque Mission. He was called the "Apostle of Iowa Methodism," and he introduced Methodism into northern Iowa. After preaching in Dubuque, on Nov. 6, 1833, he preached regularly during the winter of 1833-34 and established several appointments in Iowa. He organized the first Methodist society in Dubuque, perhaps in Iowa, on May 18, 1834, and was the dominating force behind the erection of Iowa's first church building, the Dubuque Methodist log structure, which was raised July 25, 1834.

Described by PETER CARTWRIGHT as one of the best missionaries he knew, Randle subsequently preached on circuits, stations, and districts in southern Illinois until 1845, when he retired. In 1848 he resumed his itinerant ministry but was superannuated in 1850. He died on Jan. 2, 1882.

RANDOLPH, FLORENCE (1866-1951) was born in Charleston, S. C., Aug. 9, 1866, a daughter of John and Anna (Smith) Spearing. At the age of eight years she was greatly impressed with Christianity through the teachings of a blind grandmother whom she led from house to house as the grandmother prayed with the sick and explained to them the Holy Scriptures.

In later years as Dr. Randolph became increasingly interested in social and religious endeavors, she began the study of Bible History under a private tutor who was a Yale graduate and an astute Greek and Hebrew scholar. Subsequently, Florence Randolph completed a course with the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago and further studied at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Dr. Randolph's public work spanned fifty years. She began with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in 1892 lecturing and organizing against the liquor traffic and remaining after in that organization for about forty years.

She was licensed to preach in Jersey City in 1897 and was ordained a deacon at Atlantic City in May 1900. During her active ministry, Dr. Randolph was pastor of five churches, the first being the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH on Pennington Street in Newark in May 1901, now Clinton Memorial Church. She was ordained an ELDER in 1903. For twenty-five years Dr. Randolph served as the president of the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the New Jersey Conference of the A.M.E. Zion Church and was the General President of the Society for four years. She was a member of the State Christian Endeavor Society and was the organization's only Negro state member for two years.

In 1915 Dr. Randolph founded the New Jersey State Federation of Colored Women's Clubs and served as president for twelve years.

Her inspirational leadership was responsible for the building of a beautiful $80,000 red brick colonial church, Wallace Chapel A.M.E. Zion Church, at Summit, N. J., together with a parsonage and a community house.

Dr. Randolph traveled abroad extensively. In 1901 she attended the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE which met in London. In 1922 she again visited England enroute to the Gold Coast, British West Africa, now GHANA, where she spent two years bringing the Gospel to Africa as a foreign missionary. She spent time in SIERRA LEONE and MONROVIA, LIBERIA. Upon her return to America she brought with her an African girl, Charity Zombelo, whom she educated in Summit High School and Hampton Institute. Upon her return to Africa, Miss Zombelo furthered the spread of the Christian principles through her teachings in African schools.

Dr. Randolph in 1931 made a trip to the Holy Lands including Palestine, Italy, Egypt, Turkey, Greece and several points in North Africa.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

RANDOLPH, JOSEPH BENJAMIN (1875-1961), American scholar and educator, was born in Shell Mound, Miss., on Sept. 9, 1875; he was one of two sons of John William and Mary E. J. (Berry) Randolph. He received the A.B. degree from New Orleans University in 1902 and the A.M. in 1905. He was a summer school student at Harvard University, 1907-11. He taught at WILEY COLLEGE, Marshall, Texas from 1902-10 and served as dean of Wiley College from 1910 to 1917. He was elected principal of Haven Institute, Meridian, Miss., in 1917 and held this position until 1920, when he was elected president of Samuel Huston (now HUSTON TILLOTSON) College in Austin, Texas. On the retirement of L. M. Dunton, J. B. Randolph was elected president of CLAFLIN COLLEGE, Orangeburg, S. C., and served in this capacity from 1922 to his retirement in 1945.

Joseph Benjamin Randolph married Gertrude Mattie Ramsey June 7, 1905. She preceded him in death Aug. 24, 1960.

Randolph was very active in the work of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church. He was a member of the Uniting Conference of 1939 and the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES of 1940 and 1944. Other religious activities included membership on The UNIVERSITY SENATE, 1920-24; and he was a member of the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE of 1921.

He was laid to rest April 29, 1961 in the Fairmont Cemetery, Newark, N. J.

RANDOLPH-MACON ACADEMY, Front Royal, Virginia, was established in 1892 as a part of the Randolph-Macon system. Since 1953 it has operated under its own charter with its own board of trustees. It has always emphasized college preparatory work. The governing board has twenty members, is self-perpetuating, but election must be approved by the VIRGINIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Church.

JOHN O. GROSS

RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, Ashland, Va., a college of liberal arts for men, was chartered Feb. 3, 1830. The school was named for two of the distinguished congressmen of that day: John Randolph of Virginia and Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina. It was the first permanent institution of The Methodist Church to bear the name and do the work of a college.

During its first thirty-six years (1830-66) the college was located at Boydton, Va. It was closed during the Civil War, and most of its endowment, which had been invested in Confederate bonds, was lost. Removal of the college to Ashland took place in 1868.

Beginning in 1891, and continuing through 1930, the following institutions were included in the Randolph-Macon system: Randolph-Macon College, Ashland, Va.; RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, Lynchburg, Va.; Randolph-Macon Academy, Bedford, Va.; Randolph-Macon Institute (for girls), Danville, Va. RANDOLPH-MACON ACADEMY, Front Royal, Va. The school at Bedford was closed, and the one at Danville became an independent institution. In 1953 the charter of Randolph-Macon was modified and the three remaining schools—Ashland, Lynchburg, and Front Royal—were given separate boards of trustees.

While the beginning of a college is seldom the result of one man's efforts, JOHN EARLY must be placed at the top of the list of Randolph-Macon's founders. Associated with him in this enterprise were Hezekiah C. Leigh and Gabriel P. Disosway. John Early, a native of Virginia and a friend of Thomas Jefferson, joined the Virginia Conference in 1807 and was elected a bishop in the M.E. Church, South, in 1854. He was president of the board of trustees for forty-four years.

Randolph-Macon has been known for the high percentage of its graduates listed in Who's Who in America. It is doubtful that any small college can boast of more in Methodism's Who Was Who. Among these are Bishop HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE, founder of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and Dean WILBUR F. TILLET of the School of Religion of the same university. Dean Tillet, as much as any leader, is responsible for his church's ability to keep its balance during the fundamentalist-modernist controversy.

Great teachers who at one time were associated with Randolph-Macon include STEPHEN OLIN, its first president and the second president of Wesleyan University; LANDON C. GARLAND, first chancellor of Vanderbilt University; Thomas R. Price, who attached as much importance to the teaching of English as to Latin and Greek and founded the first department for the teaching of English in the United States. He concluded his distinguished career as a professor in Columbia University.

Significant developments in the curricular program and expansion of the physical plant took place during the administrations of Presidents ROBERT EMORY BLACKWELL (1902-38) and J. EARL MORELAND (1939-67).

A Phi Beta Kappa chapter was established May 3, 1923. Degrees offered are the B.A. and B.S. The governing board has thirty-seven members, nominated by the board, approved by the Virginia Conference, and elected by the board.

JOHN O. GROSS

RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, Lynchburg, Va., was founded in 1891 under a charter granted to RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE for men in 1830. Although it was able to draw heavily upon the scholarly traditions developed by the men's college, in a short period the new woman's college was widely recognized for its own standards of educational excellence. In 1916 it became the first woman's college south of the Potomac to receive a Phi Beta Kappa chapter. The college's collection of paintings by American artists is one of the best owned by any college in the United States.

In 1966 Randolph-Macon Woman's College was chosen by the Ford Foundation for a challenge grant of $1,500,000 as part of the foundation's Special Education Program designed "to advance the development of selected private institutions of higher education as national and regional centers of excellence." The college offers the B.A. degree. The governing board has thirty members, nominated and elected by the board with the approval of the Virginia Annual Conference. (The Randolph-Macon institutions operated under a single board until 1953 when separate boards were established for each.)

RANGARAMANUJAM, PAUL (1893-1945), Indian minister, was born of Brahman parents at Mannargudi, South India, and was converted as a scholar at Findlay College. Early desires for baptism were rejected by his family; and when he was baptized at eighteen, the age of consent, he was outcast by his family. He thought of becoming a sannyasi (wandering preacher) but entered the recently opened United Theological College at Bangalore in 1913, and was ordained in 1918, becoming a minister under the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. After serving in Mesopotamia as a chaplain to Indian troops and acting as Student Christian Movement secretary in 1920-23, when he visited England and China, he was appointed to Dharapuram in 1923. Here, as an ex-Brahman, his work among outcastes was greatly rewarding, and he constantly championed their rights. He was a man of high character, passionate evangelical zeal, and wide vision, with great gifts of leadership, and was greatly active in helping to create the Church of South India. He had been chairman of the Provincial Synod and of the Trinchinopoly District and was to preside over the Third General Synod of the Methodist Church in India, BURMA, and CEYLON at Mysore, when he died after a short illness, June 4, 1945, at Mannargudi.

RANK, JOSEPH ARTHUR, Lord Rank of Sutton Scotney (1888-1972), British Methodist, was born on Dec. 22, 1888, the son of Joseph Rank, a Methodist and flour miller of Hull. He was chairman of Rank, Hovis, MacDougall, one of the larger milling concerns in the world. In 1934 he pioneered the use of films for religious education and evangelism. He was personally involved in the production of religious films through Religious Films, Limited; among the films made are "John Wesley" and "The Promise." Lord Rank's part in the British film industry was through the Rank Organization, of which he was chairman from 1941 to 1962, and then president. In the church, Lord Rank was a Sunday school teacher and superintendent for almost fifty years; he held monthly film services in his village hall. He was chairman of the British Committee of the World Council of Christian Education and Sunday School Association; joint treasurer of the Home Mission Committee of the Methodist Church; and chairman of the Churches' Television Centre. He was made a baron in 1957, taking the title Baron Rank of Sutton Scotney.

PETER STEPHENS

RANKIN, ALEXANDER MARTIN (1857-1940), distinguished American M.P. lay leader and benefactor, a manufacturer and industrial pioneer in HIGH POINT, N. C., was identified with the activities of the annual and GENERAL CONFERENCES of his denomination for forty years and was a prominent supporter of the M.P. Children's Home and the HIGH POINT COLLEGE. "Captain Rankin," as he was affectionately known, was born on Oct. 29, 1857, the son of William Wharton Rankin and Louise Roach Rankin of Benaja, Rockingham County, N. C. He attended YADKIN COLLEGE. He first married Mamie Belle Reece, who died in childbirth. They had one daughter who lived only three years. In 1898 he married Lena Blair and to this union were born six children. Rankin was engaged in many prosperous business interests.

"Captain Rankin" took an active interest in the establishment and maintenance of the M.P. Children's Home in Denton, N. C., and gave $500 when the home was later moved to High Point. He served as trustee of this home from its opening until his death, and after 1914 as secretary-treasurer. He was instrumental in the founding of High Point College and gave $10,000 to it; he served as a trustee from 1924 until his death. Rankin Memorial Methodist Church in High Point, founded about 1935, was named in his honor. He attended ten General Conferences, beginning in 1904, a distinction for which he was duly honored and recognized at the General Conference of 1936 which met in High Point.

"Captain Rankin" died on Jan. 23, 1940, in High Point and was buried in Oakwood Cemetery there.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

RANKIN, GEORGE CLARK (1849-1915), American preacher and church editor, was born in Dandridge, Tenn. In ancestry the Rankins traced their line back to Scotland's Robert Bruce and rigid Calvinistic Presbyterianism. That inheritance continued through the days of George Rankin's father, who died when he was twelve. His mother was the first of the family to be of confident Methodist persuasion.

Rankin grew up during a period in which many people had little appreciation of "education" for the minister; but after one year in the annual conference he asked for "location" in order that he might go to school. On graduation from HIWASSEE COLLEGE in TENNESSEE he was admitted into the HOLSTON CONFERENCE (MIES) where he labored until 1890. He later transferred to an appointment in KANSAS CITY, and then to Shearn Memorial Church in HOUSTON, Texas, and two years later to First Methodist Church, DALLAS. In 1898 he became editor of the Texas Christian Advocate and in that position made his greatest contribution to his church's life.

A great hulk of a man who "looked like a grizzly bear" one preacher said of him, he was powerful on the platform as well as in his forensic writing. He became best known for his attacks upon the liquor traffic and gambling. A common pattern, followed upon several different occasions, was for him to announce and preach a series of Sunday night sermons on these evils. During his editorship of the Texas Christian Advocate, 180 counties in Texas outlawed the saloon, and the Legislature made gambling a criminal offense. Whatever else he might be writing of, his editorials almost always ended with the sentence "on with the battle"—and everyone knew he meant against the liquor traffic.

He died in the editorship, Feb. 2, 1915.

LOCHIE RANKIN

RANKIN, LOCHIE (1851-1929), American missionary to CHINA, was born in Milan, Tenn., in 1851. In 1877 she responded to a call in the Christian Advocate (Nashville) for a volunteer to go as a missionary to China. She was commissioned by Bishop H. N. McTYEIRE in April, 1878, as the first unmarried woman missionary sent out under the auspices of women of the M.E. Church, South. She was sent to Shanghai to assist Mrs. J. W. LAMBUTH in the Clopton Boarding School. She quickly mastered the language and within a year opened a new grade school at Nanziang, fifteen miles away. Needing more help, she persuaded her eighteen-year-old sister, Dora, to join her in the work. Dora Rankin died six years after arriving, but this only intensified the efforts of her older sister, and soon she opened an Anglo-Chinese school. In 1901 she went to Huchow to open a boys' school. She lived in China through the defeat of China by JAPAN; the aggression by RUSSIA, Great Britain, GERMANY, and FRANCE; the fall of the Manchu Dynasty; the birth of the Chinese Republic in 1912; the Boxer Uprising; and the rise of Communism. She spent forty-nine years in educational missions in China. It was said that she had students in responsible positions in every province in China. Returning home in 1926 she retired on the campus of SCARRITT COLLEGE, Nashville. At her death on Sept. 13, 1929, her funeral was held in Scarritt's Wightman Chapel.

WALTER N. VERNON

THOMAS RANKIN

RANKIN, THOMAS (1738-1810), British Methodist preacher, was born at Dunbar, East Lothian. He came under the influence of Methodist dragoons and, after a business trip to Carolina, began to preach in 1759. He became an itinerant in 1761, in the Sussex Circuit. Later he became Wesley's traveling companion and in 1773 was sent out as "General Assistant and Superintendent" of American Methodism. He strove to enforce the Methodist discipline, but his brusque manner and lack of sympathy with the colonial cause led to strained relations. He returned home in 1778 and in 1789 was ordained by Wesley for England.

JOHN A. VICKERS

RANKIN, VICTOR LEE (1917-), was born in Alliance, OHIO, Oct. 2, 1917, the son of H. W. and Bertha Rankin. He graduated from FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE in 1941, BOSTON UNIVERSITY 1943, and obtained the M.A. degree from Union Theological Seminary in 1956.

He was married to Pearl Katherine Rankin on June 14, 1941 and their two sons are David and Larry.

His first appointment was assistant pastor to First Church, ORLANDO, Fla. In 1950 he was appointed pastor in Camaguey, CUBA, and later district superintendent of the Camaguey District. In 1960, because of communist pressure, he returned to the States and became assistant secretary for Latin America in the General Board of Missions, 1960-62.

In 1963 he was appointed pastor of First Methodist Church, BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, and the district superintendent of the Buenos Aires area.

GARFIELD EVANS

RANSOM, REVERDY CASSIUS (1861-1959), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Flushing, OHIO, on Jan. 4, 1861. He was educated at WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY, where he graduated in theology in 1886, and at Oberlin College. He was converted in 1881, licensed to preach in 1883, ordained DEACON in 1886 and ELDER in 1888. He held pastorates in PENNSYLVANIA, OHIO, ILLINOIS, MASSACHUSETTS and NEW YORK. He was elected to the episcopacy from the editorship of the A.M.E. Church Review in 1924. Bishop Ransom was an outstanding exponent of the "Social Gospel." He delivered the invocation at the Democratic National Convention in 1940 and was a founder of the famous "Niagra Movement," the forerunner of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (N.A.A.C.P.).

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

RANSOM, JOHN JAMES (1851-1934), American preacher and pioneer missionary to BRAZIL of the M.E. Church, South, was born in 1851, in Rutherford County, Tenn., the son of a Methodist preacher. He received his B.A. degree from EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, VIRGINIA, and his D.D. from the same in 1901. He was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1874. In response to urgent appeals made to the board by J. E. NEWMAN of Brazil, Ransom sailed for that country, arriving in RIO DE JANEIRO on Feb. 2, 1876. After a year studying at the Presbyterian Collegio Internacional in Campinas, state of São Paulo, Ransom traveled extensively to determine the best locations for establishing Methodist work. One trip took him to the state of Rio Grande do Sul, where the Methodist Episcopal Church had established work in 1875. From there he went to URUGUAY to confer with THOMAS B. WOOD, superintendent of the River Plate Conference. Returning to Rio de Janeiro, Ransom rented a house in which he held services—in English first, on Jan. 13, 1878, and in Portuguese two weeks later. This work aroused the hostility of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, which attacked him as an atheist and heretic through its magazine, O Apostolo. Ransom replied inviting them to come and listen.

He organized the first Methodist Church in Rio with six members, all Americans, one being the minister of the United States in Brazil. In March, 1879, Ransom received into membership the first Brazilians, one being a former Catholic priest, Antonio Teixeira de Albuquerque. By July he had received four other Brazilians. On Christmas day, 1879, Ransom married Annie Newman, who died six months later. He then came to the United States and authorized by the Board of Missions, appealed for missionaries to Brazil. The result was that upon his return he took with him JAMES L. KENNEDY, JAMES W. KOGER, and MARTHA H. WATTS. They sailed via England in March 1881, and arrived in Rio de Janeiro on May 16, 1881.

Ransom worked mostly in the city of Rio de Janeiro, and in the states of São Paulo and Minas Gerais. In Rio, with Kennedy as associate, he did visitation work and supervised the construction of the first Methodist church in Brazil, the small but attractive Catete Chapel, which still stands. He also opened other preaching points in the city.

In 1882, Ransom returned to the United States for a visit; but was back for the July inauguration of the chapel, whose construction had continued under Kennedy's supervision.

In December 1882, when at a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE the work was divided into two districts, Ransom was named presiding elder of the Rio district, and Koger substituted for him as superintendent of the Mission. Ransom now devoted himself to itinerant work and to church journalism, though he returned to the United States in the fall of 1883. There, on September 2, he married Ella Crow and with her returned to Brazil. In 1884 he began publishing A Escola Dominical (The Sunday school), and a leaflet for children, Nossa Gente Pequena (Our Little People). On New Year's Day, 1886, he launched what was to become the official Methodist organ, Metodista Catolico (Catholic Methodist). It continued under this name until July 20, 1887, when by general consensus, and under the editorship of J. L. Kennedy, it was renamed Expositor Cristão (Christian Expositor) and so continues to this day (1969).

Brazil received its first episcopal visit on July 4, 1886, with the arrival of Bishop JOHN C. GRANBERY. He at once called a missionary Conference in Piracicaba, state of São Paulo, at which time a committee was named, consisting of Ransom and Kennedy, to regularize Methodist properties in Brazil. These, up to then, had to be held in Ransom's name and considered his personal property, since at that time the imperial government did not recognize the Board of Missions, or the Women's Missionary Council as juridical entities. Title to the property, however, had been guaranteed by a will executed in Brazil, and by legal documents held in NASHVILLE, Tenn.

At this meeting, for reasons never openly given, Ransom disassociated himself from the work in Brazil and asked for transfer back to the Tennessee Conference. Whatever the reasons his resignation was greatly regretted. After returning to the homeland Ransom served short periods in CALIFORNIA and CUBA from 1888 to 1890, going back and forth to his family in Tennessee. Finally, he served as associate pastor at McKendree Church in Nashville. There he died on Oct. 18, 1934, and was buried in Woodlawn Cemetery. He was survived by his wife and four children—Richard, Annie, Ellene, and John Crowe Ransom, the distinguished writer.

CHARLES W. RANSOM

RANSOM, CHARLES WESLEY (1903-), minister, educator, and former university dean, was born in Ballyclare, IRELAND, on June 15, 1903, the son of Henry John and Elizabeth (Clarke) Ransom. He studied at the METHODIST COLLEGE at BELFAST, Ireland, and Queen's University there, and at the EDGEHILL THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE—also at Belfast. He became a B.Litt. at Oxford (England) University, a Th.D. at Kiel University, Germany; and DICKINSON COLLEGE in America awarded him the S.T.D. in 1965.

Dr. Ransom was ordained in the ministry of the Irish Methodist Conference in 1929 and became a missionary to INDIA, 1929. After that he was the general secretary of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, 1948-58, coming to America in 1948 the better to manage the affairs of that International Council. He acted as a director of the Theological Educational Fund of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1958-63, and then became dean of the Theological School and the professor of Ecumenical Theology at DREW UNIVERSITY, Madison, N. J., in 1963. In 1968 he was appointed professor of Theology and Ecumenics at Hartford Seminary Foundation.

He was the president of the Methodist Church in Ireland, 1961-62, and is a member of the Board of Directors of the Fund for Theological Education, as well as a trustee of the Margaret Chambers Warnshuis Foundation. He received the King George V medal for public service in India in 1935. He has written A City in Transition, 1938; The Christian Minister in India, 1945; That the World May Know, 1953.

HARRY RANSTON

RANSTON, HARRY (1878-), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister and noted Bible scholar, was born at Keighley, Yorkshire, in 1878. He began work in the worsted mills at the age of ten. By attending evening classes he won a scholarship to attend secondary school and another for Ruskin Hall, Oxford. Both had to be refused because of necessitous family circumstances.

In 1900, he trained for a year at Hartley College, MANCHESTER, under A. S. PEAKE, and then was appointed to Canning Town, East London.

In 1902, he came to New Zealand and served in a number of important circuits. While in full circuit work, and without being able to attend university, he gained the B.A. degree and the senior university scholarship in Greek of the University of New Zealand in 1913. The following year he graduated, M.A. with honors in Greek and Hebrew. He wrote two major books, the first securing him a doctorate of literature: Ecclesiastes and the Early Greek Wisdom Literature and The Old Testament Wisdom Books (London: Epworth Press, 1925, 1930).

For many years he was in close touch with the Auckland University, as degree examiner, part-time lecturer, and member of the senate. For twenty-two years he served on the staff of the theological college, both at Dunholme and Trinity, the last ten of them being as principal.

He retired in Auckland in 1941, but continued for some years as part-time lecturer at both Auckland University and Trinity College. In 1966 he was living at Tyler House, a home operated by Auckland Central Mission.

RAST, JOHN MARVIN (1897-), American minister, editor, and college president, was born at Bartow, Ga., on March 13, 1897, the son of Jeremiah Lawton and Susie Louise (Bearden) Rast. He was educated at EMORY UNIVERSITY and Columbia University (M.A. in 1924), Union Theological Seminary (1923-24), and CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY (B.D., 1929). WOFFORD COLLEGE awarded him the D.D. degree in 1940. He taught three years at Emory University Academy and three at Wofford College. Going into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, he served three appointments until in 1936 he became editor of the Southern Christian Advocate and served as such from 1936 to 1941. At that time he became president of Lander College at Greenwood, S. C. He served in the first World War in the United States Army.

Dr. Rast has become well known as a writer of syndicated daily devotional newspaper features since 1925. His wife was Florence Olive Mays, whom he married on Aug. 24, 1927, and they have a son and two daughters.

For ten years he served as executive secretary of the Board of EDUCATION of the South Carolina Conference (after the Upper South Carolina and the South Carolina Conferences united). He became the associate editor of the South Carolina Methodist Advocate, 1963, and continues to write for the religious press. Dr. Rast has contributed several articles to this Encyclopedia.

HAROLD B. RATTENBURY

RATTENBURY, HAROLD BURGOYNE (1878-1961), British, Methodist missionary to CHINA, was born at Witney in 1878, trained at Headingley College, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1902. He went to China in 1902, and served in the Hupeh district until 1935; he was a general secretary of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY from 1935-50, and was president of the Methodist Conference in 1949. He was the son, grandson, brother, and father of Methodist ministers. His was the controlling voice in Methodist policy in China for many years. He died on Dec. 24, 1961.

JOHN KENT

RATTENBURY, JOHN ERNEST (1870-1963), British Methodist, brother of HAROLD B. RATTENBURY, and like him educated at Woodhouse Grove School. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1893, being trained at Didsbury College, MANCHESTER. Much of his ministry was spent in city missions, including eighteen years in the West London Mission, where he preached first in the Lyceum Theatre and then opened the Kingsway Hall. He was a founding member of the METHODIST SACRAMENTAL FELLOWSHIP, and an outstanding advocate of its ideals. The most important of his many publications appeared after his retirement in 1935; The Conversion of the Wesleys (1938), The Evangelical Doctrines of Charles Wesley's Hymns (the Fernley-Hartley Lecture for 1941), and The Eucharistic Hymns of John and Charles Wesley (1948). He died Jan. 19, 1963.

FRANK BAKER

RAYMOND, MINER (1811-1897), American minister and educator, was born on Aug. 29, 1811, at Rennselaerville, N. Y. With little education he turned to the shoemaker's trade, but in his eighteenth year felt called to a religious life. He entered Wesleyan Academy in WILBRAHAM, Mass., where, under the influence of WILBUR FISK, he moved from the role of student to that of helper and teacher. In 1838 he joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, but continued at Wilbraham for three years.

From 1841 to 1848 he held pastorates in Worcester, Boston, and Westfield, Mass. He was elected principal at Wilbraham in 1848. The Academy under his administration prospered, with new buildings—Fisk, Binney, and Rich Halls being erected. He was elected professor of Systematic Theology at CARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE of Evanston, Ill., in 1864, where he wrote a three-volume work, Systematic Theology.

Raymond was a delegate to six GENERAL CONFERENCES, representing the New England Conference five times and the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE once. In 1856 he was General Conference Chairman of the Committee on Slavery. In 1872 he received over fifty votes for bishop.

He was married twice. By his first wife, Elizabeth Henderson, who died in 1877, he had five sons and a daughter. His second wife was Mrs. Isabella Hill Binney, widow of Amos Binney, one-time member of the New England Conference. Raymond died on Nov. 25, 1897, at Evanston, Ill.

and to employ Anglican clergymen to assist with the communion services. This continued after 1791, and in 1811 THOMAS VASEY was appointed as "Reader." He had been ordained by John Wesley in September, 1784, and sent to America and was later ordained in America by the Protestant Episcopal Bishop William White of PHILADELPHIA. His duty was to perform the liturgical service, which he did until the close of 1825. When he resigned, the trustees of the chapel made a vain attempt to find an Anglican clergyman to continue the succession; they then applied to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference for an itinerant to be stationed as Reader. This led to a quarrel with HENRY MOORE, who was still superintendent of the circuit in which the chapel lay, and who tried to claim the position of Reader in terms of John Wesley's will. Legal advice did not sustain Moore's claims, and from 1826 the Conference appointed itinerants to do the work of Reader at City Road, though not apparently using the title as such. By 1850, however, the City Road society had lost ground financially, and so in 1852 the trustees decided to save money by abolishing the office of Reader, and this decision came into effect from the Conference of 1853.

READFIELD, MAINE, U.S.A., is significant as the location of what is now called the Jesse Lee Memorial Church, the first Methodist meetinghouse erected in the state. JESSE LEE visited the region in 1793, and the following year was appointed presiding elder of the Lynn District and the Province of MAINE. Philip Wager was sent to the Readfield Circuit in 1794, and under Lee's direction he led in building the meetinghouse. In November Lee wrote that the edifice was almost completed, and on June 21, 1795, he dedicated the plain, rough structure.

On Dec. 12, 1794, Lee administered the communion to the society members at Readfield, the first time the rite was observed under Methodist auspices in Maine. With ten preachers present, Bishop ASBURY conducted the first Methodist conference in the Province of Maine at Readfield, beginning Aug. 29, 1798.

In 1825 the Readfield Church building was moved some thirty rods from its original location and was repaired and rededicated. In 1857 the structure was remodeled; the roof was raised and a steeple and bell were added. When the railroad came to Readfield, a new village grew up around the depot, and another Methodist church was established there. The original church was then called East Readfield.

About 1900, East Readfield was rededicated as the Jesse Lee Memorial Church. Today services are conducted in the building only at Easter, Christmas, and in the summer months; the members worship at the Kents Hill Church five miles away during the rest of the year.

In 1971 the Jesse Lee Memorial Church had twenty-nine members and its building was valued at $25,000.

READER AT CITY ROAD CHAPEL, LONDON. In JOHN WESLEY's lifetime it had been the custom to use the services of the Book of Common Prayer at City Road Chapel,

READING, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. Memorial Church of the Holy Cross, Methodist. This is the mother church of Methodism in Reading. The first Methodist sermon in Reading was preached at the Court House by JOSEPH PILMORE May 27, 1772. He commented in his Journal on the wealth and prosperity of this city which then numbered about 400 persons. No Society was formed, however, and in 1803 when HENRY BOEHM attempted to preach in Reading he was prevented by the Commissioner. Five years later he and FRANCIS ASBURY passed through Reading and were ridiculed by the people. In 1822 two Methodist young men moved from Lancaster to Reading and organized a PRAYER MEETING or CLASS. The class grew and in the same year it was formally organized into a church (Ebenezer, now Holy Cross) by Henry Boehm. The organization took place in the old State House on the Northeast Corner of Fifth and Penn Streets. For the next five years the church met in the homes of its members, but in 1827 they erected a building on the East side of South Third Street which they called Ebenezer M.E. Church. In 1839 a larger brick structure was built on South Fourth Street below Penn which was remodeled in 1870 and again in 1884. A growing membership soon made this building inadequate, and the Trustees were instructed to look for a new site. The present site on North Penn Street was purchased and ten leading architects of the country submitted plans for the new building. A Philadelphia firm was selected. In 1890 ground was broken for the new church, and in 1893 the new structure was completed. It was called Memorial M.E. Church, which, in 1944, was changed to Memorial Church of the Holy Cross, Methodist. The building was considered by many to be one of the most beautiful in all of American Methodism. The Romanesque architecture was deviated by an arched cloister paved with mosaic. One entrance was marked by a stately tower supported by open groined columns. The interior walls were of white crystalline marble in combination with Portland Red Stone from Michigan. It is thought that the first vested choir began to serve here in 1893.

On Sunday, June 26, 1936 a fire broke out in the educational building and twelve fire companies fought the blaze to save the church proper. The sanctuary was saved but the educational building and the chapel were destroyed. By 1938 the educational unit and the chapel had been rebuilt and the sanctuary redecorated. Today the Church is one of the most influential Methodist Churches in the city. Directly or indirectly it has aided the organization and building of most of the Methodist churches in Reading.

READY, WILLIAM (1860-1927), NEW ZEALAND minister, became an orphan at an early age. He lived as best he could until accepted into Muller's Orphanage at Bristol, England. Converted at seventeen, he was trained for the ministry at the BIBLE CHRISTIAN College. He came to New Zealand at twenty-seven and served some of the leading pulpits. He founded Dunedin Central Mission in 1890, where in a matter of two or three years he built up what was then the largest congregation in New Zealand. Famed as an evangelist, he was conducting a mission in Palmerston North when he suddenly took ill and died on Sept. 7, 1927. The story of his early life has been told in a book by Lewis H. Court, Ready, Aye Ready (London: Epworth Press, 1935).

RECIFE, Brazil, capital of the northeast state of Pernambuco. Methodism began in 1880, when WILLIAM TAYLOR made his second trip to South America. That year, in Recife, he laid the groundwork for a mission and sent out several "very strong men . . . but they set their plow too deep." All but one, GEORGE NIND, left soon, sick or discouraged. Nind, a licensed exhorter, established a congregation, taught music during the week to support himself; and on Sundays held Sunday school and worship services in his house, and preached outdoors in the public parks. Despite his constant pleas for help, no ordained minister was ever sent out. Finally, in 1892, he was forced by his wife's illness, to return to the United States—the Methodists in Recife were absorbed into other Protestant denominations that came in.

Recife, with a population of around one million, is the third largest city of BRAZIL and the capital of the northeast region. After decades of no witness, CESAR DACORSO, the first Brazilian bishop, made plans for the occupation of all Brazil, beginning with Salvador, state of Bahia, in 1946. That year, the General Conference of Brazil considered Recife as a possible field; and in 1950, the General Secretary of Missions reported the existence of a small Methodist congregation which had resulted from the efforts of individual Methodists. It was, however, only in 1959 that Dorival Beulke, a Brazilian, was sent to Recife as a missionary.

His first service was held in a garage with an attendance of thirty-two. Since then, the work has spread to three other centers. These stress social service with literacy classes for adults, and instruction on nutrition and hygiene.

RECORDS AND STATISTICS (U.S.A.). The Methodist Church has ever kept careful records of all its conferences and disciplinary actions. The Large Minutes as put together in the time of JOHN WESLEY, indicate how records first came to be formulated. Subsequently, when the Discipline began to be published in American Methodism, it contained within itself all sorts of recorded moves as well as disciplinary requirements.

It has always been the duty of the preacher-in-charge in the Methodist churches to keep correct records of all persons received on probation, or removed by letter, withdrawn from the church, and those who have deceased. Careful disciplinary directions have continued to be prescribed through the years instructing ministers how they must record enrollment, marriages, baptisms and deaths, and indeed all matters relating to the membership of the charge. One of the questions formally asked in quarterly conferences was, "Are the church records properly kept?"

Specific directions are given throughout the Discipline for the recording of work carried on, and for checking over work done. Every conference, from the Church Conference to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, has a secretary or secretarial staff whose duties are to keep careful records of all matters transpiring, and to see that these are properly preserved. The journal of each Annual Conference must be signed by the bishop or presiding president; and the bishops who preside over the General Conference must sign the minutes for the day or days upon which they preside.

The district superintendent signs the record of each charge conference. The minutes of the previous meeting are formally approved by the body creating them, after any member has an opportunity to propose corrections. Some conferences put the matter of checking and approving the minutes in the hands of a special committee.

It has long been the practice in the church for the minutes of each QUARTERLY (charge) CONFERENCE to be taken to the district conference (when there is one), and that conference appoints a committee to check over and report upon how the records of the several charges are kept. In turn, where there are district conferences, these send their records to the Annual Conference for approval. The Annual Conferences must send their four year printed journals to the succeeding JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE for its examination and approval.

The United Methodist Church has a Statistical Office which since reorganization of the general administrative offices of the church in 1952 has been put under the direction of the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE. Before that time there was an office of statistics under the BOOK EDITOR, and a statistician empowered to collect statistics from the entire church and to get these ready for the General Minutes as these were published.

The General Minutes of The Methodist Church have been published in one volume each year entitled the General Minutes of the Annual Conferences of The Methodist Church in the United States and Overseas. Such have been published since 1785. This now includes statistics for each local church in each annual conference. The Section of Research, Records and Statistics, which acts under the supervision of the Council on World Service and Finance, is authorized by the General Conference to put out each year the complete compilation of Methodist records.

The number of specific items having to do with the ongoing of all the activities of the church all of which must be reported on, and the necessity for the proper forms upon which to do this, forced The Methodist Church in time to create a Committee on Official Records and Forms. Something like 135 specific forms had to be prepared by this committee; everything from the proper baptismal certificate for an infant to the long list of questions which had to be called by the bishop at each annual conference.

Complete directions for keeping such records are outlined in the Discipline of The United Methodist Church, although such directions are not of course to be found together in any one place. The United Methodist Church prides itself, however, on keeping its records in better order and by a better system than any other large ecclesiasticism, although in older days the jibe was sometimes heard of the "Methodist Statistical Church."

THE COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES AND HISTORY and Annual Conference HISTORICAL SOCIETIES have helped greatly in the preservation of old records and statistics. Each quarterly (charge) conference is now empowered to create a "committee on records and history" which "shall be responsible for assisting the pastor to see that all church and charge conference records are kept on the official record blanks provided for that purpose. This Committee is empowered to examine the charge conference records annually at the end of each conference year, and to report the result of its examination to the charge conference in the ensuing year." (Discipline, 1968, ¶ 1412.)

RED BIRD MISSION. In 1919 the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, later the EUB Church, initiated a mountain mission on the Red Bird River at Beverly, Ky. Twenty acres in Bell County were donated for the mission by the Knuckle brothers.

Misses Myra Bowman (Pennsylvania) and Emaline Welsh (Illinois) were the first teachers, organizing a Sunday school for mountain people.

Elementary education in three locations and secondary education through a boarding school in 1931 became the first evidences of the growth of the mission.

J. J. DeWall of Iowa was the first evangelist and in 1920, a nurse, Lydia B. Rice, began a medical service. It was not until 1927 that a doctor, the Rev. Harlan S. Heim, M.D., joined the mission staff. The small hospital, erected in 1928, was replaced by a new structure located in Quendale in 1959.

The evangelistic witness also was manifest in the building of chapels and churches in Beverly, Jack's Creek, Beech Fork, Mill Creek and Greasy Fork, among others.

The mission work was carried on in 1970 by a staff of approximately eighty missionaries.

The rapid change in the mountains, including the strip mining process, and the advent of the Anti-Poverty government program in Appalachia have challenged the mission toward the significance of the church in its ministry to the people of the mountains.

RED LION, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., is a town where the United Brethren have always been strong. Red Lion was incorporated as a borough in the State of PENNSYLVANIA on Jan. 16, 1880. But as far back as May 10, 1729, when Lancaster County was established, there is record of white settlements in the area which is now known as York County. The soil was found to be unusually good. In a very short time industrious German immigrant farmers were clearing land and planting crops. Most of these German immigrants belonged to the Reformed and Lutheran faith; some were also Mennonites and Dunkards.

The areas now known as Freysville, Red Lion and Daltstown became settled with these German immigrants. In 1748 they built a log church and school—the only church that served this large territory. The St. John's Reformed Church was the first to establish a permanent church building with regular services for the town of Red Lion.

Since 1831 UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST missionaries had been preaching in the surrounding areas. In 1842 or 1843 Christian Crider urged the people to purchase a plot of land nearby and a place of worship was built. After the incorporation of the borough of Red Lion there was a strong urge for a town church of the United Brethren. The cornerstone for the town church was laid June 22, 1882. A new modern, architecturally beautiful Bethany Church was dedicated May 5, 1930.

St. Paul's Evangelical Church had its beginning in 1885 when Red Lion was a part of the Old York Circuit. An organization was effected but no regular preaching was maintained for lack of a place in which to worship. In 1894 a substantial brick church was built which had a membership of 125.

During the pastorate of J. Theodore Pettit, a new church school building was built and dedicated, debt free, in 1919. The church membership was 650 and a church school enrollment of 995.

St. Paul's Evangelical United Brethren Church, on Feb. 3, 1935, dedicated its Gothic Sanctuary. St. Paul's Church of Red Lion was one of the most beautiful and largest churches in the denomination. It had a membership of 1,700 members in 1967 and a few more than 2,000 church school members.

Although the population of Red Lion (1970) is 5,887, St. Paul's Church with its 1,656 members, Bethany with her 1,016 members, and Zion Church on the edge of town with 319 members accounted for more than one-half of the community's population.

Serving Red Lion are five other churches: St. John's United Church of Christ, Grace Lutheran, The Christian Missionary Alliance, Congregation of Jehovah's Witnesses and the Assembly of God.

But within a three mile radius of the borough of Red Lion are seventeen former Evangelical United Brethren Churches. In some of these areas thus served, there are no other denominations present.

RED ROCK CAMP MEETING. In 1837 the first three Methodist missionaries—ALFRED BRUNSON, David King, and John Holton—went to MINNESOTA to minister to the Indians, to a Sioux village at Kaposia, now South St. PAUL. Here in two and one-half years a church of thirty-three members had been organized—whites, Indians, and halfbreeds—and a farm of 150 acres placed under cultivation.

In the fall of 1839 B. T. Kavanaugh was sent as superintendent and built a log parsonage-meeting house-school on the east bank of the Mississippi at Red Rock. In 1843 the missions on both sides of the river were closed; others however, continued and white work extended.

John Holton, who came originally as a farmer, continued at Red Rock on his own farm. In 1868 he offered Pastor Bowdish of the Newport church, one mile south, ten acres of land for a CAMP MEETING. This included the log cabin and Red Rock. With neighboring pastors the offer was accepted, and the first camp held in June 1869. More land was purchased, extensive grounds developed, and camp meetings were held there continuously through 1937, with people coming by team, train, and steamer. The high point was 1886-88 under the ministry of Sam Small and SAM JONES when 20,000 passed through the turnstiles in a single day. Then came a gradual decline until 1899 when few attended.

In 1898 Bishop JOYCE assumed his residence in MINNEAPOLIS and brought evangelists Dunham and Baker for meetings. To conserve the results he organized in 1899 the Minnesota Pentecostal Association. For the year 1900 this new association was asked by the Red Rock Park Association to conduct the camp meeting, and this they did. Later they assumed the original charter and have conducted the camp since under the Red Rock name.

In 1938, due to encroaching industry and railroads, the camp was moved to Mission Farms, ten miles northwest of Minneapolis; and in 1961 to Lake Koronis, ninety miles west.

Noted evangelists and Bible teachers have appeared there. Missions have been emphasized and the voices of Bishops TAYLOR, McCABE, OLDHAM, and WARNE were heard. Other bishops have given forceful preaching—FOSS, McINTYRE, LEETE, CUSHMAN, NALL. Programs for children and youth have been well-planned; many have gone into the ministry and mission fields.

CHAUNCEY HOBART said: "What the State of Minnesota owes to Red Rock Camp Meeting can never be told. Nor can the waves of vital godliness that have flowed from it be estimated."

REDFIELD, JOHN WESLEY (1810-1863), American leader in the organization of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was a medical doctor, a Methodist local preacher and an outstanding evangelist. He was prominent in the mid-century HOLINESS revival movement in ILLINOIS, and ultimately led this group to join with the reform movement in the GENESEE CONFERENCE (ME) to organize the new church. Redfield was the evangelist during an unusual revival on the campus at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn. B. T. ROBERTS, later founder of the Free Methodist Church, was a student there. He was greatly influenced by these events and became a life-long friend of Redfield.

A. H. REDFORD

REDFORD, ALBERT HENRY (1818-1884), American minister and historian, was born in St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 18, 1818. He was converted in his boyhood and was early impressed that he was called to preach. Through the assistance of an uncle he received a classical education and his uncle expected him to enter a career of business. Despite this opposition he acted upon his conviction of duty and was licensed to preach. He joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1837. From mountain mission and hard circuits he moved on to the best circuits, stations, and districts of his conference.

Five times in succession he was elected as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE. He is best known for his work in historical research, and he left to the church three volumes of the history of Methodism in KENTUCKY to 1832, and a fourth volume entitled Western Cavaliers, bringing this history to the year 1846; also two other volumes entitled The Life and Times of Hubbard Hines Kavanaugh and A History of The Methodist Episcopal Church, South. These volumes have been a constant source of biographical and historical authority for Methodist historians. He searched the records of the church and availed himself of close examination of the General Minutes, the Methodist Magazine, Quarterly Reviews, and weekly journals of the church in order to bring together the details of the history of the Methodist Church in Kentucky. He rescued from oblivion the names of the pioneers and presented their characters in graphic briefness as only the wielder of a precise and eloquent pen could do.

In 1866, Redford was elected by the General Conference of the M.E. Church, South as BOOK EDITOR, and for twelve years he guided the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE of the Southern Church through the most perilous period of its history, following the War between the States. He faced criticism, divisions, many times bankruptcy, but by reason of his deep devotion and excellent business ability, he was able to bring the publishing interests of Southern Methodism through this stormy period. At the General Conference of 1878 he was unable to continue further the arduous trials of his position and returned to a pastorate in Louisville, where he served until his death.

REDRUTH PLAN as an episode in British Methodist history. After the death of JOHN WESLEY in 1791, disagreement about the future form of Methodism rapidly came to a head. The group of about fifty lay delegates who met in Redruth, Cornwall, on June 14, 1791, wanted a drastic revision of the Wesleyan constitution. They suggested, in a circular which was sent round the connection, that in future classes should choose their own leaders, and that members should not be expelled from or admitted to the societies without the consent of the majority of the existing members. The QUARTERLY MEETING should decide by a majority vote on such matters as the division of circuits and the admission of itinerants. If a case was brought against an itinerant, it should be heard by a court composed of equal numbers of itinerants and stewards. Such changes would have meant an end of the itinerants' virtual monopoly of Wesleyan government. The Redruth Plan had no immediate effect on the situation, but was important because it pointed forward to the kind of Methodist constitution which was to be set up by the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1797, and shows that such attitudes were already rife in some areas of Methodism soon after John Wesley's death.

REDSTONE CIRCUIT. The original "mother Circuit" of American Methodism west of the Appalachian mountains in western PENNSYLVANIA and western VIRGINIA. The circuit was laid out in the homes of MARYLAND Methodists who had emigrated to the west in the Fall of 1783 by RICHARD OWINGS, and in the Spring of 1784 John Cooper and Samuel Breeze were appointed by FRANCIS ASBURY to organize the circuit. In its first three years the circuit expanded to about 300 miles in extent with thirty preaching places extending from Uniontown, Pa., to the Ohio River, and from just south of PITTSBURGH nearly to Fairmont, W. Va. In 1787 the circuit was divided into three circuits and the next year a fourth was added. By 1799 there were five circuits in the region with ninety-six preaching places: Clarksburg, twelve; Greenfield, twenty-four; Ohio, twenty-four; Pittsburgh, twelve; and Redstone, twenty-four. There were nine log meetinghouses in the region, the remainder of the preaching places being in homes.

After the Treaty of Greenville of 1795 opened the northwest Territories to legal settlement and Methodists moved into northwestern Pennsylvania and OHIO, circuits were laid out in the new regions, the impetus coming from the original Redstone Circuit region. Thus the Muskingum Circuit was organized in 1799; Shenango, 1800; Erie, 1800; West Wheeling, 1802; Hock-Hocking, 1803; and Deerfield, 1803. The name "redstone" derives from a small creek that flows west from the mountains through Uniontown to the Monongahela River at Brownsville in Pennsylvania. It gave its name to the early religious organizations that moved into the region of southwestern Pennsylvania and western Virginia after legal settlement was made possible by the Treaty of Fort Stanwix with the Iroquois Indians in 1768. Thus the Baptist Redstone Association was formed in 1776; the Presbyterian Redstone Presbytery in 1782; and the Methodist Redstone Circuit in 1784. The "redstone country" was an important stage in American westward migration where the advancing frontier was arrested for a quarter of a century, then burst westward in a flood with the end of the Indian wars.

REED, ELBERT E. (1896-), American agricultural missionary, was born at Wichita, Kan., and was reared in La Grange, Ill. He received a B.S. degree in horticulture from Iowa State College, 1920, and M.S. from Oregon State College, 1936.

In 1920 Reed was called to CHILE as horticulturist at EL VERGEL, 3,800-acre farm near ANCOL, acquired in 1919 by the M.E. Church. In 1925 he became general administrator, occupying this position until retirement in 1963.

The work Elbert Reed accomplished in building at El Vergel during these thirty-eight years became known all over Chile, and, indeed, to horticulturists over the world. He began with very little and with no encouragement or even belief on the part of the local Chilean landholders that he could do anything at all with the project he was starting. But in time there came to be gardens, orchards, finally a colony employing about 400 people, having its own grist mill and its own self-sustaining facilities with a chapel in which worship is regularly conducted, and an amazing success in the planting of shrubs, flowers, fruit trees, and hardy trees for timber. The Chilean government after a time recognized this remarkable achievement by calling upon Albert Reed for various types of services and authorities in horticulture over South America and foreign lands were accustomed to write him for advice on various matters connected with their work. With all the colony was a Christian one in every way, and practical Christianity was exemplified in all its attitudes and undertakings. El Vergel was struck by an earthquake and badly damaged in May 1960 and the Christians of Chile and Methodists of the world rallied to build back what had been destroyed in the chapel and facilities.

Reed contributed to the development of the fruit industries and to the beautification of city streets, parks, and gardens. His procedures in soil conservation and farm management were widely adopted and became important to food production.

In 1922 he was married to Marian Harrington, daughter of the Rev. and Mrs. FRANCIS M. HARRINGTON, missionaries in Chile and founders of The Methodist Church and schools in BOLIVIA.

For his work in Chile, Reed has received awards by the Government of Chile, Agricultural Missions, Inc., and the Alumni Association of Iowa State College. He retired to California to live.

REED, MARSHALL RUSSELL (1891-1973), American bishop, was born at Onsted, Mich., on Sept. 15, 1891, the son of Fred P. and Elsie A. (Russell) Reed. From ALBION COLLEGE he received the A.B. degree in 1914 and the D.D. in 1931; and from GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY the B.D. in 1916 and the D.D. in 1940. NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY granted him the M.A. degree in 1917 and the S.T.D. in 1953; and ADRIAN COLLEGE, the LL.D. in 1959. He also studied at DREW UNIVERSITY.

He was ordained in 1917 and served pastorates in Gaines, 1917-18; Onaway, 1918-19; Calvary Church, Detroit, 1919-23; Jefferson Avenue, Detroit, 1923-28; Ypsilanti, 1928-34; Nardin Park Church, Detroit, 1934-48, all these being in MICHIGAN. He was elected a bishop of The Methodist Church at the NORTH CENTRAL JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE at INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. in July 1948, and was assigned to the Michigan Area.

He married Mary Esther Kirkendall on May 14, 1917, and they had three daughters, Elizabeth Jan (Mrs. Allan Gray), Elsie Mae (Mrs. John Ferentz), and Mary Louise (Mrs. William Ives).

Bishop Reed was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1932, '36, and to that of The Methodist Church in 1940, '44, and '48—when he was elected bishop. He was also a member of the Uniting Conference in 1939. He served on the General Board of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, on the Board of MISSIONS, on the Board of PENSIONS (of which he was president), and on the Commission on Interjurisdictional Relations. He was chairman of the National Methodist Conference on Urban Life, 1962, and the president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1962-63. He served as trustee of the Children's Home Society, the Chelsea Home for the Aged, of Adrian College, and of Albion College in Michigan. His official travel visitations as bishop took him to CHILE, 1950, and a four-month visitation to INDIA and the Orient in 1951, at the request of the Council of Bishops. He was the official visitor to Europe and North Africa in 1955. Upon his retirement in 1964, he continued to reside in Onsted, Mich. He died March 1, 1973, in Chelsea, Mich.

REED, MARY (1854-1943), an heroic missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church, was born in a prosperous family in Lowell, Ohio, and educated in that state. She came to Kanpur, INDIA in 1884, but became ill a few weeks later, and was sent to Pithoragarh in the Himalayas to recuperate and to study Hindi. On a ridge above her temporary home at the mission, she saw a colony of lepers, and felt that God wished her to serve them and would in time show her how. She returned to Kanpur and served there until she was appointed in 1889 to Conda.

The next year she went to America on furlough. In her homeland she became ill again, and was treated in Christ Methodist Hospital in CINCINNATI. A tingling sensation in the forefinger of her right hand and a strange scar on her right cheek baffled the physicians. One day, "as clearly as if a voice had spoken," she learned that her disease was leprosy, and that she should return to India to serve the lepers at Pithoragarh. She told her physician of the "revelation" that she knew God had given her about her condition. He consulted other physicians who were acquainted with leprosy and they confirmed the diagnosis. Within her family she told only one sister before saying good-bye to parents and other loved ones and friends. In LONDON and Paris she consulted experts on leprosy, who confirmed her conviction and the diagnosis made in Ohio.

From BOMBAY she wrote to her sister and asked her to tell her mother. She proceeded to Pithoragarh with joy, fully persuaded that she was under God's compulsive guidance. With backing from her church and the British Mission to Lepers, she developed at Chandag Heights, two miles above Pithoragarh, a lovely home for the homeless and gave herself unreservedly to serving sufferers from leprosy. While she never doubted that the physicians were correct in diagnosing her illness, she lived in the assurance that God was holding it in check to enable her to serve others without fear. She alleviated the suffering of hundreds and led a great company of afflicted people to Jesus Christ and the joy of discipleship. She returned to America just once to say good-bye to her family and country. After 1912 she never departed from the hills of Eastern Kumaun.

Some of those whom she received into her home came out of NEPAL, and others from Bhut on the border of Tibet. She maintained a guest house near her house and many people from India, Great Britain, and America traveled to Chandag Heights to meet her. She had a well-stocked library and kept abreast of history—local, Indian, and world. Her book The Unfailing Presence tells the secret of how she lived alone and achieved so much.

REED, NELSON (1751-1840), American minister, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Nov. 27, 1751, and entered the traveling ministry on PETERSBURG (Virginia) Circuit, June 1778. He was ordained elder at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE and presided ten years over various districts before his marriage and location in 1800. In 1805 he re-entered the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, where his comrades knew him for integrity and humble piety, and there served twelve additional years as a presiding elder before retiring in 1821.

Six times elected to GENERAL CONFERENCES (1808-28), he led the 1824 delegation. Although reputedly the world's oldest Methodist preacher, he remained active and in the closing year of life, as the sole surviving COKEBURY trustee, deeded the college property to Abingdon Church. He died Oct. 20, 1840 at BALTIMORE. His journal, 1778-82, is in the Methodist Historical Society, Baltimore.

REED, SETH (1823-1924), American minister, was born in Otsego County, N. Y., on June 2, 1823, of Puritan New England ancestry. The father died before his birth, leaving the mother and four children to struggle on a pioneer farm. In 1840, at seventeen years of age, he began to teach school.

In 1842 the family moved to GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. where he taught everything from alphabet to astronomy in rural schools, gaining his knowledge by home study. Expecting to enter the legal profession, he also studied law and became familiar with Blackstone's Commentaries.

His mother had been a Universalist and had brought up the boy in that faith; but before leaving New York he had undergone a conversion and joined the Methodists. In Grand Rapids he responded to the call of the ministry and entered the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE in the fall of 1844. For the next seventy-nine years he answered the annual conference roll call in person, a denominational record. His early circuits were Flat River, Mapleton, Bennington and Genesee, circuits which covered entire counties, where the preacher followed trails, corduroy roads, and met deer and bear and pagan Indians.

In 1847 he married Harriett W. Russell, who was his companion for fifty-one years. To them four children were born. Among his city appointments were Mount Clemens, Pontiac, Flint, Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor, and DETROIT. For a period of eighteen years he served as a district superintendent. During the Civil War he served both Union and Confederate forces as a member of the Christian Commission.

When the DETROIT CONFERENCE was organized in 1856, he was elected its first secretary, a position he held for four years. In 1895 he was one of the organizers of the Anti-Saloon League at WASHINGTON, D. C. He also served as the first superintendent of the Methodist Home for the Aged at Chelsea, Mich.

After his retirement and his marriage to Henrietta Andrews, following the death of his first wife, he resided in Flint. His one hundredth birthday in 1923 was the occasion of a civic and Conference-wide celebration. He died March 24, 1924 and was buried in Glenwood Cemetery, Flint, Mich.

REED, WALTER (1851-1902), noted American physician, head of the United States Army Yellow Fever Commission and the one generally credited with the discovery of the mosquito as the carrier of yellow fever. He was born in Belroi, Gloucester Co., Va., on Sept. 13, 1851, his father being Lemuel Sutlor Reed who served for forty years as a Methodist preacher in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES). Living in Charlottesville, he attended the University of Virginia, obtaining a medical degree in 1869 and a second degree from Bellevue Hospital Medical College (later merged with New York University's Medical School) in 1870. In 1874 he went into the Medical Corps of the U. S. Army.

Reed's work will always be associated with the work of the Yellow Fever Commission and with the consequent control of that disease. The Walter Reed General Hospital in Washington was subsequently named in his honor. He is said to have been "of a lively, happy disposition, enthusiastic and optimistic in everything to which he turned his hand." He is one of the few Methodists whose bust has been placed in the Hall of Fame of Great Americans in New York City.

REED, WILLIAM (1800-1858), British BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister, was born at Holwell, Buckland Brewer, North Devon, in October, 1800. His family united with WILLIAM O'BRYAN, and Reed accompanied JAMES THORNE on itinerary in 1819. Diffident and retiring as a youth, he developed remarkable powers of oratory, sustained prayer, and spiritual persuasion, and during his year at Hols-worthy four hundred members were received on trial. In 1835 he helped to reconcile many who had followed O'Bryan out of the connection. He was four times president of Conference, and F. W. BOURNE considered him the greatest preacher of the denomination. Reed died at Barnstable on May 9, 1858, and was buried at Lake.

ELI YEATES REESE

REESE, ELI YEATES (1816-1861), American preacher, poet, educator, singer, was for nineteen years the editor of The Methodist Protestant, the official organ of the M. P. Church. Reese was born in BALTIMORE, Md., on Jan. 18, 1816, the youngest of four preacher brothers who were actively identified with the M. P. Church. These brothers were the sons of David and Mary Reese. John S. Reese, M.D. (May 15, 1790-Feb. 15, 1855) served as president of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE many times; Levi R. Reese was chaplain in the House of Representatives in Congress in 1837-38; Daniel E. Reese (Feb. 17, 1810-April 23, 1877) was president of the Maryland Conference from 1871-73. Eli Yeates Reese was elected editor of The Methodist Protestant on Oct. 13, 1838, retired on July 22, 1843, and served again as editor from July 25, 1846, until his death on Sept. 14, 1861. He was the principal compiler of the Hymn Book of the Methodist Protestant Church, published by authority of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1859.

Reese was popular as a public lecturer both in Baltimore and elsewhere in the United States and often spoke on the Lyceum circuit. His death resulted from a mental depression which came about as the War Between the States severely cut the circulation of his paper south of the Potomac River. Also the death of his wife a year earlier had a profound effect. He was buried in the Baltimore Cemetery.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

REESE, LEVI R. (1806-1851), American M.P. leader of considerable note in his connection and president of its GENERAL CONFERENCE for a term, was born in Harford County, Md., Feb. 8, 1806. At the age of seventeen he was employed as an assistant teacher in an academy, where he increased his literary attainments. He planned to enter the naval service, but the death of a young friend made a deep impression on his mind, and under the pointed exhortation of a preacher he was converted and united with the M.E. Church, being about twenty years of age. He espoused the cause of reform, then being agitated in BALTIMORE, joined the Union society, and became secretary to that body; and in the controversies which arose he was among the number excommunicated from the M.E. Church on the charge of "sowing dissension in the church and speaking evil of ministers." He immediately entered into the active ministry of the new METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, and spent two or three years in NEW YORK and PHILADELPHIA. He subsequently served in every important station and in every official position in the body with which he was connected. For two successive years he was chosen president; was repeatedly a representative in the General Conference; and at one time presided over its deliberations. He was elected CHAPLAIN to the House of Representatives in Congress in 1837-38. During his chaplaincy a regrettable duel occurred which stirred public circles greatly, and Levi Reese delivered an impressive address which Bishop SIMPSON says was one of "delicacy, fidelity, and pathos." He also delivered in the Capitol a series of discourses on the obligations of the Sabbath, which were afterwards published. He was the author of Thoughts of an Itinerant. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 21, 1851.

REEVES, HANNAH PEARCE (1800-1868), born in Devonshire, England, Jan. 30, 1800, became one of the first itinerant woman preachers in the M.P. Church and therefore a pioneer among women in the first half of the nineteenth century who sought the right to share the lecture platform and the pulpit with men. She began preaching among the BIBLE CRISTIANIS at the age of nineteen and traveled on circuits in England and Wales. Subsequently she came to America and on July 5, 1831, was married to William Reeves (Dec. 5, 1802-April 20, 1871). Reeves, a native of Staplehurst, Kent, England, had come to the United States in 1829 and become a minister in the OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church. At the division of the Ohio Conference in 1833, he continued in the newly formed PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, which he later served frequently as president. He became a member of several GENERAL CONFERENCES and conventions of the denomination.

Upon arrival in America the couple immediately began their joint career in the reform movement of this church. Though Mrs. Reeves was offered an appointment on her own, she declined, preferring to accompany and assist her husband in his work. She was described as an "earnest and successful speaker, and was active in works of benevolence and philanthropy." Her health during the last nine years of her life kept her from regular public appearances, but she continued to be active in assisting churches, Sunday schools and benevolent societies. In 1848 her husband published at Putnam, Ohio, a defense of the ministry of women; and GEORGE BROWN wrote a book relating her life and services.

She died on Nov. 13, 1868, in New Brighton, Pa.

REEVES, JONATHAN (dates unknown), British Methodist, was one of John Wesley's earliest supporters. Reeves labored with success both in Cornwall and Ireland. He attended the Conferences of 1746, 1747, and 1748 and was appointed a trustee of the Orphan House in Bristol. He sought episcopal ordination and accepted the chaplaincy of the Magdalen Hospital, London, in 1758. He later served as a curate in Whitechapel and as rector of West Ham, Essex.

A. SKEVINGTON WOOD

REFORMED METHODIST CHURCH was formed in 1814 in Readsborough, Vt., by a group of Methodists led by Pliny Brett, a local preacher. At their first conference, Feb. 4, 1814, they adopted some Articles of Religion and rules for church government. The government was essentially congregational with no sharp distinctions being made between ministers and laymen. While the Methodist system of representative conferences was kept, ministers were delegates only if elected, not ex-officio. The local church was the focus of power, having the right to ordain elders, select their own ministers and do whatever else was necessary to carry on their work. Ministers, likewise, could pick their field of service.

Their doctrine was essentially Wesleyan though they emphasized divine healing and the possibility of attaining entire sanctification in this life. However, church membership did not rest upon assent to any particular doctrine, but in the fruits of righteousness obtained. They were anti-slavery and had an article against war.

From VERMONT, the church spread into the rest of New England, CANADA and NEW YORK. In 1837 it began publication of The South Courtland Luminary, which became the Fayetteville Luminary in 1939 and the Methodist Reformer in 1942.

In 1838 Pliny Brett, a large group in Ohio, and a large group in MASSACHUSETTS left the Reformed Methodists for the M.P. Church. Even in this weakened condition, the church continued to exist as a separate body until 1952 when it united with the Church of Christ in Christian Union and is now known as the North Eastern District of the Churches of Christ in Christian Union.

REFORMED METHODIST UNION EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The Reformed Methodist Union Episcopal Church was formed in 1885 by members of the A.M.E. Church who withdrew after a dispute concerning the election of ministerial delegates to General Conference. William E. Johnson was elected the first president. A strong sentiment of and for the non-episcopal nature of the new church was expressed. However, in 1896, steps were taken to alter the polity; and in 1919 after the death of Johnson, E. Russell Middleton was elected bishop. He was consecrated by Rt. Rev. Peter F. Stevens of the Reformed Episcopal Church. Following Middleton's death, a second bishop was elected and consecrated by the laying on of hands of seven elders of the church.

Doctrine was taken from the M.E. Church. The polity has moved in that direction and was fully adopted in 1916. Class meetings and love feasts are also retained. There were 16,198 members in thirty-one churches reported in 1967.

REFORMED NEW CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH. The Reformed New Congregational Church was formed in 1916 by Earl Wilcoxon, a minister of the CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH, and J. A. Sander, an independent minister. Using the doctrines of repentance, forgiveness and justification as their main points, they began a preaching tour through southern INDIANA and ILLINOIS and gathered converts into congregations.

The church is of the "holiness" type believing in the forsaking of sin by the sinner and the reception of divine light by God. They believe that war is contrary to Jesus' teaching and they condemn divorce, fancy wearing apparel, and secret societies.

As its name implies, the church is congregational in government and each elects its own pastor who is paid by freewill offering. No statistics later than 1936 are available at which time there were eight churches with 329 members.

REFORMED ZION UNION APOSTOLIC CHURCH. The Reformed Zion Union Apostolic Church was founded by a group from the A.M.E. Church interested in setting up a religious organization "to aid in bringing about Christian Union, whose fruit will be Holiness unto the Lord." Led by James Howell, the group met at Boynton, Va., in April 1869 and organized the Zion Union Apostolic Church with James Howell as the president. Harmony and growth prevailed until 1874, when changes in polity led to the election of Howell as bishop with life tenure. Dissatisfaction with this action nearly destroyed the organization even though Bishop Howell resigned. In 1882 a reorganization was effected, the four-year presidential structure reinstituted, and the present name adopted.

A representative conference structure is maintained with the law-making power invested in a quadriennial General Conference. Over the years the four-year presidency has again been dropped in favor of life-tenure bishops. A board of publication has control over church literature and publishes the church school material and the Union Searchlight, a periodical.

In 1965, the Reformed Zion Union Apostolic Church reported 16,000 members in fifty churches.

REGISTRATION FOR WORSHIP AND MARRIAGES. Following the eviction of over two thousand clergymen of the Church of England, under the Act of Uniformity, 1662, and the oppressive Conventicle Act, 1664, some relief was given to dissenters by the Act of Toleration, 1689, under which dissenting meetinghouses might be licensed. With the extension of Methodist preaching houses, as they were called, JOHN WESLEY was faced with a great difficulty. He rightly maintained that the Methodists were not dissenters but, many of them, members of the Established Church, and that the preaching houses were not used during church hours. He finally agreed, after taking legal advice, but under protest, that Methodist chapels might be licensed under the Act of Toleration. This was one factor which involved definite separation from the Church of England. It was not until toward the end of the nineteenth century that the continuing disabilities were removed. The present requirements in respect of all Nonconformist places of worship are as follows: (1) A building which is intended to be used for public worship must be registered for that purpose before use. Sketch plans may be required by the Superintendent Registrar, and a fee of 2/6 has to be paid. (2) A building registered for public worship must be further registered if it is desired that it should be used for the solemnization of marriages. A fee of £4.10.0 is payable to the Registrar General. The presence of the official registrar to witness and register the marriage is necessary unless otherwise provided as under (3). (3) An "authorized person"—minister or layman—may be certified on the appropriate form in triplicate to the Registrar General and when officially registered can take the place of the registrar in attendance at the ceremony and in registering the marriage. No fee is required in securing this appointment, but there are certain conditions including the provision of a suitable safe for the security of registers.

Registrations (1), (2), and (3) can all be undertaken at the same time if so desired.

REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, U.S.A., a seaside resort community, is situated on the Atlantic Ocean below the mouth of the Delaware Bay and forty miles from DOVER.

Because Robert W. Todd, a Methodist minister, suggested at a WILMINGTON preachers' meeting that an ocean-side religious gathering might prove popular, a CAMP MEETING was begun at Rehoboth in 1872. When land was secured and lots laid out, Todd was made manager. The resort town, a direct outgrowth of the camp meeting, developed slowly. From the camp meeting program two churches were eventually organized: the first, nonsectarian under Methodist control, was built by summer residents and called "Bishop Scott's Church" after the bishop who presided at the 1880 dedication; the second, Epworth Church, was built in 1889. When fire destroyed Scott's Church in 1913 the two congregations united, using the site of the former church, rebuilding and enlarging the old structure, and taking the name of the latter church. In 1970 Epworth Church property was valued at $381,260; its membership numbered 515, there were 260 church school students.

REHOBOTH CHURCH

REHOBOTH CHURCH, one of the national Historic Shrines of American Methodism, located on a five-acre tract two miles east of Union, Monroe Co., W. Va., is the oldest Protestant church edifice west of the Alleghenies. A log structure some twenty-one by twenty-nine feet with a narrow gallery which will seat nearly as many people as the room below, the church was built in 1786.

Under the leadership of local preachers who lived among the settlers in the region, a Methodist society was organized there in 1784. The group met in a schoolhouse which stood near the site of the present church. About 1785, Methodist circuit riders by the names of WILLIAM PHOEBUS and Lasley Matthews visited the area, and under Phoebus' ministry, Edward Keenan, a former Roman Catholic, was converted. Keenan led in building Rehoboth Church. His tombstone northeast of the church reads, "Edward Keenan, born 1742, died August 11, 1826. He built Rehoboth Church, and gave the lot of ground."

Rehoboth Church gave Methodism a foothold in a region where there were still forts against the Indians. In 1787 the Greenbrier Circuit which included Rehoboth Church was formed, and JOHN SMITH was appointed to travel it. Setting out to organize Methodism in the territory, Smith used Rehoboth Church as his rallying point. Smith's journal shows that he visited Rehoboth Church the first time on July 29, 1787. Also, it indicates that he was ordained deacon there by Bishop ASBURY on July 5 or 6, 1788 in the first ordination ceremony ever conducted west of the Alleghenies. According to Asbury's journal, he conducted three conferences at Rehoboth Church—1792, 1793, and 1796—and in addition he preached in the church in 1790 and 1797.

Rehoboth Church was used regularly as a place of worship for more than a century. From the early days people in the vicinity manifested concern for the log church and gave it protection and care. It is now the property of the Commission on Archives and History of the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. In recent years a steel canopy has been erected over the old log structure to protect it from the elements.

The 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE designated Rehoboth Church as a national Historic Shrine of American Methodism.

REID, ALEXANDER (1821-1891), NEW ZEALAND minister, was born in Edinburgh, SCOTLAND. As a young man, he became a teacher, both at OXFORD and at Bath. Fired with enthusiasm for the missionary cause, he offered for service in Africa and was sent for training to Richmond College, LONDON. He was there only twenty-four hours, for a letter came from WALTER LAWRY asking for two of the best men, and Reid was one of those chosen. Ordained and married in 1848, he reached New Zealand in 1849, and was appointed principal of Wesley College, Three Kings.

After eight years of strenuous teaching and preaching, Reid's health gave way and he was sent to the Te Kopua Mission Station. There he won the deep affection of the Maoris, who picked him up bodily and carried him to safety when the Maori Wars brought alien tribes to the district. After working among the British troops, he served in leading circuits until 1885, when he was again appointed to Three Kings, where he labored until his death on Aug. 25, 1891.

He helped to translate the Bible into the Maori language; he attended the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London; he was president of the New Zealand Wesleyan Conference in 1876; he was a member of the Auckland University Council; he was a leader of men and a prince of preachers.

REID, CLARENCE FREDERICK (1849-1915), pioneer missionary of the M.E. Church, South, to CHINA and KOREA, and later secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, was born in South Oxford, N. Y., July 19, 1849. As a member of the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (MES), he was appointed missionary to China, arriving in Shanghai in 1878. He became presiding elder of the Soochow District, and was a charter member of the China Mission Conference, organized in 1886.

The Soochow missionaries were seeking a mission field with more suitable climate for those who found the Soochow area unbearable, and in 1895, Reid and Bishop EUGENE R. HENDRIX visited SEOUL for that purpose. Decision was made to open work, and Reid was named superintendent of the Korea District of the China Conference. The next year he established residence in Seoul, surveyed the Korea field and began work in both Songdo and Seoul. In 1897 he was made superintendent of the newly established Korea Mission by the Board of Missions of his church.

Failing health caused Reid to return to America in 1900, but he never forgot his zeal for work in China and Korea. His remarkable gifts as a platform speaker made him a favorite through southern Methodism, especially for his address, "The Old and New in China."

He had early made a promise of a hospital for Songdo but it was left to his son, Wightman T. Reid, M.D., to fulfill that dream. A generous layman from Lynchburg, Va. gave $5,000, and in 1907, the son went to Songdo to erect the W. C. Ivey Hospital and begin the medical work which continued until Songdo was over-run by the Communists in 1950.

After returning to America, Reid became superintendent of work for Orientals on the Pacific Coast for his denomination, and in 1909 was named secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. His energetic leadership secured among other things legislation in the 1914 GENERAL CON-FERENCE giving official standing to the work of the laymen of the church.

REID, FRANK MADISON (1898-1962), an American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in NASHVILLE, Tenn., on Aug. 11, 1898. He received the A.B. degree from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY (Ohio) in 1921, and the M.A., D.D. and LL.D. (honorary) from Wilberforce and Allen Universities respectively. He was converted in 1904, licensed to preach in 1918 and admitted into the West Kentucky Annual Conference in 1922. He was ordained DEACON in 1922 and ELDER in 1923. He held pastorates in KENTUCKY and MISSOURI. He was elected bishop in 1940 from the pastorate of St. Paul Church, St. Louis, Mo. He served in South Africa and the southern United States. He died in 1962. Bishop Reid was active in the civil rights movement in SOUTH CAROLINA and known as an eloquent preacher.

REINHARDT COLLEGE, Waleska, Ga., was established in 1883 as Reinhardt Normal College with elementary and secondary schools. The college was named for Captain A. M. Reinhardt of Atlanta, who was the leading influence in its establishment. The elementary school transferred to the public-school system in 1925, and the secondary work was discontinued in 1956. Samuel Candler Dobbs, a nephew of Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER, was chairman of the board of trustees from 1926 to 1951 and the school's chief benefactor. The governing board consists of forty-two members elected by the board and confirmed by the North Georgia Annual Conference.

RELIEF FUND, METHODIST (British), began as a private appeal by HENRY CARTER to assist refugees in Europe; it has been administered since 1951 by the DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP. It gives help "in special cases of emergency, distress or need, in which the Methodist Church has a particular denominational responsibility." This is in practice interpreted to mean Methodists in distress, and also relief projects administered by Methodists. The fund now serves (1) to give immediate assistance to distress caused by natural catastrophes; (2) to sustain refugee relief work in GERMANY, AUSTRIA, HONG KONG, and ALGERIA; (3) to launch eventually self-supporting long-term relief projects, e.g. "Operation Friendship" in Jamaica, an orphanage in Uzuakoli, an agricultural development project in Kenya; (4) to provide personal assistance in cases of acute need. There is regular cooperation with the METHODIST COMMISSION ON OVERSEAS RELIEF (U.S.A.). Annual income grew from £1,500 in 1951 to £34,000 in 1965, an indication that the fund, though kept deliberately subordinate to Inter-Church Aid, exercises a growing ministry of practical compassion.

RELIGION IN LIFE is a quarterly journal published by ABINGDON PRESS, a division of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE of The United Methodist Church. It names itself "A Christian Quarterly of opinion and discussion" and makes its appeal to ministers and thinking laymen of all denominations. It was begun in the early 1930's by JOHN W. LANGDALE, the book editor of the M.E. Church who felt that since the old Quarterly Review had been discontinued, and the Quarterly Review of the M.E. Church, South, was about to be discontinued, a journal to take the place of these traditionally sponsored Church publications might well be published with success and profit. This should be not for Methodism alone, but for a wide reading Christian constituency among the major denominations of the United States and it was hoped over the English speaking world. The publication was begun by the Methodist Book Concern in New York and when a few years later at Church union in 1939 the Book Concern was merged into the Methodist Publishing House, the Uniting Conference itself—and subsequent General Conferences—have ordered and sponsored the publication of Religion in Life.

To further the interdenominational appeal, the editorial board chosen for this journal has always had in its membership scholarly and representative men of various Christian denominations. On its "advisory council" likewise are scholars, theologians, publicists and Church leaders of various denominations. The book editor of the Methodist Church is directed by the Discipline to edit Religion in Life as part of his duties, and the publication of the quarterly is entrusted to the Methodist Publishing House. The BOARD OF PUBLICATION of The United Methodist Church "at its discretion, may continue the publication of the quarterly Religion in Life, with the book editor responsible for its editorial content."

In keeping with its interdenominational character, Religion in Life does not promote specifically the fundamental Methodist emphases as did the old Reviews of the past generation. It is understood, however, that as it is unwritten and published by The United Methodist Church, it will and does set forth in many scholarly articles the teachings and trends and influential happenings in that Church, as well as reflecting significant movements in the modern Church world—both in theology and in life.

Religion in Life is necessarily somewhat eclectic for the reasons given above. The vast number of its subscribers are, however, Methodists. Within recent years each issue has been devoted specifically to a particular emphasis in the realm of Church life and thought, with three or four articles setting forth the special emphasis featured in that individual issue. Other articles are chosen for their merit in the general field of Church life, history, ethics, theology, and so forth, and as in the case with other scholarly publications, a book review section endeavors to keep the readers abreast of new and significant publications.

Religion in Life, like its Review predecessors (except possibly in their heyday) has never been entirely self-supporting, but is underwritten by the Publishing House of The United Methodist Church as a service to Christian scholarship and to enlightened thinking on the part of its readers. The journal is held in high repute in the United States, is on file in many libraries, and current and past volumes of Religion in Life are available on microfilm for those who wish to have its published material made thus available.

Following JOHN LANGDALE, who died just after Church union in 1939, NOLAN B. HARMON, book editor of the Church, edited the journal until 1956 when he was elected bishop; and then EMORY S. BUCKE, the present book editor of The United Methodist Church, became editor-in-chief. The address is the Methodist Publishing House in Nashville, Tenn.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES. Several voluntary groups were founded in later seventeenth-century England, to combat what many felt to be a breakdown of religion, morals, and social stability. This probably reflected the declining influence of traditional church doctrine and discipline, as well as a desire for active lay Christianity. Of these societies, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698) promoted education, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701) hoped to serve the colonies. The Societies for the Reformation of Manners (1690-91) wished to implement existing laws against vice; and in the eighteenth century both JOHN WESLEY and WILLIAM WILBERFORCE supported short-lived attempts to revive them. The "Religious Societies" proper were founded earlier (c. 1678) by ANTHONY HORNECK and Richard Smithies for young Londoners with a religious concern. They were wholly Anglican, under clerical direction; they used the Prayer Book; and discussion of personal problems was voluntary. Later, these societies spread to the rest of the British Isles and encouraged charitable work. Religious societies of this type still active in 1738 probably supplied personnel rather than methods or ideas to early Methodism. Under Methodist and Moravian influence, and in response to the preaching of WHITEFIELD and the Wesleys, these societies, and new ones, began to use free prayer, to emphasize justification by faith, and to concentrate on mutual confession of sins. The older type of society probably disappeared, while the specifically Methodist societies separated from the Moravians in 1740, and had their own distinctive rules from 1743.

RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE, official paper of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, was authorized by the Scioto Conference in 1834, when the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1833 requested that Conference to supervise the publishing venture to be formed at Circleville, Ohio. In June 1834 WILLIAM RHINEHART had begun a newspaper for the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE under the title Union Messenger, soon changed to Mountain Messenger. The trustees of the newly formed denominational publishing house, in order to discourage more than one periodical in the church, purchased the fonts of type from William Rhinehart in November 1834, and chose him to become their editor. Rhinehart also brought along his subscribers, small in number. The first issue, a semi-monthly, was released Dec. 31, 1834. Later it became a weekly.

When DAYTON, Ohio became the site of the publishing house in 1853, the Religious Telescope was issued from that city. The paper continued to serve the church until the time of union with The EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1946. It was then united with The Evangelical-Messenger of that body to become The Telescope-Messenger of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, which paper received the volume numbering of the Religious Telescope.

RENNER, S. M. (1896-), E.U.B. minister in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa, was born Oct. 22, 1896. Educated in the mission schools of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST in Sierra Leone, he entered the ministry, January 1918, and was ordained by the Sierra Leone Conference, January, 1927. He served pastorates at Freetown and Moyamba, covering fifty-one years. For twenty-two years he also was conference superintendent. On June 2, 1921 he was married to Miss Martha Rosaline, to which union were born four sons, two of whom entered the ministry.

In addition to denominational responsibilities he has held membership as follows: general secretary and president of United Christian Council; president of Sierra Leone Ministers Fraternal; Freetown City Council; Chairman of Mining Wages Board; The Protectorate Assembly; Committee on return to Civilian Rule; WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES Committee on Rapid Social Changes in Africa.

LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE gave him an honorary D.D. degree in 1945. King George VI decorated him as an Officer of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire (Civil Division) and Queen Elizabeth II decorated him as Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire.

RENO, NEVADA, U.S.A., is the educational, financial, and industrial center for the northern and central part of the state. The town was named for a Civil War General, Jesse Lee Reno.

Methodism and the Central Pacific Railway reached Truckee Meadows, now Reno, in the same year, 1868. The town grew steadily. When the mines closed and NEVADA turned to "tourism" for its support, Reno announced itself "The Biggest Little City in the World." Owing to Nevada' liberal divorce law in the years following World War II as many as 6,000 divorces were granted here annually, and 24,000 marriages per year were performed. As the downtown church, First Church was sought by many of the out of town couples who came from religious homes. An energetic pastor, Frederick H. Busher, arranged to have a minister of marriage, and announced that all fees, above expenses, would go to missionary work in the state. For several years this church reported the second largest number of marriages of any church in the United States.

Since 1950 Las Vegas has become more an amusement center than Reno, and attracts larger numbers.

The campus of the University of Nevada is in the city. President during its formative years, 1884 to 1904, was Joseph E. Stubbs, a member of the CALIFORNIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The six Methodist churches in the Reno-Lake Tahoe area report (1970) 2,121 members.

RENTOUL, THOMAS C. (1882-1945). Australian minister and church leader. After a sound evangelical conversion, T. C. Rentoul entered the ministry in Victoria in 1911. He soon became distinguished by his earnestness and his administrative ability. He was a CHAPLAIN in World War I, 1916-18, suffering the effects of gas. After a short experience in circuit work he was selected to assist A. T. HOLDEN in Home Missions work.

From 1932 to 1945 he was general superintendent of Home Missions in Victoria. Tall, with authority in his bearing, a master of detail, and tireless in pursuing progressive policies, T. C. Rentoul stamped his influence on the life of Methodism in Victoria, and also in the Federal Inland Mission. He travelled far and wide through the inland areas of the continent in supervising the pioneer work of the Church.

T. C. Rentoul's initiative was seen in organizing the work of the Deaconess Order, in the acquisition of church property, and in stimulating EVANGELISM. He served as chaplain in World War II and was Chaplain-General from 1937 until his death on Dec. 28, 1945, this resulting from an infection received while on duty in NEW GUINEA that year.

He was president of the VICTORIA AND TASMANIA CONFERENCE in 1940, elected secretary-general in 1945 and, but for his untimely death, would have become president-general.

REPENTANCE. Repentance in its generic sense signifies a change of mind (metanoia in the Greek New Testament), a wishing something were undone that has been done and signifying a change of mind and disposition. In a strictly religious sense it signifies a conviction of sin, and a godly sorrow for it. A real repentance differs from what has sometimes been called "repentance" when that has been caused by the knowledge of injuries sustained or penalties likely to come. It is not sorrow for being caught in wrong doing. Evangelical repentance is not only sorrow for something done—sometimes for a whole life recognized as wrong—but is a recognition of the sin as offensive to God, accompanied by an immediate intent to see that the act repented of is done no more. Frequently great moral dejection comes when man feels himself helpless in the power of temptation against the type of thing he is repenting of. This was St. Augustine's experience again and again before he actually was converted. He repented enough—as he tells the story in his Confessions—but could not by his own power keep from sin—until he really threw all on God.

"Repentance is a personal sorrow for personal sin as against a Holy God," wrote OLIN A. CURTIS (in The Christian Faith, p. 353). "We should place great emphasis upon the fact that repentance is personal. . . . repentance is not merely something done by a person, it is something done by a person when he is self-conscious. . . . no man can repent without real self-decision and there can be no self decision without full self-consciousness." The same authority goes on to define repentance more definitely as "a sinner's personal sorrow over his responsible sin, both in deed and in condition of heart; and involves a confession of the guilt of a sin, a purpose to get free from his sin, and an intense hatred of his sin against the Holy God."

For a time there was a debate between certain Calvinistic theologians who held that regeneration precedes faith and repentance; as, according to that view, only the regenerated could perform such religious acts. With them the process was first regeneration; second, faith; and third, repentance. Methodists have always believed that in the salvation of the sinner, the Holy Spirit first enlightens his understanding and causes him to feel his need of a Saviour; that under this spiritual influence and enlightening comes a sincere repentance and an intent to turn from sin; then comes belief and hope in the Lord Jesus Christ and a casting of the soul upon His mercy and leadership; and then as has been the case with many, there follows a sense of justification and of acceptance by God.

While repentance is, strictly speaking, the act of man, it is nevertheless also in another sense the gift of God. Without the Grace of God first given, no man will repent or turn to God. Here is where what theologians call "prevenient grace" comes into play—an act of God opening the mind and heart to the accusing and pleading influences of the Holy Spirit. As the old hymn, written by William Bengo Collyer, has it: "Those warm desires that in thee burn were kindled by reclaiming grace."

This grace "supplies light to the understanding, quickens the emotions, and so seals Divine Truth upon the consciousness that the sinner not only sees, but feels his spiritual danger. The motives to repentance have been furnished in the Word of God; opportunity to repent is afforded through the mercy and forbearance of God; and hope is found in the promises given to the penitent and the contrite heart." (Simpson's Cyclopaedia, in loc.)

Repentance and conviction are almost concomitant moves in the same category, though conviction is more an attitude of the mind bringing repentance, as repentance is more a move of the soul. (For an outline by Wesley on Methodist teaching see Sermon IX, The Spirit of Bondage and of Adoption.)

Methodists have always preached repentance, not as an intellectual or moral state, but as a necessary precondition of acceptance with God. As part of the conference course or study in American Methodist Churches for some years, young ministers had to prepare a sermon on repentance as part of their examination for acceptance in the Conference. It should be stressed, however, that preaching repentance is not done to explain repentance as an intellectual concept, but to get people actually to repent.

It is "A hopeful determination to get right at any cost." . . . Dr. Olin Curtis puts it: "The whole feeling is this: 'God himself wants me to be right, then I can be right, then I will be right.'"

REPROBATION. This doctrine, which has been held of the more extreme among Calvinists, declares that the finally impenitent who go to eternal damnation, do so on account of the express and eternal predestinating decree of God. This admittedly fearsome doctrine is in general chiefly a matter of historical interest, for it is not often voiced among responsible modern Calvinists. However, in the eighteenth century it was a matter of bitter controversy between the Wesleys and their detractors, and the controversy left marks upon later Methodism. It is in the interests of modern ecumenical understanding, therefore, to attempt a dispassionate judgment regarding this ancient stumbling-block.

Background to the Doctrine. Many modern Methodists may find it hard to understand why some perfectly sincere followers of our Lord should have affirmed this doctrine, which on the face of it seems so contrary to the concept of the universal love of God the Father. That self-righteous condemnation and controversy may be avoided, it is necessary to look behind this teaching, and to understand that there are reasons for it which, though firmly rejected by Methodists, are quite intelligible. In the first place, it is a dark mystery of life why some people who hear the Gospel accept it, and others do not. It is also a mystery of God's providential government of the world that some people should apparently have little or even no chance. The doctrine of Reprobation places this matter squarely upon the unfettered and unaccountable choice of the Sovereign Lord of all. This answer does not satisfy us, but as we reject it, we are aware that alternative answers are not free from difficulty.

For the general background to this matter in religious experience, Scripture exposition, and theological speculation, the reader is referred to the article ELECTION, especially to the note on the doctrine of Particular Election. The Augustinian would affirm that this stern predestinarian doctrine is in keeping with the justice and goodness of God, because the whole human race collectively, and every man in it, has sinned, and merits damnation. Therefore those whom God does not elect to save are justly lost, while His goodness is displayed in His will to save some who do not deserve to be saved. Many Calvinists have, wisely we feel, carried their speculation no further. They have affirmed the positive side of God's gracious action towards the Elect, and remained prudently silent regarding the dark mystery of the lost. However, the instinct to complete a speculative system is very strong in some minds. Therefore some have made themselves responsible for the doctrine of a double divine Predestination. Those who are finally damned will be lost because God has positively decreed that they shall be lost. This is the doctrine of Reprobation.

Scripture warrant has been sought for the doctrine of Reprobation, the leading passage being Romans 9:17-23. It is not possible here to expound the whole of this difficult passage, but the chief point is the reference to Exodus 9:12-16, with the phrase "and the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh." Scientific exegesis would observe that the ancient Hebrews were deficient in the means of expressing the idea of "indirect causation." It is natural for us to think of a "law of nature," for which the Creator is indeed ultimately responsible, which yet is self-acting within the sphere of nature. Thus it is possible, in an order perverted by sin, for God to allow things to happen according to natural law which are not His direct will. For ultimately good moral reasons God for a time permits human rebellion. The Hebrews did not find it easy either to grasp or to express this notion of indirect divine operation. They spoke as though everything which happened in God's world came straight from God. Thus the intention of the phrase "God hardened Pharaoh's heart" would be expressed in our speech by "Pharaoh's heart became hardened" (according to the working of a moral law, but not excluding Pharaoh's own choice of evil). Thus understood, the force of such a passage as Romans 9:17-23 is greatly reduced. It does not mean that God arbitrarily damned Pharaoh, but that his obstinacy, for which he was truly responsible, was over-ruled by God for a good purpose which ultimately extends to all men (cf. Romans 11:11-12).

Wesleyan Controversy Regarding Reprobation. JOHN WESLEY was hotly attacked by some Calvinist opponents as disloyal to the evangelical doctrine of salvation by grace, because he strongly affirmed the position more characteristic of catholic Christianity. This is that saving GRACE is in principle available to all men, because the effectual means of grace are open to all who will use them, and the universally loving God will by His prevenient grace enable all men who desire Christian salvation to use these means of grace. However, we may claim that Wesley's attitude as a practical and common-sense teacher is in accord with the intention of the Anglican Article X (VIII in the Methodist Articles), and XVII (see ARTICLES OF RELIGION for text of these particular Articles). He can most strongly affirm the positive spiritual values implicit in the strong doctrine of grace taught by the Calvinists (see Minutes of Several Conversations for 1745, August 2, Q. 22 and 23, Works VIII, 284-5). In this sense he is "within a hairbreadth of Calvinism." Yet he was splendidly free from their often arid and entangling speculations regarding God's government of the race. In particular, he totally repudiated the extreme, dreadful, and erroneous doctrine of Reprobation.

REPUBLICAN METHODIST CHURCH was formed in 1792 by the followers of JAMES O'KELLY, who had strongly contested the appointive power of Bishop ASBURY at the 1792 GENERAL CONFERENCE. O'Kelly had earlier participated in the schismatic Fluvanna Conference (1779) and as a presiding elder in the southern district, had been a strong advocate of democratizing the conferences. The church he founded showed an immediate success in VIRGINIA and gained several thousand members in the first few years. Its major characteristics were its democratic ideals. It gave laymen more rights and put all ministers on an equal basis. As a corollary, it was strongly anti-slavery.

In 1801, following a decline in the original growth, O'Kelly reorganized the church; he abolished all regulations and discipline, except the scripture, and renamed the body the Christian Church. After several years of co-operative activity, a union was effected with two other "Christian Churches" to form the American Christian Convention. This body in turn united with the Congregational Church to form the Congregational Christian Church. This latter body is currently a part of the United Church of Christ.

REPUBLICAN UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH was a pro-war schismatic group formed by members of the White River

Conference of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, during the Mexican War. The church's origin can be traced to an informal meeting of ministers and members of the White River Conference at Dowell Meeting House, Franklin Circuit, Ind., on March 12, 1848. At the meeting, a resolution was passed protesting conference action concerning P. C. Parker. Parker had been expelled from the ministry for "immorality" because of his participation in the war. This resolution was refused publication; therefore, an appeal was made to GENERAL CONFERENCE. The 1853 General Conference, however, sustained Parker's expulsion and also passed a strong anti-war resolution as well as a resolution on total depravity. These three actions became the formal basis for withdrawal. At a meeting at Union Chapel, Decatur County, Ind., Sept. 8-12, 1853, the new church was organized.

The Republican United Brethren substantially followed the United Brethren in polity but objected to certain powers of the bishops, the presiding elders, and the stationing committee. They also dissented on the issues of war and peace and total hereditary depravity.

The church was small (the first conference listed only two charges) and existed for only a short time. In the 1860's they became part of the Christian Union.

RESTRICTIVE RULES. (See GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.)

RESURRECTION: General. There is no distinctive Methodist doctrine of the General Resurrection. In common with the general body of the Church catholic the Methodist Church teaches that one of the events connected with the final stages of the history of this world will be the Resurrection of all men, as a prelude to the Last Judgment (John 5:28-29; Revelation 20:13). This belief is affirmed in the creeds commonly used among Methodists, the ecumenical NICENE CREED reading, "And I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come," and the APOSTLES' CREED reading, "I believe in the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting." The universal Church has never found it necessary to make her dogmatic definition more precise than this. Thus there is allowable a substantial liberty of interpretation as to what is intended by this part of the Christian hope, dependent upon the interpretation which is given to those parts of Scripture which speak of it.

This doctrine is plainly presupposed in the authoritative Standard Sermons and Notes on the New Testament of JOHN WESLEY, as in his other writings, and in the Wesley hymns. Significantly, however, the Wesleys presuppose rather than argue the point, because this doctrine was not a matter of controversy in their time. They are content to rejoice in the greatness of Christian hope, and to warn men of the reality of judgment to come. In his exposition of Scripture John Wesley states it as his opinion that the Resurrection of the Body, though real, is not the resurrection of the present material body of flesh and blood, but of a glorious body suited to the conditions of the Heavenly Kingdom, and cites the ancient Greek Father Macarius in support of this exposition (Notes on 1 Corinthians 15:51-2; II Corinthians 5:2,4; Philippians 3:21). It may perhaps be stated that since his day the general body of more reliable Methodist opinion has followed this line.

Origin of the Doctrine. This Christian doctrine is the heritage of the Hebrew roots of the Church. In earlier periods the Hebrews held a view of human destiny beyond the grave similar to that of many other ancient religions, and not unlike that revived by "Spiritualist" teaching in the modern world. The shades of the departed were supposed to continue in existence, though with a reduced and denatured vitality and identity (Isaiah 14:9-10). Their abode was Sheol, a kind of "grave of the race" under the ground. (This word is rendered "hell" in K. J. V., and "Hades" in the Greek Bible; the term is not to be confused with "Gehenna," the place of punishment of the wicked, also rendered "hell.") God had withdrawn His "spirit" or principle of animation from these shades (Job 34:14-15), and therefore they were excluded from communion with God (Psalm 6:5, 115:17), though this idea was to some extent later modified by the conviction that the sovereignty of God extended even to the abode of the departed (Psalm 139:8). This frame of thought was challenged by the experience of religious persecution, particularly under the Greek tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes, when many Jews suffered martyrdom rather than desert their faith. It then seemed an inconceivable denial of divine justice that those who most merited to see the vindication of God in the Day of the Lord should be denied their share in this triumph of the very martyrs' deaths which were the ground of their merit. Thus faith in God's justice clothed itself in the expectation that the righteous departed would be raised from the grave, so that they might have their part in the promised divine Kingdom (Daniel 12:1-3). This belief developed in the period between the Old and New Testaments, so that by the time of our Lord it was a widely-accepted doctrine that in the day of the Messianic Kingdom there would be a General Resurrection of all men, the good and the bad, to divine judgment. The more conservative Sadducees, however, rejected this and other late developments of Jewish Messianic belief (Matthew 22:23, Acts 23:8).

For St. Paul God both set His seal upon this doctrine of Resurrection as the mark of triumph over death, and modified in a spiritual direction the conception of Resurrection by the wonder of Christ's rising from the dead (Romans 6:9). The Resurrection narratives in the four gospels indicate both that Christ rose from the grave, and that this Resurrection was no mere re-vivification of the physical body which had died on the Cross. There was a mysterious "glory" about the Risen Christ which corresponded to a complete triumph over death. The doctrine of a General Resurrection to judgment of all men therefore naturally passed over into the Church, and very significantly when St. Paul seeks to expound this Resurrection hope he does so by applying to the Resurrection of the believer that which the Church had learned from the experience of Christ's own Resurrection. He thus argues that when Christians are raised from the dead it will not be with a mere body of flesh and blood like the present, but with a "glorious" or "spiritual" body adapted to the Kingdom of Christ's triumph (I Corinthians 15:35-54).

Significance of the Doctrine. This important Scriptural doctrine symbolizes for the Christian the confident hope that the believer who, in Christ, triumphs over death, has before him a destiny much more blessed than the bare survival of a disembodied ghost, or the denatured shade of his former self. The whole man will be alive in Christ's heavenly Kingdom, with every faculty proper to the human personality quickened to an abundance of life. The "Resurrection of the Body" answers to the idea of the fullness of triumph over death. It also provides a particular example of the general principle of the religion of the Incarnation, namely, that God has created that which is material as the expression of a high spiritual purpose. This material world, and man's physical frame which is a part of it, is the precious handiwork of God, which He has created as the means of making Himself known to man, and the means through which He will redeem man by His incarnate Son. Thus the destiny of God's handiwork is not to be "cast as rubbish to the void," as though it were spiritually unprofitable. The material creation is to be redeemed, that God's glory may be seen in it (Romans 8:21-23). Thus to the Christian it is not the case that man's non-material soul is the only element of permanent spiritual value about him. The body is likewise "the temple of the Holy Ghost" (I Corinthians 6:19-20), and is to be redeemed in Christ. In this respect the Christian Faith largely accords with the findings of modern physiological and psychological investigation, which teaches that the development of the non-material mental and spiritual activities of man is closely linked with the activity of the physical nervous system. "Body" and "soul" are interdependent, and together form the complete man. The "Resurrection of the Body" is the traditional way of saying that the whole nature of this unitary "man" is to be saved to the uttermost, though that body which is the due partner of the soul will not always be this present lowly material body.

It is only candid to observe that in the modern period many of the more radical among New Testament critics have affirmed that the New Testament, if rightly understood, does not require acceptance of the traditional doctrine that Christ's Resurrection included the raising of His body from the tomb, and the mysterious divine transformation of the physical body which had died on the Cross into a glorious Resurrection-body. It would be taught that the Apostles received an immediate mental impression that their Lord was indeed spiritually present with them, triumphant over death, and that the believing mind of the early Church constructed the Gospel Resurrection narratives as a means of symbolizing this faith. Thus the critic would claim that he believes in a "resurrection," in the sense that Christ triumphed fully over the power of death, but that the resurrection narratives are not to be taken literally. This is not the place to argue the pros and cons of this transformation of the traditional Christian system, but only to observe that if accepted it involves a very drastic reduction of the traditional incarnational principle. This cannot fail in turn to affect the traditional doctrine of the General Resurrection, which, as we have seen, was argued in the early Church from what was believed regarding Christ's own Resurrection. If it be accepted that Christ's Resurrection was not a divine act performed within the sphere of this physical world, but only the continuance of a "spiritual" presence, then it would seem that the hope which is set before the believer in Christ is not that of the Resurrection of the Body, but only the continuance of a "spiritual" soul.

Other modern critics have, in somewhat striking contrast to this, made much of the distinction between the Biblical doctrine of Resurrection and the commonly-accepted belief in the Immortality of the Soul. It has been rightly observed that "resurrection" is an Hebraic idea, while "immortality" goes back to categories of Greek thought. The Immortality of the Soul as a symbol of the believer's triumph over death answers to the notion that the permanently valuable "real man" is the non-material "soul," while the destiny of the spiritually non-profitable body is to be cast aside in the grave. This, it is argued, is a system of thought very different from the Biblical and incarnational doctrine that God works the spiritual through the material. Though there is much of substance in this contrast, the antithesis between Hebraic "resurrection" and Hellenic "immortality" is nevertheless not absolute. The two ideas have to some extent been reconciled in traditional Roman Catholic and Protestant thought, with the sanction that the concept of "immortality" is found in the New Testament, as well as that of "resurrection" (I Corinthians 15:53-54). The doctrine of Immortality accords with the Christian faith that the departed in Christ, awaiting the General Resurrection, are certainly not in a state of suspended animation, or of a dim Sheol-like existence. The saints who have gone before are even now in a state of spiritual blessedness, and rejoice in the immediate presence of Christ (Luke 23:43; Philippians 1:23). Nevertheless, this happy destiny does not, in the Christian view, preclude the idea of development in the unseen world, or of growth in blessedness as the saints are changed "from glory to glory." The Resurrection of the righteous at the culmination of God's redeeming purpose for the world may be viewed as a stage in this. Thus present Immortality and future Resurrection are not inconsistent, but complementary.

The First and Second Resurrection. A word may perhaps be added regarding this theoretical disjunction which has at times been in the Church a matter of obscure and not always very edifying controversy. Those who insist that the symbolism of Revelation 20:4-13 is to be taken literally have taught that the Resurrection of all the dead is in two stages. The saints will first rise from the grave, and will reign in glory with Christ upon the earth for "a thousand years" in the Millennial Kingdom. After this the remainder of mankind will rise, good and bad, for the Last Judgment, and the final vindication of God's sovereignty. Those who hold this view are called "pre-millenarians," teaching that Christ's Second Advent will take place before the Millennium. Another view, commonly held in more characteristically ecclesiastical circles, is that the historic Church already in some sense represents Christ's earthly reign, so that no distinct period of "Millennial Kingdom" is to be looked for. In this case, the Christian expectation is that at the end of the Age Christ will come in glory. There will then take place immediately the one General Resurrection of all men, and the Last Judgment. Those who hold this doctrine are "post-millenarians." We would commend the view that the ultimate and perhaps very distant stages of God's government of the world are inevitably shrouded in mystery. Not being matters of empirical human experience they can only be spoken of in symbolical language, expressing general spiritual principles. We cannot be certain exactly how far if at all the admittedly symbolical language of Scripture is to be taken literally, though it is authoritative to establish general principles. Therefore, while the believer may rightly cling to a confident Christian hope, it is unfitting to seek to know the unknowable (Matthew 24:44; Acts

1:7), and to divide the Church by over-confident controversy in these matters.

JOHN LAWSON

REVELS, HIRAM RHOADES (1822-1901). American A.M.E. and M.E. minister, and also U. S. Senator, was born to free parents in Fayetteville, N. C., Sept. 1, 1822. He was of mixed African and Croatan Indian descent. Forbidden by law to attend southern schools, he was educated at Quaker institutions in INDIANA and OHIO and at Knox College, Galesburg, Ill. In 1845 he entered the ministry of the A.M.E. Church. During the next eight years he taught school, lectured and preached in several midwestern states. Following a local church dispute in St. Louis, he became a Presbyterian preacher for several years.

During the Civil War, Revels helped to recruit Negro regiments for the Union Army in MARYLAND and MISSOURI. In 1864 he became CHAPLAIN of a black MISSISSIPPI regiment and served a short time as provost marshal of VICKSBURG. Returning to the A.M.E. Church, he organized several congregations for that denomination in JACKSON. In 1866 he settled at Natchez, and in 1868 he joined the M.E. Church. In the latter year he was elected alderman, though he entered politics reluctantly, fearing race friction and the possibility of conflict with his work as a minister. In politics he won the liking and respect of the white people of the state. Elected to the state senate from Adams County, he was elevated by the legislature in January 1870, to the U. S. Senate, filling the seat that had been occupied by Jefferson Davis prior to the Civil War. Revels was a Republican but not a Radical. He served in the Senate until March 4, 1871.

Upon his retirement from the Senate, Revels was elected president of Alcorn University, a newly established school for Negroes. He filled the position with credit. Following the sudden death of JAMES LYNCH, another Negro Methodist preacher-politician, Revels served a few months as secretary of state ad interim of Mississippi. When he dissented from the political activities of Mississippi Republicans, Revels lost his position at Alcorn. However, in 1875, he aligned himself with white Democrats to overthrow the Carpetbag government in the state, and as a result was again appointed president of Alcorn, serving until 1883.

In 1875 Revels was received "by transfer" into the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (ME) and was appointed to Holly Springs. The next year he was placed on the Holly Springs District. As a reserve delegate to the 1876 GENERAL CONFERENCE, he was elected editor of the Southwestern Christian Advocate but declined to serve. Apparently he served the church and the district at Holly Springs without giving up the presidency of Alcorn. In 1877 he was appointed to the Jackson District which he served for three years while also president of the college. From 1880 to 1883 he gave full time to Alcorn. Beginning in 1884 and continuing until his death, he was a presiding elder in what became, in 1890, the UPPER MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (ME). He served the Aberdeen and Greenwood Districts six and two years, respectively, and was on the Holly Springs District three different times for a total of nine years. He died while attending the session of his annual conference at Aberdeen, Miss., Jan. 16, 1901.

REVEREND, British Methodist. JOHN WESLEY's helpers and assistants can be divided into those who had Anglican orders, who would be addressed by the traditional English title "the Reverend," and the unordained itinerants who would be addressed as plain "Mister." When Wesley began his own ordinations, first for America and then for SCOTLAND, curious anomalies crept in. Thus when JOHN PAWSON, THOMAS HANBY, and JOSEPH TAYLOR were ordained for Scotland in 1785, they were forbidden to wear clerical dress south of the border and were addressed as "Mister" when in England, and as "the Reverend" when in Scotland. Ronald Knox's comment is apt: "In short he had evolved a system of Gretna Green ordinations, which unlike Gretna Green marriages were not meant to have any effect south of the border." (Enthusiasm, London, 1950, pp. 506-7, 511.)

When writing to JOSEPH COWNLEY in Scotland, Wesley addressed him as "Rev. Mr. Cownley, Minister of the Methodist Church, Leith-Wind, Edinburgh." After John Wesley's death in 1791 a few ordinations of preachers took place; and some Methodist advocates of separation from the Church of England, like SAMUEL BRADBURN, used the title "the Reverend." Thus when Portland Chapel was opened in BRISTOL on Aug. 26, 1792, Bradburn and Samuel Roberts read the liturgy in full clerical attire, to the annoyance of the local Anglican incumbent. Bradburn's comment was: "In everything that relates to the office of minister of Jesus Christ I consider myself as standing on equal ground with you. Why shouldn't I wear a gown and put on the bands and call myself 'The Rev.?' "

The party which hankered after full unity with the Establishment prevailed, however. The Wesleyan Conference laid down in 1793 that "no gowns, cassocks, bands or surplices shall be worn" by any of the preachers, and that "the title of Reverend shall not be used by us toward each other in future." This greatly displeased men like Bradburn, who wrote to ALEXANDER KILHAM on Dec. 12, 1793: "I really believe that the little interruption we met with will do us good. Do not destroy your gown and bands, nor suppose they are for ever done with. You will know better soon, if the Lord will, we must have a Methodist constitution or plan of discipline explained, and we shall in due course." The moderate party came to accept the conference rules, and many understood reception into

FULL CONNEXION as being tantamount to ordination. Thus WILLIAM THOMPSON wrote to JOSEPH BENSON in 1795:

It is proposed that the Methodist preachers shall have nothing to do with ordination of any kind because their being four years on trial and the fruit of their labour in that time appearing in the conversion of sinners, and their being received at Conference by their senior brethren giving them the right hand of fellowship, is a full proof that they are called of God and man to the work of the ministry, which we believe to be scriptural ordination. We will have nothing to do with gowns, bands, surplices, reverends or any honourable title, because we wish to continue the same plain men which we were, when we set out in the work of the ministry, and to transmit to posterity the same simplicity and plainness.

But, as the Wesleyan Methodist ministry evolved from what could be called "lay agency" to the full status of an ordained body in 1836, so honorific titles came back into vogue. In 1818 the title "Reverend" was permitted again; it frequently appears in the Minutes of Conference after that date; and in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine under the portraits of the itinerants, the suffix "Preacher of the Gospel" is replaced by "the Reverend." This rapidly became the norm in all the branches of Methodism, though the first meeting of the Wesleyan Methodist Association in 1836 resolved that "it was inexpedient that the term 'Reverend' should be used in connexion with the name of any preacher of the Association." This was rescinded nine years later. As late as 1876 WILLIAM GRIFFITH introduced a motion in the annual assembly of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES to discontinue the use of a term which he refused to use himself—but the motion was later withdrawn. It should be noted that the title was not overly popular in some sections of the Free Churches in Britain in the mid-nineteenth century, and that Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the famous Baptist preacher, always refused to use it. In 1874 the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, which had once forbidden the use of the title, was involved in a lawsuit through the refusal of an incumbent and his bishop (Christopher Wordsworth of Lincoln) to allow the title "the Reverend" on a tombstone (see OWSTON FERRY CASE).

In American Methodism the validity of the title "reverend" applied by the ordained elders to one another shortly after the organization of the M.E. Church, was the cause of much comment and some criticism. The marks of a society were still deeply engrained in the new church, and to many the title of reverend possibly more often applied to those who had been ordained and not simply licensed to preach, seemed an affectation and an imitation of English church formality. The title was thought by some at that time to "savor more of pride," as JOHN EMORY tells us, and was made the subject of a minute question in 1787, though not "exposed to print." After quite a discussion it was advised by the conference that everyone might use his own choice in the matter and be reverend, or deacon, or elder, or bishop, as he chose.

The issue really came to a head over the name "bishop" which had been applied to the superintendents at that date much to Wesley's distaste. Soon, however, and by a sort of popular consent, the name reverend did come to be applied to Methodist ministers, ordained or unordained, everywhere.

On the Eastern seaboard, where the Protestant Episcopal Church has always been strong, our ministers, as well as the clergymen of that church, are often addressed simply as "Mr."—an old formal English method of speaking of any minister—as "Mr. Wesley," we remember.

REVIVALS AND REVIVALISM. In various epochs of Church life and almost every country there have been seasons of remarkable religious interest accompanied with a great manifestation of divine power and grace in the "quickening of believers, the reclaiming of backsliders, and the awakening, conviction, and conversion of the unregenerate." (Schaff-Herzog, p. 2038.) During these great periods of Revival, as such times are called, the public mind as well as the Church mind has often been somewhat turned to spiritual subjects. Methodism itself was eminently revivalistic in its origin, and is sometimes spoken of as the "Methodist revival of the 18th and 19th Centuries." Previous to that there were great and unusual periods of spiritual awakening in the long history of the Church, the first being the great spreading out and conquest made by the Christian Church during the first three centuries of the Christian era. The Protestant Reformation itself has been called a revival, and there is reason to believe that periods of declension and even apostasy on the part of the church and people, are often followed by a great awakening of religion.

Before the time of Wesley, the Church of Scotland was born anew in the great revival under John Knox and his brethren. Before the Wesleyan revival had truly begun in Britain, Jonathan Edwards, in New England, began to preach with great earnestness the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone. The result of his preaching was a significant revival of religion. Both in Britain and America the intense awakening of those who had been in sin, and their very real conversions were sometimes marked by unusual physical demonstrations.

Revival movements have affected all denominations though Methodism in all its branches has ever been in the front rank of those Christian communions which witness by changed lives and public testimony the spiritual strength of the Divine power in heart and life.

In America about the year 1800 a remarkable revival occurred in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE which led to the formation of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Early Methodist circuit riders were involved in this, and such was the strength of the revival that there was a strong demand that the Methodist and Presbyterian bodies, especially those in the Tennessee and Kentucky sections of the United States, become one body. Differences in polity however, and perhaps certain doctrinal viewpoints also, kept this from coming about.

In a narrower sense, the word revival came to be the term by which Methodist preachers and people throughout the latter half of the nineteenth century—and the first half of the twentieth century—denominated those set periodic occasions during which sometimes for two weeks, sometimes a month, the gospel of regeneration and complete consecration was preached in the same place with fervor and earnestness day after day and sometimes night after night. In time, revivals as a sort of periodic professional technique established themselves in the Methodist, and indeed, in other churches, and the results were nearly always good. The appearance on the American scene of certain who became famous as great evangelists, and revivalists, and who conducted greatly publicized periods of revival preaching, caused interest sometimes upon a nation-wide scale. In America, Charles Finney, SAM P. JONES, Billy Sunday, and in the present generation Billy Graham became noted as revivalists and huge crowds attended their meetings in many cities. D. L. Moody stirred London in his day with revival fires. In time there came about a class of men denominated as "evangelists" though indeed every preacher-in-charge was expected to be revivalistic.

In local Methodist churches during the latter part of the nineteenth century, times of revival were sometimes called "protracted meetings," and an annual revival period or protracted meeting was customarily scheduled in Methodist churches over American Methodism for many years. After a time many of these became perfunctory, attended by none but the faithful church people. Dr. CLOVIS CHAPPELL, well-known as an evangelist as well as a pastor and author, said that he had seen many protracted meetings which "did nothing but protract." But even so, experienced pastors insist that it is a good plan to have such hoped for revival periods again and again as these stir the people, and the cumulative effect of message after message has a striking gospel power.

Of late years, the influence of the church year, and of the church calendar as other Protestant bodies follow these rather closely has been more and more felt in Methodist churches. The Easter season (preceded by the Lenten period) has come to be taken as the time when successive nights of preaching are scheduled, though the term "revival services" is not heard as often as before.

It should be mentioned that revivals upon a gigantic scale as conducted by nationally known evangelists must be prepared for far in advance, and as these require, beside the evangelist, a huge party of helpers who attend to advance publicity, arrangements, management of the music, and organizations of big choirs, all entailing considerable expense, this mechanical and costly type of intensive crusading has in certain cases led to criticism. However, the general Church world usually concedes that with all their faults, such revivals do help greatly, for while many who profess conversion or reconsecration during such periods often fall away afterward, there remains in almost all cases a residue of a few cataclysmically changed and converted persons, who from then on are earnest Christians of the highest type. Meanwhile, if the pendulum does swing too far toward a forgotten church and a forgotten God, the Church will pray all the more earnestly that the revival fires will break out again from that One who will not leave Himself without witness anywhere in His universe.

REYNOLDS, JOHN (1786-1857), Canadian Methodist bishop, was born near Hudson, N. Y., in 1786. He acquired "a fair education for the day and country" and soon became an animated, eloquent preacher. In 1808, he was taken on trial as assistant in the Augusta Circuit. Two years later, he was ordained deacon in the GENESEE CONFERENCE and stationed on Smith's Creek Circuit. For him, as for others, the War of 1812-14 proved a disrupting influence. He located, probably in 1814, taught school, traded in furs, and eventually became a successful merchant in Belleville. At the same time he was active as a local preacher, and was ordained as a local elder in 1824.

Evidently Reynolds became identified in the 1830's with those in the CANADA CONFERENCE who sought to maintain close connections with political radicalism. Presumably too he had a strong Canadian orientation and, more significantly, was intimately associated with the local preachers in his district. The union of 1833 with the Wesleyans appeared to threaten all these interests, and especially the rights of local preachers. Thus, it was not surprising that at the first General Conference of the revived M.E. Church, held in June, 1835, John Reynolds was elected bishop, and ordained on June 28.

Bishop Reynolds presided at the conferences and effectively directed the growth of his church until 1847, but because of age and infirmity he was unable to itinerate as had his predecessors. In 1847, Philander Smith was elected as his associate.

Bishop Reynolds died in 1857.

REYNOLDS, JOHN HUGH (1869-1954), college president, born at Enola, Ark., Jan. 3, 1869, was the son of Jesse M. and Eliza (Grimes) Reynolds. He received an A.B., HENDRIX COLLEGE, Conway, Ark., 1893; A.M., University of Chicago, 1897; special study, Oxford University, England, 1911-12; and was granted a number of honorary degrees. He became professor of History and Political Science at Hendrix College, 1897-1902; vice-president, Hendrix College, 1899-1902; professor of History and Political Science, University of Arkansas, 1902-12; acting-president, University of Arkansas, 1912-13; president of Hendrix College, Conway, Ark., 1913-45 (Hendrix College, Henderson-Brown College, and Galloway Woman's College, consolidated in 1931). In 1903 he organized the Arkansas Historical Association and was its first secretary. He became director of the General Christian Education movement of the M.E. Church, South, in 1920-21 to raise $33,000,000 for colleges.

He was a member of the ARKANSAS Constitutional Convention, and of the commission on unification of American Methodism in 1924. He wrote Makers of Arkansas History; Civil Government of Arkansas; and, with D. Y. Thomas, History of University of Arkansas. He was editor of the publications of the Arkansas Historical Association (Vols. I, II, III, and IV).

His home until his retirement in 1945 was at Conway, Ark., and thereafter on Petit Jean Mountain near Morrilton, Ark., until his death in 1954. He was buried in Conway.

RHEE, SYNGMAN (1875-1965), Korean independence leader and first president, was born in Pyung-San, Hwanghae Province, KOREA, March 26, 1875. He received a tutor's education in Confucian principles and Chinese classics. At the age of nineteen he entered a Methodist

SYNGMAN RHEE

Mission school (Seoul, Pai Chai) in SEOUL to study English.

Here he also imbibed democratic ideals and was soon campaigning for elimination of foreign influence in the Korean monarchy. He joined the Independence Club, and founded and edited Mauiil Shinmun, Korea's first daily newspaper.

By 1897 his efforts to reform Korea's weak government resulted in his arrest, six months torture in jail, and a sentence to life imprisonment. During the next seven years he embraced Christianity, organized fellow prisoners in classes in religion and English, translated English books and wrote his famous Korean work, Spirit of Independence.

Granted amnesty, he went to WASHINGTON to seek President Theodore Roosevelt's aid in protecting Korea's neutrality. Failing in this, he remained to secure a B.A. from Washington University in 1905, an M.A. from Harvard in 1908, and a Ph.D. at the hands of Woodrow Wilson at Princeton in 1910.

Rhee spent seventeen months in Korea as a YMCA secretary. Back in America as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church meeting in MINNEAPOLIS, April, 1912, he was warned not to return to Korea, whereupon he chose HAWAII as his base of activities.

For twenty-seven years he kept in close contact with the independence movement in Korea. When a Provisional Government of Korea was secretly formed in 1919, Rhee was elected president and continued to be elected until he gave up that assignment to establish the Korean Commission as the diplomatic agency of the government in exile in Washington, D. C.

While in Hawaii he organized a Korean Methodist Church, served as an educator in the Methodist Mission program and later established the Korean Christian Institute. In Washington he was a member of the Foundry Methodist Church and remained a close friend of the pastor, FREDERICK BROWN HARRIS.

At the close of World War II, Rhee was wildly received by his own people, somewhat less cordially by the American military authorities. Elected chairman of the first National Assembly he presided at the drafting of Korea's constitution and was elected president in 1948, 1952, 1956, and 1960. Taking advantage of his advanced age, party politicians brought his government into disfavor, and a student revolution resulted in his resignation and flight to Hawaii in 1960.

During his term of office no liquor was ever served at any government function and he was a constant Bible reader. He died in Honolulu, July 19, 1965. His funeral was held at Chung Dong Methodist Church, in Seoul, on July 27. An estimated one million fellow-citizens crowded the streets as the funeral procession moved to the National Cemetery.

RHINEHART, WILLIAM (1800-1861), American United Brethren preacher and editor, was born in Rockingham County, Va., on Nov. 28, 1800. He was converted during a revival in a Lutheran Church at the age of twenty. Soon after, however, he joined the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. He was licensed as a minister in 1825 and ordained in 1829. He travelled as a preacher and presiding elder in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE until 1834.

In that year Rhinehart became the first editor of the Religious Telescope, the denominational paper. Because the printing establishment was located at Circleville, Ohio, he transferred to the Miami Conference.

Presuming that the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1837 would consider a constitution, he as a delegate prepared such a constitution for the publishing house beforehand. This was unanimously adopted. His literary gifts were further seen in his co-authoring a hymn-book in the English language in 1833.

In 1839 he resigned as editor and returned to preaching mostly in the Miami Conference, serving First Church in DAYTON from 1852 to 1854. He was a man of splendid physique and great physical strength, a powerful preacher and singer. He strongly opposed slavery and was a fervent advocate of temperance.

He died near Dayton, Ohio on May 19, 1861.

RHODE ISLAND, U.S.A., the smallest of the fifty states is bounded by CONNECTICUT on the west, MASSACHUSETTS on the north and east, and the Atlantic Ocean on the south. The territory became known in 1636 as the refuge for Roger Williams and other liberal thinkers. Densely populated (922,461, estimated in 1970), the state is highly industrialized. It is known for its textile and jewelry industries, its naval installations, and its tourist resorts. There are sixteen colleges and universities in the state, including Brown (founded in 1764).

FREEBORN GARRETTSON delivered the first Methodist sermon in Rhode Island in 1787, and two years later JESSE LEE introduced regular services. Bishop ASBURY visited the state in 1791, preaching at PROVIDENCE and WARREN. In 1794 the Warren and Greenwich Circuits were joined to include all of Rhode Island and some towns in southeast Massachusetts. ENOCH MUDGE, the first native Methodist preacher in New England, was appointed to the Warren Circuit. In 1796 there were two circuits in Rhode Island with 220 members, and in 1800 three circuits with 227 members.

The first Methodist church building in Rhode Island was erected at Warren in 1794 and was dedicated Sept. 24 that year. The church at NEWPORT dates from 1806, and it claims to be the first Methodist church in the world to have a steeple and a bell. Furthermore, it is one of the few church buildings still standing in which Bishop Asbury preached. The first Methodist church edifice in Providence was built and dedicated in 1816 when the congregation consisted of 111 members. A new and larger building was erected at Providence in 1822, and after 1846 the congregation was known as Chestnut Street Church. A second church was started at Providence in 1832, a third in 1840, and the present Mathewson Street Church in 1848. The latter has been known for its pulpit and radio ministry since 1936.

The growth of Methodism in Rhode Island was gradual and constant. In 1870 the denomination was the third largest in the state, ranking next to the Episcopalians and Baptists. At that time the M.E. Church had thirty-three congregations in the state to seventy-five for the Baptists and forty-two for the Episcopalians.

From the beginning down to 1840 the Rhode Island work was in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. It was in the Providence Conference, 1840 to 1880, and in the New England Southern Conference thereafter.

In 1841 the Providence Conference bought the Kent Academy which was founded at East Greenwich, Rhode Island in 1802, and made it the Conference Seminary. About 1880 the school's name was changed to East Greenwich Academy and as such it continued functioning until 1940. Eben Tourzee, a professor in the academy, established the New England Conservatory of Music. In its later years the East Greenwich Academy served partly as a high school for East Greenwich.

In 1900 the M.E. Church had about forty charges and some 6,000 members in Rhode Island. In 1970 The United Methodist Church reported about thirty-five charges and some 11,655 members in the state.

RHODES, BENJAMIN (1743-1816), English Methodist, was born at Mexborough, Yorkshire, where his father was a schoolmaster. He was converted in childhood and, on leaving school in 1759, went into the woolen industry. He became a CLASS LEADER at twenty-one and later a preacher. Called out in 1766, he was sent to the Norwich Circuit for two years and then traveled in widely scattered circuits from Dunbar and Newcastle to Sussex and Kent. He was "a man of great simplicity and integrity of mind, highly approved by his brethren and warmly attached to the whole economy of Methodism." He published a Concise English Grammar. His closing years were spent at Margate.

JOHN A. VICKERS

RHODES, JAMES MANLY (1850-1941), American minister and educator, president and owner of LITTLETON FEMALE COLLEGE, a private Methodist-related college which was located at Littleton, N. C. He was born in Four Oaks, Johnston Co., N. C., and received into the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, in December, 1875. He served the Fifth Street Methodist Church in Wilmington, N. C., prior to becoming, in January 1882, the first principal of Central Institute, which, after 1888, was known as Littleton Female College and after 1912 as Littleton College. Except for the years 1887-1888, when he was principal of the nearby Henderson Female College, Henderson, N. C., Rhodes served as president of Littleton College until it was destroyed by fire in January, 1919. In 1889 he purchased the college property from its stockholders and immediately began an extensive program of improvements.

He married first, Florence Simmons (1856-1888) of Virginia, and later, on Nov. 27, 1889, Lula Hester (1868-1937), daughter of Rev. and Mrs. W. S. Hester of Oxford, N. C., and a teacher of voice at Littleton College.

Described as "a man of convictions, who felt that he had a work to do," Rhodes dedicated his life to the training and development of young ladies "of real refinement and culture, with those principles that enter into the formation of noble character." Though small physically, Rhodes has been portrayed as a man "huge in determination, perservance, consecration." Around 1906 he founded Central Academy, a military school with a farm operated by self-help students.

Following the destruction of Littleton College, President and Mrs. Rhodes removed to FLORIDA in 1923 where he died in Bartow on July 2, 1941.

At the time of his death, President Rhodes was the oldest minister in the North Carolina Annual Conference. His body was returned to Littleton and buried in Sunset Hill Cemetery.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

RHODESIA, formerly known as Southern Rhodesia, is a landlocked, approximately circular country in southern central Africa. The designation derives from the name of Cecil John Rhodes (1853-1902), the British-born South African millionaire, colonialist and politician. The country is rich in natural mineral resources, including gold, uranium, chrome, zinc, tin, asbestos, coal and rare minerals. Tobacco, tea, cotton and cattle are its principal agricultural products.

Rhodesia is divided from ZAMBIA by the Zambesi River, flowing eastward from the Victoria Falls into MOZAMBIQUE (Portuguese East Africa). It is separated from the Republic of SOUTH AFRICA by the Limpopo River; the beautiful Chimanimani and Inyanga Mountains form its eastern boundary with Mozambique. Its area is 150,333 square miles, and its population was estimated in 1969 to be 5,090,000 including 4,835,500 Africans (95%) and 254,500 persons of European descent. It is governed under an electoral system which allows the African majority little voice. The government declared Rhodesia independent of Britain in 1965, and a republic in 1970, but this status has not won international recognition.

Human remains of extreme antiquity have been found in various parts of Rhodesia. Records of the tenth century A.D. indicate the existence of a substantial trade in gold and ivory, originating in the Rhodesian hinterland. At Zimbabwe, there are ruins of stone buildings erected between the 11th and the 15th centuries.

The first party of whites to settle in Rhodesia arrived in 1859. It was led by a British missionary of the London Missionary Society, Robert Moffat, and took up residence in the Nakolo country along the Zambesi. Moffat's son-in-law, David Livingstone, reached the Zambesi near Sesheke in June, 1851, and his later expeditions opened the interior of Rhodesia. The Portuguese showed interest in an east-west belt from Mozambique to Angola, but the British trader Thomas Baines secured from Lobengula the first concession to dig for gold in 1871.

Meanwhile, Cecil Rhodes was envisaging a "Cape to Cairo" railroad which would run for its entire length through British territory. In 1889, the British government delegated the function of government to Rhodes's British South Africa Company. The name "Southern Rhodesia" was officially adopted in 1898. The British South Africa Company's charter expired in 1923. The whites then chose by referendum to become a British colony rather than an additional province of South Africa. This new status gave a very large measure of self-government to the white electorate.

Methodism entered Rhodesia in 1891, when the British Wesleyan Methodist missionaries OWEN WATKINS and Isaac Shimmin reached Salisbury. Rhodes pledged £100 annually to the expenses of a British Wesleyan missionary in Rhodesia. Land grants were made by the Company at Epworth near Salisbury, and at Sinoia in the Lomagundi district. In 1892 stations were opened at Nengubo and Kwenda, then at Bulawayo after a rebellion among the Matabele. John White, a British Wesleyan Methodist minister who served in Rhodesia from 1894 until 1931, was outstanding in his defense of African interests against the abuses of colonial administration. He was responsible for several publications in the Shona language, and for the training, through the Waddilove Institute, of ministers, evangelists and teachers. The first three Africans were received into the Wesleyan ministry in 1904. In 1964 the district became a member of the newly-formed Christian Council of Rhodesia, which in the following year declared its opposition to the government's unilateral declaration of independence. A united college of education was opened in 1968 by seven denominations, including Methodists and also Roman Catholics. In the same year, statement on unity was issued by leaders of the Anglican, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian communities. At that time, the British-related Methodist District was responsible for over 700 places of worship, 285 primary schools with more than 60,000 pupils, four secondary schools, two teacher training colleges and an agricultural college. It had more than 30,000 full members and a total community of well over 60,000 under the pastoral care of thirty Rhodesian and twenty-six expatriate ministers.

The membership of the British-related District includes both Africans and Europeans, and although there are thus two distinct cultural traditions within the church, Africans and Europeans are welcome to each other's services and meetings. There is close cooperation with other denominations, for example in a united mission to the African townships of Bulawayo, and in the chaplaincy to university students in Salisbury.

In 1897-1898, the M.E. Church established work in the Umtali area of Rhodesia. In December 1897, Bishop JOSEPH C. HARTZELL conferred with Cecil Rhodes and Company officials and secured a grant to the proposed mission of 13,000 acres near Old Umtali, as well as the abandoned buildings there. The town had been moved from the old to a new site across the mountain, so that it could be situated on the line of the railroad being built at the time, from the Indian Ocean Port of Beira.

The first missionaries arrived in 1898, the Rev. & Mrs. Morris W. Ehnes, opening a school at Umtali in November. One of the Old Umtali buildings was assigned to the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, Mrs. Helen Rasmussen (see SPRINGER, HELEN) arriving in 1901. She had served in the Congo until 1895. In 1905 she became the wife of JOHN M. (later Bishop) SPRINGER. They pioneered new stations at Mrewa, Nyadini and Mtoko, assisted by SAMUEL GURNEY. The southernmost station was opened at Mutambara in 1908. In 1954, a new station was opened at Nyamuzuwe. Parts of the original land grant at Old Umtali were exchanged for land grants at these new sites.

Rural education assumed early importance with emphasis on agricultural training, several large farms providing experience and demonstration. Virtually all of the primary education of the rural African people has been through mission-established schools. Evangelistic work was promoted, with gain in self-support of the village churches. A Church of 30,000 members and a school enrollment of 48,560 developed. In 1967, there were fifty-eight ordained African ministers, 1,620 African teachers, and eighty missionaries related to the work of the Rhodesia Annual Conference, with nearly all major administrative posts staffed by able African leaders.

By comity agreement, the Rhodesia District of the British Methodist Church works generally west and south of Salisbury, and the Americans in the east and south. Both branches of Methodism have churches in the major cities. The Epworth Theological College at Salisbury now trains the ordained ministry for both churches, as well as for other participating denominations. The Anglican, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches are seeking organic union.

The FREE METHODIST CHURCH established work in 1938 in the extreme southeastern corner of the country. Rev. and Mrs. Ralph Jacobs, already experienced in Mozambique, were the leaders. This mission is in a region of 10,000 square miles. Activity radiates from Lundi in the north of the area, near the Mutibi Reserve, Chikombedzi on the Nuenzi River at the center, and Dumisa at the southern angle near Mozambique. Each station received 100 acres from the government. The hospital at Chikombedzi is influential, and mobile clinics go into the villages. The Lundi Central School turns away many students for lack of space. African personnel is supported by the churches. The 1962 report showed 1,700 members with twenty-one outstation elementary schools enrolling 2,500.

The mission of the A.M.E. CHURCH (US) also has a small work in Rhodesia. The Zambesi Conference includes stations, and village evangelistic and educational work, in both Zambia and Rhodesia, and there are scattered congregations in Malawi (Nyasaland).

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS
T. C. BAIRD

RICE, JOHN ANDREW (1862-1930), American preacher and educator, was born in Colleton County, S. C., Sept. 25, 1862, the son of Richard Blake and Rachel Jane (Liston) Rice. He won the A.B. (1885) and A.M. degrees at the University of South Carolina, and that school awarded him the honorary D.D. and LL.D. degrees in 1894 and 1905, respectively. The University of Alabama gave him the LL.D. in 1906. Rice did postgraduate study at, but did not win degrees from, Columbia Theological (Presbyterian) Seminary and the University of Chicago. He was married twice, first to Anna B. Smith on April 13, 1887, and after her death, to Laura Darnell, Aug. 7, 1902. He had three sons by the first marriage and a son and daughter by the second.

Rice was admitted to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES) in 1886. After two years on circuits, he served at Darlington four years, and in 1892 was appointed to the prestigious Washington Street Church, COLUMBIA. Beginning in 1894 he served six years as president of COLUMBIA (S.C.) COLLEGE for Women. He reorganized and rebuilt the college, raised its academic standards, and held the students to Victorian standards of conduct. Later he served as a trustee of the school.

In 1900, convinced that his understanding of the Bible was inadequate, Rice resigned as president of the college, took a nominal appointment as "conference secretary of missions," and did two years of study under William Rainey Harper, J. M. Powis Smith, and other Old Testament scholars at the University of Chicago.

In the fall of 1902, Rice transferred to the ALABAMA CONFERENCE and was appointed to Court Street Church, MONTGOMERY. It was the beginning of successive four-year pastorates in four of the leading churches of his denomination. The other three, in order, were Rayne Memorial, NEW ORLEANS; First Church, FORT WORTH, and St. John's Church, ST. LOUIS. While at Fort Worth, 1910-14, Rice served as a member of the inter-conference commission which selected DALLAS as the site for SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY which opened in 1915. At the end of his four years in St. Louis (1918), the four-year limit on pastorates had been lifted and Rice desired to stay longer, but the St. John's congregation was not agreeable. He then returned to SOUTH CAROLINA and was appointed to Trinity Church, Sumter, where he remained two years.

An able and eloquent preacher, a liberal in theology and in his interpretation of the Bible, Rice had over the years become somewhat of a controversial figure in his denomination. Liberals had led in organizing the School of Theology at Southern Methodist University, and in 1920 Rice was invited to the chair of Old Testament there. He accepted and at the same time moved his ministerial membership to the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE which was known to be fairly liberal, as compared with some others.

Shortly before Rice went to Dallas, JOHN W. SHACKFORD, superintendent of teacher training in the Board of Education at NASHVILLE, a liberal who was being criticized by conservatives in the church, asked Rice to write a book on the Old Testament for use in local church teacher training schools. When Rice submitted his manuscript, Shackford suggested eliding several statements which were likely to arouse the ire of the fundamentalists. Independent and unwilling to compromise, Rice refused, and the Board did not publish the book. Rice found another publisher and brought out the book after he arrived at Southern Methodist University. Soon there were demands from the "grass roots" of the church that Rice resign. Bishop EDWIN D. MOUZON, a liberal, defended Rice, saying his views were in line with all modern biblical scholarship, but it was to no avail. In the fall of 1921, Rice felt constrained to resign, and Bishop Mouzon appointed him to the church at Okmulgee, Okla. In 1922 Rice went to the Boston Avenue Church at TULSA, and in a successful five-year pastorate built the magnificent edifice for which that church is distinguished today. In 1927 he was appointed editor of the Oklahoma Methodist, and when it folded a year later, Rice, with the knowledge and consent of the bishop in charge, began supplying the First Congregational Church in Tulsa.

While Rice shocked conservatives by what they considered his irreverent views of the Bible, there could be no doubt about his honesty and integrity and his devotion to the truth and the church. He was an effective preacher, lecturer, and writer, and he exercised a liberalizing influence on the educational and religious thinking of his time. In the M.E. Church, South, rigidly conservative views of theology and the Bible began to wane soon after Rice resigned his professorship. He died in Tulsa, May 29, 1930.

Rice published four books; The Old Testament in the Life of Today; The Primacy of Religion in Education; Why I Believe in the Bible; and Is Christ on Trial in Tennessee? A volume entitled Emotions Jesus Stirred, which included six of Rice's sermons and a sketch of his life, was published in 1950.

RICE, MERTON STACHER (1872-1943), American preacher and nationally known DETROIT pastor, was born in a KANSAS frontier parsonage on Sept. 5, 1872. His first pastoral appointment was to a five point circuit in Kansas, and his last appointment was to Metropolitan Methodist in Detroit where he served his closing thirty years. His formal education was received at BAKER UNIVERSITY. He earned his B.S. and his M.S. and was honored with the LL.D.

He served the First Church in Duluth, Minn. from 1904 to 1913 and after that went to the parish church that later came to be known as Metropolitan Methodist in Detroit. While he was there it grew from about 1,000 members to 7,000 members.

M. S. RICE

Rice insisted that his parish reach out in benevolent giving. He claimed that a people who could build a "cathedral" costing so much could give to others in like manner. Rice was a masterful preacher of Christ; a champion for righteous causes; and one who lives on in his fourteen published volumes.

He died in Detroit, March 7, 1943.

SCOTT D. MACDONALD

RICE, SAMUEL DWIGHT (1815-1884), Canadian minister and general superintendent, was born in MAINE in 1815. At an early age his family moved to Woodstock, New Brunswick, where he grew up in a strongly British environment. He received his undergraduate training at Bowdoin College, Maine, and then briefly went into business in 1837; however, he became a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry in the New Brunswick District.

After a very successful career as an itinerant in New Brunswick, Samuel Rice accompanied ENOCH WOOD to Canada West in 1847. He soon became involved in the Indian mission and was appointed head of the Mount Elgin Industrial School, a model training school for Indian youth. In 1850, however, he was transferred to Kingston, where his administrative skill resulted in the erection of an important church, and a substantial addition to the Victoria College endowment. This in turn ensured his appointment for three years (1854-57) as Moral and Domestic Governor of Victoria, an arrangement not calculated to strengthen the president's position.

From that time forward Rice took an extremely active interest in Methodist educational institutions. He believed that the church had an imperative duty to uphold the connection between knowledge and vital piety, not only for its own children, but for society generally. To this end he worked manfully to build up the Methodist educational fund, and he gave much of his time and effort to the development of the Wesleyan Ladies' College in Hamilton.

Rice's administrative and ministerial abilities were regularly recognized by his communion. He was frequently a district chairman, and in 1873 and 1874 was president of the Wesleyan Conference in its final sessions. In 1882 he was elected president of the General Conference, and in 1883 the United General Conference elected him as one of the two general superintendents of the new Methodist Church.

Regrettably, ill health, the fruit of his past exertions, began to sap his energies at this crucial period for him and for Methodism and on Dec. 15, 1884, a few weeks after his election, he died.

To the editor of the Canadian Methodist Magazine (1885) Rice appeared to have inherited the "very best qualities" of the New England Puritans. "There was neither gall nor acid in his nature. Conscience, however, was with him an imperial power which reigned by Divine right, and from whose decisions there was absolutely no appeal . . . He was eminently a man of faith. He looked upon nothing as being too great or too difficult to be done or dared if it lay in the line of duty. . . . He had his frailties, perhaps his faults, but the prevailing impression which we get from the review of his whole life is, that he was a great and good man." (Vol. 22 (1885), 181).

RICE, WILLIAM NORTH (1845-1928), was born in Marblehead, Mass., on Nov. 21, 1845, the son of William (a M.E. pastor) and Caroline Laura (North) Rice.

He received the A.B. (valedictorian) from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1865 and the A.M. in 1868; the Ph.D. from Yale University in 1867; and the LL.D. from SYRACUSE

UNIVERSITY in 1886 and Wesleyan University in 1915. He studied at the University of Berlin from 1867-68, 1892-93. His Ph.D. from Yale in 1867 was the first doctorate of philosophy in geology granted by Yale. His thesis subject was, "The Darwinian Theory of the Origin of Species."

He married Elizabeth Wing Crowell on April 12, 1870, and their children were Edward Loranus and Charles William.

Rice served at Wesleyan University (Connecticut) as professor of geology and natural history, 1867-84; professor of geology, 1884-1918; professor emeritus, 1918; acting president, 1907, 1908-09, 1918.

He was a member of many learned organizations, among them being: the Geological Society of America (v.p., 1911); and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences; a founding member, American Society of Naturalists (pres., 1891); member, Association of American Geographers.

William North Rice became a member of the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE, M.E. Church, in 1869, and was chairman of the Board of Examiners from 1896-1925. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1884. He preached in Grace Church, Boston, for a time after graduation from Wesleyan. He was a member of the Council of Connecticut Federation of Churches (pres., 1910-11; secretary, 1913-19; pres., 1919-20; hon. pres., 1920).

He was the author of many works, such as: Christian Faith in an Age of Science, 1903; (with H. E. Gregory) Return to Faith, and other Addresses, 1916; Through Darkness to Dawn, 1917; Poet of Science, and other Addresses, 1919; Science and Religion—Five Supposed Conflicts, 1925; and was editor of the 5th edition of Dana's Textbook of Geology, 1897.

Rice, along with Caleb T. Winchester and their former professor at Wesleyan University, John M. VanVleck, became potent influences at Wesleyan University, in sympathy with the progressive leadership of President Eliot of Harvard. They liberalized the curriculum at Wesleyan in 1873, and were largely responsible for the combined emphasis on teaching and research there.

In his book, Christian Faith in an Age of Science, he wrote: "The scientific questions of our age and of all ages touch not the central truth of Christianity, 'that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.'"

Within the field of geology he was most interested in the paleontological evidence for evolution. On Dec. 28, 1923, the Geological Society of America at its annual meeting at Washington, presented him with an engrossed testimonial, recognizing his services in the reconciliation of science and religion.

His grandson William A. Rice wrote: "I would guess that William North Rice contributed much more clarity and integrity, and 19th century liberal freedom of independent inquiry than he did fervor and emotional richness. There was a profound gentleness there . . . and a complete integrity which was inspirational."

For years Rice led religious classes of students; held Bible classes; conducted seminars; had personal conversations with groups of young ministers; and had confidential discussions with individuals who "in confusion of mind or depression of heart sought his counsel." He displayed personal fidelity to the practice as well as the theory of the Christian faith. He was a college professor for sixty years and a preacher of the Gospel for sixty-two years.

He died Nov. 13, 1928 in Delaware, Ohio, at the home of his son, Edward L. Rice, then professor of zoology at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.

RICH, ISAAC (1801-1872), American layman, businessman, philanthropist, was born at Wellfleet on Cape Cod, Mass., U.S.A., on Oct. 24, 1801. His father was in the fish business and Isaac assisted therein. On his nineteenth birthday his father died, and Isaac became the chief support of his mother and ten children younger than he.

Isaac Rich started in the fish business in Boston, and by honesty and industry his progress was rapid and sure. In time, he became an extensive wharf and ship owner, with numerous places of business. By middle life, he was appointed United States representative on an international Fisheries Commission.

The Richs were Methodists. One evening in a REVIVAL meeting at his home church, the only acceptance of the pastor's altar call was Isaac. The pastor laid his hand on the lad's head, and offered a prayer that alluded to the boy who came to Jesus with loaves and fishes. Isaac Rich never forgot that hour of decision. He was a consecrated Christian and a loyal member of the Methodist Church for the rest of his life.

As his business and wealth increased he manifested a growing sensitiveness to his stewardship and helped every good cause; but his greatest work was the part he took in establishing BOSTON UNIVERSITY. His greatest philanthropy was his bequest to that institution, which was the largest sum ever given to an educational institution up to that time.

He died at Boston on Jan. 13, 1872.

RICHARDS, HERBERT EAST (1919-), American educator and minister, received his A.B. degree from DICKINSON COLLEGE; B.D. degree from DREW UNIVERSITY and THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; M.A. degree from Columbia University and D.D. from College of Idaho. He taught Homiletics and the Christian Criticism of Life at Drew University and Theological Seminary. He has also taught at Columbia University and is a member of the American Association of University Professors. Since 1951 he has been minister of the First Methodist Cathedral, Boise, Idaho.

In 1965 he received the Distinguished Citizen Award of the Idaho Daily Statesman newspaper. He is a charter member of the Board of Governors, the American Foundation of Religion and Psychiatry; chairman of the Board of Ministerial Training of Idaho and Television, Radio and Film Commission of the Idaho Methodist Conference. In 1965 he received the "Clergy Churchman of the Year" award given by Religious Heritage Foundation in Washington, D. C. He was cited by the Academy of Achievement receiving the Golden Plate award in 1966. For the past twelve years, his weekly radio and television broadcasts have had wide listening audiences.

Richards has been an exchange minister under the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in England and has been a delegate to GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES of the Methodist Church in 1956 and 1960. He has served as CHAPLAIN of the Senate of State of Idaho for eight years. He has served also Presbyterian, Congregational and Baptist denominations as minister. His wife was Lois Marcey whom he married Jan. 1, 1941, and they have five sons.

RICHARDS, THOMAS (1717-1798), British Methodist, was one of the earliest itinerants, being listed by JOHN WESLEY (Minutes of the Methodist Conferences, London, 1862, p. 60), along with THOMAS MAXFIELD and THOMAS WESTELL as his "sons in the Gospel" in 1760. For a time Richards was a master at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. He attended the CONFERENCE in 1745. Selina Lady HUNTINGDON secured episcopal ordination for him and for thirty years he served as curate of St. Sepulchre's, Holborn.

ERNEST G. RICHARDSON

RICHARDSON, ERNEST GLADSTONE (1874-1947), American bishop, was born at St. Vincent, British West Indies, Feb. 24, 1874, the son of Jonathan C. and Dorothea Ann (Davison) Richardson. Jonathan was a Wesleyan Methodist preacher and missionary. Coming to the United States for higher education, Ernest won the A.B. degree at DICKINSON COLLEGE in 1896. He joined the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE that year, and while stationed at Wallingford, Conn., two years and at Seventh Street, New York City, one year, he pursued studies and won the A.M. degree at Yale in 1899. WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY awarded him the D.D. degree in 1913, and Dickinson conferred on him the LL.D. in 1920. He married Anna Isenberg, April 21, 1897, and they had one son and two daughters. Richardson's other appointments were: Olin Church, BROOKLYN, 1900-01; Fleet Street, Brooklyn, 1902-09; Bristol, Conn., 1910-12; Simpson, Brooklyn, 1913-16; and Brooklyn North District, 1917-20. He was a member of four GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1908-20.

Elevated to the episcopacy in 1920, he was resident bishop in ATLANTA, 1920-28, and PHILADELPHIA, 1928-44. He was in charge of the PUERTO RICO CONFERENCE, 1933-44. He served as president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1941-42. After the accidental death of Bishop SCHUYLER E. GARTH in January 1947, Richardson was called out of retirement to administer the WISCONSIN AREA.

Richardson served on the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, 1910-44, and was president of it much of that time. For several years he was president of the Anti-Saloon League of America. The 1928, '32, and '36 General Conferences named him to the Commission on Interdenominational Relations, the group which officially dealt with plans and moves for the union of American Methodism, but he resigned before unification was effected in 1939 because his work in Puerto Rico, in which he was greatly interested, interfered with attendance at commission meetings on the mainland.

Richardson was a strong, legal-minded administrator. Always sure of himself, he was a splendid presiding officer. He established himself in the minds of ecclesiastical leaders as an interpreter of church law. It was almost universally agreed among those who knew him that he was the best parliamentarian in the church. He died at Philadelphia, Sept. 5, 1947.

On June 22, 1927 he was married to Selma T. White. He resides in Atlanta, Ga.

Who's Who in the Methodist Church, 1966. J. MARVIN RAST

RICHARDSON, JAMES (1791-1875), Canadian bishop. was born in Kingston, Upper Canada, Jan. 29, 1791. His father was a former naval officer, who had become an officer in the Provincial Marine, and a merchant as well. James Richardson was given a sound primary education, on which he built substantially in later life. As a boy he naturally became a sailor, and in 1812 received a commission in the Provincial Marine. He distinguished himself in combat, but suffered the grievous loss of one arm.

After the war Richardson left the navy and became a customs officer at Presque Isle, near Kingston. There he was converted and joined the Methodist Church. Here too, he was to meet his future colleague in the episcopate, PHILANDER SMITH. His own talents were quickly recognized and he was pressed into service as a local preacher. In 1824 after a severe struggle with himself, he decided to give up his comfortable secular position and to enter the itinerancy. Three years later he was taken into full connection and became a deacon.

From that time forward James Richardson rose rapidly in the estimation of his brethren. When EGERTON RYERSON gave up the Christian Guardian editorship in 1832, Richardson succeeded him. In his year as editor he continued the strong liberal orientation of the Methodist journal. Clearly, however, he was doubtful about the wisdom of the union of 1833, and he was regarded with suspicion by the Wesleys. Thus, although he was appointed a district chairman in 1833, he became increasingly estranged from many of his former colleagues, especially the Ryerson brothers.

Rather than join the emerging M.E. Church, in 1836, Richardson took an appointment in Auburn, N. Y., but returned the following year. He was then admitted to the Episcopal Conference and stationed in TORONTO. Once again, in 1839, he was elected secretary of the Conference, but in 1840 he became agent of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Fortunately for the Episcopal Methodists, Richardson became a presiding elder again in 1852. By 1858 Bishop Smith's health had deteriorated and James Richardson was elected as his colleague. He continued as bishop until his death in 1875.

As minister and bishop Richardson was held in great esteem and affection by his brethren, by the other Methodist bodies, and by the people of his province. He earned the place which he was accorded, by the simplicity of his faith, the skill with which he carried out his episcopal duties, and the balanced way in which he sought to link the Church and society.

RICHARDSON, JOHN (1734-1792), British minister, was the son of an alhouse keeper at Kirkleatham, Yorkshire. As curate of Ewhurst, Surrey, he was influenced by John Holman, a Methodist farmer. Richardson was converted under the ministry of THOMAS RANKIN in 1762. On being removed from his curacy because of his evangelical preaching, Richardson joined JOHN WESLEY. He first held an appointment at the Foundry and then became one of the readers at City Road Chapel (see LONDON, Wesley's Chapel). He conducted Wesley's funeral service.

RICHARDSON, SIMON PETER (1818-1899), American itinerant who had a remarkable ministry covering nearly sixty years of Methodist history. He was considered one of the distinctive men of his generation and powerfully and effectively influenced the career of the noted evangelist and lecturer, SAM P. JONES.

He was born in the Dutch Fork, Newberry District, S. C., May 13, 1818. He was baptized in the Lutheran faith. In December 1840 he was received on trial into the GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church. When the FLORIDA CONFERENCE was organized in 1845 he transferred to that Conference, remaining in it until 1865 when he became general agent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY for ALABAMA and west FLORIDA for eight years.

His ministry was for the most part divided between that of presiding elder and pastor in Georgia, Florida, and Alabama—in his latter years as a member of the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, M.E. Church, South. He was noted as church builder and as fiery CAMP MEETING preacher and evangelist. His unique style and manner gave peculiar emphasis and vitality to his message. Many stories are told of his unusual manner and ways.

He and his wife had ten children.

At the session of the North Georgia Conference which convened in Athens, Ga., Nov. 24, 1897, he was requested by the Conference to write his autobiography. This he did, entitling it The Lights and Shadows of Itinerant Life. He died June 15, 1899.

RICHARDSON, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church dominates the skyline of the city and can be seen from every approach. The church was formally organized in June of 1886 by a group of fifteen local Methodists. In 1898 a one-acre site was purchased and the first building was constructed at a total cost of $1,200.

The membership grew with the town, expanding rapidly in the period 1921 to 1924, and in 1924 the church completed a new brick building on the corner of Greenville and Polk Streets. An educational unit was added in 1951, and old army barracks from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY were used for additional church school rooms.

By 1953 First Church had a membership of 388. Richardson began to expand rapidly and the church purchased a new site in 1954. Groundbreaking services for a new fellowship hall, which was to serve as a sanctuary, were held on Sept. 22, 1957; and on April 13, 1958, open house was held in the new buildings. In over two years the membership grew to approximately 1,600 persons. A second educational unit became necessary.

Plans for a new sanctuary were inaugurated in 1962. Sept. 13, 1964, formal opening services were held in the new sanctuary. The sanctuary has a seating capacity of 1,050, is in the shape of a Greek cross, and has a unique round chancel.

Two church school sessions and two morning worship services are held each Sunday, and the average attendance in 1970 was 1,823 in church school and 1,366 in worship services. The membership is 4,005, and the church continues to grow in numbers and in spiritual influence in the community.

JOHN W. MORPHIS

MATTHEW RICHEY

RICHEY, MATTHEW (1803-1883), Canadian minister and educator was born 1803 in the County of Donegal, IRELAND, into a Calvinistic home. He was given a sound basic education with the view of entering the Presbyterian ministry. In his midteens he was invited to attend a Methodist prayer meeting. He was so impressed with the simple prayers of the little company that he was led to an awakening and conversion. Much against his parents' will, he joined the Methodist society and engaged in local preaching, in which he displayed unusual eloquence and passion. The strained relation at home and the call to adventure abroad combined with Providence to bring him to Saint John, New Brunswick, in 1820 at the age of seventeen. At first he found employment in a law office but soon became assistant master at Saint John Grammar School.

James Priestley realized at once that Richey had had some experience in preaching. At a district meeting held in Liverpool, Nova Scotia, he preached with such acceptability that he was invited to become an itinerant. He was received on trial in 1821 and into full connexion and ordained in 1825. For the first decade of his ministry he served circuits in the Atlantic provinces, growing quickly in stature, eloquence, and popularity. He had strong but narrow religious and political views with a deep reverence for the monarchy and the empire. He was more concerned for dignity and enlightenment than for the traditional enthusiasm of his fellow Methodists.

Matthew Richey came into prominence when, in 1835, he accompanied William Lord to Montreal. Although it was his first appearance in either of the Canadas, he won immediate recognition. John Carroll describes him in glowing terms:

For the power and pleasantness of his voice; ease and gracefulness of elocution; ready command of the most exuberant and elevated language, amounting almost to inflation of style; together with rich variety of theological lore, he scarcely ever had a superior, if an equal, in British North America. He was gentleman-like in his manners, Christian in his spirit and demeanor, and soundly Wesleyan in his teachings. (Carroll, Case, iv, 108)

With these characteristics he quickly won a foremost place in the pulpit and on the platform in Canada's largest city.

Undoubtedly his remarkable ministry in Montreal influenced Conference to appoint him as first principal of Upper Canada Academy. The fact that he had a classical education, used splendid diction, and expounded the truth with clarity and conviction, made him an excellent choice for this academic position. After he had been introduced at the opening ceremony, June 18, 1836, he delivered "an elegant address." The Royal Charter was granted Oct. 12, 1836; at the close of the first academic year there were 120 students enrolled. In the same year the WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in CONNECTICUT conferred upon Richey the M.A. degree. In 1847 the same institution granted him the D.D. degree.

Not long after his dramatic installation as principal, administrative troubles arose both within the academy and without, in relation to the Conference. Richey, a member of the British Wesleyan group, was suspected by many in the Conference. Complaints were voiced against the principal. While the members of the Conference believed him to be sincere, well-intentioned, and noted for his facile speech, they agreed that he lacked tact and promoted inflated ideas which the Conference could not accept. JOHN RYERSON, then prominent in the Conference, harshly criticized the principal:

Reichy (sic) flounders at some of our Rules for the Academy, especially that he is not to have the handling of the money and that there is no servant allowed him extra. I very much wish Reichy was out of the institution; if he is not, I am quite satisfied that he will ruin the institution or else ruin us. (Sissons, Ryerson, i, 383-384.)

It is evident that Principal Richey disliked the Canadian faction represented in the academy board and in the Conference. He apparently tried, however, to accommodate himself to their wishes. ANSON GREEN was able to report a noticeable change in the attitude of the principal in 1838. He was doing well, and "had he done so from the commencement he would have saved us at least $1000." In 1839 the board named Jesse Hurlburt as acting principal, and in 1840 EGERTON RYERSON became principal. In spite of Matthew Richey's difficulties with his board, he helped to establish higher education for Methodists in Upper Canada.

At the Conference in Hamilton June 12, 1839, Richey was stationed at Toronto. He played a major role in the controversy over the policy of The Christian Guardian, which at the time was under attack for taking sides in party politics. Outwardly the question was: Is The Guardian a religious journal, or has it a responsibility to become involved in political issues affecting the Methodist Church—such as the clergy reserves? Fundamentally the British and Canadian Methodists differed in their attitude to the relationship between Church and State. Alder, the British representative to the Canada Conference, was present to bring the "colonial church" into conformity with the mother church which recognized the established church in England.

Richey helped to precipitate the dissolution in 1840 of the union between the two conferences, and to fan the conflict of the years from 1840 to 1847. After the union was restored in 1847, he emerged again as a respected figure. He was co-delegate to the Conference in 1848 and president in 1849 and 1850.
